Preface

This project was made possible by a generous grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington. This grant was supplemented by extra funding from the John King Fairbank Center for East Asian Research, Harvard University, the International Institute of Social History, Amsterdam, and the Sinologisch Instituut, Leiden. The Royal Netherlands Academy of Arts and Sciences provided a grant for two research trips to the People's Republic of China.

The project originated with discussions in the mid-1980s initiated by Professor Roderick MacFarquhar among Fairbank colleagues, in particular Dr. Timothy Cheek and Dr. Hans van de Ven. The major conclusion of these discussions was that the massive amount of new sources that had become available as a result of the "opening up" of the People's Republic of China in the 1980s, when combined with those available in the Republic of China on Taiwan, the now former Soviet Union, and elsewhere, allowed for a comprehensive reappraisal of the rise to power of the Chinese communist movement.

The idea of a documentary history was inspired by the classic work produced at Harvard by Conrad Brandt, Benjamin Schwartz, and John King Fairbank in the early 1950s, A Documentary History of Chinese Communism. The new work was to contain many sources that were unavailable at that time, but, as it was designed to provide a comprehensive introduction for students in a single collection to the CCP's rise to power, it had to include a number of already translated documents.

Early in 1986, I was brought into the discussions. That summer, Professor MacFarquhar and I were quartered in the same hotel in Beijing while we were both conducting research at the Institute of Marxism-Leninism and Mao Zedong Thought of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. Further discussions led to my agreeing to direct the project, and steps were taken to contact Chinese scholars and research institutes engaged in work on CCP history and to collect materials to supplement those already available at Harvard and Leiden. Apart from the help from various scholars and institutes in the People's Republic of China, the staff of the Bureau of Investigation Archives (Taipei) provided copies of valuable materials. In addition, Dr. Eugene Wu and the staff of the Harvard-Yenching Library as well as the library staff of the Sinologisch Instituut, Leiden, and the International Institute of Social History, Amsterdam, all helped in locating materials. Nancy Hearst of the Fairbank Center Library deserves special mention for her enthusiasm in tracking down relevant materials and making me aware of new, interesting publications.

Now that the materials had been compiled, the process of selection, translating, editing, and interpretation began. Dr. Benjamin Yang worked as a consultant to the project in its early stages and was a constant source of wisdom and advice. He provided basic information for the initial drafts of the commentaries covering 1927 to 1938. This work drew largely on the research he had carried out for his book From Revolution to Politics. Chinese Communists on the Long March (1990). I put these drafts into final form, adding materials like debate on party history, work in the white areas, and some additional documentation on the origins of the Second United Front. For better or worse, I am solely responsible for the general introduction, the remaining chronological introductions, the quality of the translations, and their annotation.

The eight chronological introductions place each document in its specific historical context, while the general introduction is intended to introduce the reader to the broader issues of the Chinese communist revolution to which the documents relate.

Unless specifically stated, the translations were done by Sarah Burgess, Gu Wei-qun, Guo Xiaolin, Hong Xiaolin, Huang Yasheng, Tony Saich, Peter Wan, and Yin Xiaohuang. Pei Minxin deserves special mention for the large amount of translation work he undertook. If it had not been for him, the project would probably still be running.

The following people read all or part of the manuscript, and their advice kept me from falling into some of the pitfalls that lay along the way: David Apter, Richard Baum, Gregor Benton, Timothy Cheek, Christina Gilmartin, Kathleen Hartford, Roderick MacFarquhar, Benjamin Schwartz, Lawrence Sullivan, Frederick Teiwes, Fritjof Tichelman, and C. Martin Wilbur.

The administration of the project would have been impossible without the professional guidance of Anne Denna, Nancy Deptula, and Patrick Maddox. Antonina Colbert did sterling work to help type up the manuscript. At a crucial stage, Doug Merwin of M.E. Sharpe stepped in to resolve the issue of publication.

Two people deserve special mention. Without Roderick MacFarquhar's help and enthusiasm, the project would never have even started let alone been finished. His advice was invaluable at every step. Professor John King Fairbank showed great enthusiasm for the project, and I learned much from our numerous discussions. Further, he cast a critical and editorial eye over virtually the entire manuscript and provided much sound advice.

Finally, I would like to thank all the members of the Fairbank Center for making my visits there such pleasant ones. Without the benefit of the seminars and lunch-time discussions this manuscript would be in far worse shape.

- 1 July: Formation of the GMD national government announced with Wang Jingwei as chair and Borodin as senior advisor.
- 20 August: Liao Zhongkai, an ardent supporter of communist participation in the GMD and the alliance with Soviet Russia, murdered in Canton.
- October: Second Enlarged Meeting of the CEC held in Beijing. It decides that the time is ripe to convert the party from a "small group" into a "central mass political party."

- 4-19 January: Second National Congress of the GMD convenes in Canton and pledges continued support for the policy of cooperation with the CCP.
- 21-24 February: Special meeting of the CCP CEC convened in Beijing. It decides that work among the peasantry must be strengthened during the Northern Expedition.
- 20 March: "Zhongshan Incident" takes place, with Chiang Kai-shek declaring martial law and claiming that a gunboat under communist command was planning to kidnap him.
- 15-22 May: GMD CEC meeting adopts measures to restrict CCP activity in the GMD.
- 9 July: Northern Expedition launched with Chiang Kai-shek as commander-in-chief.
- 12-18 July: Fourth Plenum of the CCP CEC meets in Shanghai to discuss Northern Expedition. Policy focuses on cooperation with the bourgeoisie rather than seizure of power.
- 4-5 November: Meeting of CCP leadership convened at which Chen Duxiu criticizes the views of the Canton party organization.
- 13 December: Special meeting of the Party Center is held in Hankou. Chen criticizes "leftism" in the party, and the decision is taken to support Wang Jingwei.

- 10–17 March: Third Plenum of the GMD CEC meets, attended mainly by members of the GMD-left and the CCP. It moves to undermine Chiang's military power. It is the last time CCP leaders attend a GMD CEC meeting.
- 5 April: Chen Duxiu and Wang Jingwei issue joint statement emphasizing continued collaboration between the CCP and the GMD.
- 6 April: Soviet Embassy compound in Beijing raided. Li Dazhao and other CCP leaders are arrested; several, including Li, are later executed.
- 12 April: Chiang Kai-shek's soldiers massacre Communists in Shanghai and a purge of Communists begins in many eastern and southern cities.
- 27 April–9 May: Fifth National Congress of the CCP convenes in Hankou. The Congress does not order a break with the GMD, but delegates argue about how to push ahead with the peasant movement without upsetting cooperation. Chen Duxiu remains general secretary.
- 21 May: "Horse Day" massacre takes place in Changsha, a military suppression of communist-led mass organizations.
- 30 June: Enlarged meeting of the CCP CC adopts an eleven-point resolution acknowledging that the GMD is the leader of the national revolution.
- 12 July: CCP leadership is reformed. Chen Duxiu resigns as general secretary and new five-person temporary Standing Committee of the Politburo is chosen.
- 15 July: Wuhan GMD Political Affairs Committee announces the end of cooperation with the CCP.
- 1 August: Communist-led Nanchang Uprising launched. The uprising is quickly defeated, and some of the remnants under Zhu De flee to the mountains. The day is subsequently celebrated as the founding of the Red Army.
- 5 August: Wang Jingwei begins a wide-scale purge of Communists.
- 7 August: CCP Party Center convenes an Emergency Conference in Hankou under the supervision of Comintern representative Lominadze. Qu Qiubai takes Chen Duxiu's place as general secretary. The meeting calls for armed struggle against the GMD.
- 9 August: Temporary Politburo meets and elects a three-person Standing Committee comprising Qu Qiubai, Li Weiham, and Su Zhaosheng. The meeting decides to send Mao Zedong and Peng Gongda to take charge of the Autumn Harvest Uprising in Hunan and to reorganize the Hunan Party Committee.
- 19 September: With the failure of the uprising apparent, Mao Zedong decides to abandon the party's orders to attack Changsha and retreats to the Jinggang Mountains.

- 9–10 November: Enlarged meeting of the Temporary Politburo convenes in Shanghai and decides to sever all relations with the GMD and calls for uprisings throughout the country.
- 11–14 December: Uprising by the Communists in the south (Canton Commune) ends in a massive defeat.

- April: Mao Zedong and Zhu De join forces in the Jinggang Mountains to form the first and most influential communist base area in the countryside.
- 18 June–10 July: Sixth National Congress of the CCP is held in Moscow because of security concerns. It takes place under the direct supervision of Bukharin. The revolution in China is depicted as being in a trough between two waves. The soviet is designated as the instrument of political power for the future.
- 19 July: First Plenum of the CC elects the new Politburo.
- 20 July: New Politburo meets and elects Xiang Zhongfa as general secretary.
- November: Li Lisan replaces Cai Hesen in the Politburo.

- 8 February: ECCI sends a letter to the CCP claiming that signs of a new revolutionary high tide in China are visible.
- 22 April: Stalin openly criticizes Bukharin for “right opportunism,” and Bukharin loses his position in the Comintern.
- 25–30 June: Second Plenum of the CC is held in Shanghai, and the “leftist” trend in the party increases. “Rightism” is defined as the greatest danger at the present time.
- 5 October: Politburo decision attacks Chen Duxiu for his “Trotskyite” and “liquidationist” tendencies.
- 26 October: ECCI writes to the CCP telling it that the new revolutionary tide has arrived and that the party must take over its leadership.
- Late December: Ninth Party Congress of the Fourth Army of the Red Army is held in Gutian and adopts a resolution drafted by Mao Zedong.

- April: Zhou Enlai leaves China for Moscow, thus leaving effective power within the party in the hands of Li Lisan.
- 5 April: War breaks out between Chiang Kai-shek’s troops and those of Yan Xishan and Feng Yuxiang. In November Chiang is victorious.
- May: Li Lisan convenes two conferences in Shanghai: the National Conference of Delegates from the Red Armies (mid-May) and the National Conference of Delegates from the Soviet Areas (20–23 May). The former calls for the establishment of a - national Soviet regime, while the latter abandons the former guerrilla warfare tactics in favor of mobile warfare. This paves the way for the decision to attack major cities.

- 11 June: Li Lisan presides over Politburo meeting in Shanghai that decides the revolutionary upsurge has arrived. Wuhan is to be seized as part of the takeover of one or more provinces.
- 18 July: National Conference of CCP Organizations opens in Shanghai. It announces that the party should organize uprisings and that the party is the one preparing to take power. It calls for action committees to be established at the central and local levels.
- 23 July: The party in Shanghai receives the ECCI's response to Li Lisan's policy that seems to approve of it but expresses concern.
- 27 July: Peng Dehuai's Third Army captures Changsha but is able to hold it for only seven days.
- August: Qu Qiubai and Zhou Enlai are sent back to China from Moscow to moderate Li Lisan's policies.
- 6 August: Li Lisan chairs the first meeting of the Central Action Committee, which calls on the whole party to mobilize for immediate revolution.
- 23 August: First Front Army formed with Mao Zedong as general political commissar.
- 24 August–
12 September: Second attack on Changsha takes place without success.
- 24–28 September: Third Plenum of the CC meets in Shanghai chaired by Qu Qiubai. Li Lisan is criticized for tactical errors, particularly concerning the speed and development of the revolution.
- 16 November: ECCI letter of October arrives in China. It criticizes Li Lisan's mistakes as ones of line.
- December: GMD's First Suppression Campaign defeated within one month. Futian Incident occurs. The Twentieth Army led by Liu Tiechao revolts but is swiftly defeated.

- 7 January: Fourth Plenum of the CC is held in Shanghai under the supervision of Pavel Mif, who had arrived in China in late December 1930. The Plenum harshly condemns Li Lisan. Qu Qiubai, Li Lisan, and Li Weihai are dismissed from the Politburo, and Wang Ming is added. Xiang Zhongfa remains general secretary but real power lies with Wang Ming. Central Soviet Bureau established with Zhou Enlai as secretary.
- 17 January: He Mengxiong and Luo Zhanglong make public their opposition to the Fourth Plenum and demand the convocation of an emergency congress.

- 18 January: He Mengxiong and key supporters, not including Luo Zhanglong, are arrested by the British police and handed over to the GMD. They are executed on 7 February.
- 27 January: Luo Zhanglong expelled from the CCP.
- May–June: GMD's Second Suppression Campaign rebuffed.
- 21 June: General Secretary Xiang Zhongfa is arrested in Shanghai and is executed by the GMD on 24 June. Wang Ming takes over as acting general secretary.
- July–October: GMD's Third Suppression Campaign launched under Chiang Kai-shek's leadership.
- 18 September: Japanese troops invade northeast China.
- 1–5 November: Gannan Conference (First Party Congress of the Central Soviet) convenes and criticizes Mao Zedong's harshness in dealing with the Futian Incident. Mao is transferred to work in the soviet government.
- 7–20 November: First All-China Soviet Congress convenes in Ruijin and founds the Chinese Soviet Republic as a national regime. Mao Zedong is appointed chair of the soviet government. Xiang Ying and Zhang Guotao are appointed vice-chairs with Zhu De as chair of newly created Central Revolutionary Military Commission.
- December: Zhou Enlai arrives in Jiangxi and formally assumes the position of secretary of the Central Soviet Bureau.

- 9 January: CCP Party Center passes a resolution urging an "initial victory in one or more provinces."
- May: Chiang Kai-shek sets up General Headquarters for the Fourth Suppression Campaign.
- 8 October: Ningdu Conference of the Central Soviet Bureau convenes. Mao is strongly criticized, and on 23 October Zhou Enlai replaces Mao Zedong as political commissar of First Front Army.
- 11 October: Fourth Front Army is forced by the suppression campaign to leave the E-Yu-Wan Soviet Base Area and withdraw westward.
- 15 October: Chen Duxiu, Peng Shuzhi, and other Trotskyites are arrested by the GMD in Shanghai.
- October: Third Front Army forced to leave Hubei and flee north.
- 29 December: Fourth Front Army founds the Revolutionary Committee of the Sichuan-Shaanxi Base Area.

- January: Party Center headed by Bo Gu and Zhang Wentian is forced to leave Shanghai and move to the Jiangxi Soviet, where it merges with the Central Soviet Bureau.
- 15 February: Anti–Luo Ming campaign begins in the Jiangxi Central Soviet.

- 26–28 February: First Front Army in the Central Soviet gains a victory in the Fourth Suppression Campaign.
- 1 June: Government of the Chinese Soviet Republic launches the Land Investigation Movement.
- October: GMD launches its Fifth Suppression Campaign against the Central Soviet. In the same month Otto Braun, the Comintern's military advisor to the CCP, arrives in Jiangxi.
- 26 October: Secret peace agreement signed between the Red Army and the Nineteenth Route Army in Fujian.
- 20 November: The Nineteenth Route Army leaders declare a revolt against the GMD. By late December, the loosely knit government set up by the rebellion collapses under pressure from advancing GMD troops.

- 15–18 January: Fifth Plenum of the CC convenes in Ruijin. Bo Gu's political report stresses that the revolutionary situation is excellent.
- 22 January–
3 February: Second All-China Soviet Congress convenes in Ruijin. Mao Zedong elected chair of the Central Government, and Zhang Wentian elected chair of the Council of People's Commissars.
- 28 April: Central Red Army loses the battle at Guangchang.
- 21 October: CCP CC moves out of Ruijin and embarks on the Long March.
- 10 November: GMD forces occupy Ruijin.
- 11 December: CCP Politburo meets at Tongdao and again on 18 December at Liping, and the original decision to move north to meet the Second and Sixth Army Corps is scrapped.

- 15–18 January: An enlarged meeting of the Politburo convenes at Zunyi. Bo Gu is criticized for implementing a mistaken military line, and Mao Zedong is elected a member of the Standing Committee of the Politburo.
- 15 May: Zhang Guotao and the Fourth Front Army set up the Northwest Special Committee of the CCP in the Sichuan-Xikang Border Area.
- 30 May: Zhang Guotao announces formation of the "Northwest Federal Government of the Chinese Soviet Republic."
- 14 June: Rally held to mark the reunion of the First and Fourth Front Armies.
- 18 June: Qu Qiubai is executed having been arrested by the GMD in February.
- 26 June: Politburo meets at Lianghekou to deal with urgent military

- matters. Zhang Guotao and Mao Zedong differ over which direction the Red Armies should move. Zhang wants to move east, while Mao, in the name of the Party Center, decides to move north.
- 18 July: Zhang Guotao named political commissar of the Red Army with Zhu De as commander-in-chief.
- 25 July–
20 August: Comintern's Seventh Congress adopts a new policy calling for a united front of all classes to resist fascism.
- 1 August: CCP Mission to the Comintern headed by Wang Ming publishes the August First Declaration advocating a national united front against the Japanese.
- 5–6 August: Politburo meets at Shawo to try to solve the political differences between the First and Fourth Front Armies. The decision to march north is confirmed.
- 10 September: Mao Zedong convenes emergency Politburo meeting at Baxi and again gets confirmation that the troops should march north. Zhang Guotao is not present.
- 12 September: CC meets at Ejie, and Mao Zedong delivers a report criticizing Zhang Guotao.
- 13–14 September: Zhang Guotao in a meeting held in Aba decides to move south. Mao Zedong is criticized as a "right opportunist."
- 15 October: Fourth Front Army's conference held in Zhuomubao decides to establish another Party Center headed by Zhang Guotao.
- 19 October: Central Red Army reaches Wuqizhen in north Shaanxi.
- 21 November: Zhang Hao, an envoy from the Comintern in Moscow, arrives in north Shaanxi.
- 5 December: Zhang Guotao telegrams the First Front Army informing it of his new "Party Center."
- 17 December: Politburo meets at Wayaobao to discuss the implications of the new united front strategy for China.

- 22 January: Party Center passes a resolution denouncing Zhang Guotao.
- 28 January: Zhang Guotao at conference of party and army activists accepts the new united front policy.
- February: Zhang Guotao's troops defeated by the GMD and forced to retreat westward.
- 9 April: Zhou Enlai and Zhang Xueliang meet in Yan'an for secret talks about opposition to Japan.
- 5 May: CCP sends appeal to the Nanjing government calling for a cease-fire.
- June: Ren Bishi and He Long lead the remnants of the Second and Sixth Army Corps to meet up with the Fourth Front Army at Ganzi.

- July: Second and Sixth Army Corps and the Fourth Front Army decide to move north to join up with the First Front Army.
- 25 August: Zhang Wentian drafts an open letter on behalf of the CCP commending Chiang Kai-shek and referring to him as generalissimo.
- 17 September: Politburo passes resolution suggesting that an agreement be reached with Chiang Kai-shek.
- 8 October: The three major Red Army groups link up.
- 7 December: Mao Zedong assumes position of chair of the Central Military Council.
- 12 December: Xi'an Incident occurs. Chiang Kai-shek is taken captive by Zhang Xueliang and Yang Hucheng. On 16 December Zhou Enlai goes to Xi'an for negotiations, having received instructions from the Comintern to resolve the issue peacefully. On 25 December, Zhang Xueliang accompanies Chiang Kai-shek back to Nanjing.

- January: CCP moves its headquarters from Bao'an to Yan'an.
- 10 February: CCP CC sends a telegram to the Third Plenum of the GMD CC calling for a new period of CCP-GMD cooperation. The CCP calls for a cessation of civil war and convocation of a National Assembly and offers to abolish its independent political regime and to cease using the terms soviet and Red Army.
- 4 March: Liu Shaoqi sends a letter to the Party Center claiming that the party has suffered from "leftism" ever since the 7 August 1927 Emergency Meeting.
- 23-31 March: Politburo convenes an enlarged meeting in Yan'an to discuss the domestic situation and to criticize Zhang Guotao. A decision is adopted on Zhang Guotao's "mistakes."
- April: Liu Zhidan killed in combat with GMD troops in Shaanxi.
- 2-14 May: CCP conference of national party delegates is convened in Yan'an. Zhang Wentian rejects Liu Shaoqi's view that the party as a whole had suffered from "leftism" and reaffirms the party's and the Comintern's basic line as correct.
- May-June: Party Center convenes a conference in Yan'an on work in the white areas. Liu Shaoqi presides. While dropping his criticism of the Party Center during the Jiangxi period, he still criticizes "leftism" in the party and warns of "subjectivism" and "dogmatism."
- 7 July: Sino-Japanese War begins with the "incident" at the Marco Polo Bridge near Beijing.
- 9 August: Clash at Hongqiao Airport (Shanghai) between Chinese and Japanese troops takes place.
- 21 August: Nonaggression treaty is signed between the USSR and the Nationalist government in Nanjing.

- 22–25 August: Politburo convenes an enlarged meeting at Luochuan. The resolution calls for an “all-around war of resistance” and emphasizes the leading role of the CCP in the war. It formally adopts the “Ten Great Policies for Resistance Against Japan and National Salvation.”
- 25 August: Eighth Route Army formed with Zhu De as general commander and Ren Bishi as director of the Political Department.
- 22 September: CCP’s manifesto on GMD-CCP cooperation, drafted on 4 July, is made public by the Central News Agency of the central government.
- 10 October: New Fourth Army founded with Ye Ting as general commander and Xiang Ying as political commissar.
- 12 November: Mao Zedong addresses a meeting of party activists in Yan’an. He stresses the need for the CCP to retain its independence.
- 29 November: Wang Ming and seven members of the CCP Mission to the Comintern, including Kang Sheng and Chen Yun, arrive in Yan’an.
- 9–14 December: Politburo convenes in Yan’an to discuss Comintern policy and party work. Wang Ming prevails over Mao Zedong, but no formal resolution is drawn up. On Comintern instructions, the post of general secretary (held by Zhang Wentian) is abolished and a Secretariat formed comprising Zhang Wentian, Mao Zedong, Kang Sheng, and Chen Yun. Mao retains his position as chair of the Military Council. Following the meeting, Wang Ming, Zhou Enlai, and Bo Gu leave for Wuhan to set up the Yangtze Bureau with Wang Ming as secretary.

- 27 February–
- 1 March: Conflict between Mao Zedong and Wang Ming reaches a high point at a Politburo meeting. No formal resolution is adopted.
- 4 April: Zhang Guotao flees Yan’an to join the GMD.
- 18 April: Zhang Guotao is expelled from the CCP.
- 15 June: Wang Ming, Bo Gu, and Zhou Enlai issue a public statement citing the heroic defense of Madrid as a good example for the defense of Wuhan. They propose mass mobilization to defend Wuhan.
- 5 August: GMD places restrictions on the activities of mass organizations in Wuhan.
- 14 September: Politburo meets to discuss news from the Comintern brought to Yan’an by Wang Jiaxiang. The Comintern approves the conduct of the war to date and suggests that Mao Zedong, not Wang Ming, should be the party leader.
- 29 September–
- 6 November: Sixth Plenum of the CCP CC convenes in Yan’an. By the end of the Plenum, Mao strongly expresses his differences with Wang Ming. However, in his opening remarks Mao asserts that the CCP takes second place to the GMD in the war against Japan. Mao states that the CCP's aim is to establish a "new democratic republic" based on Sun Yat-sen's "Three Principles of the People." In his closing remarks, Mao is more critical of the GMD, blaming it for not allowing the united front to assume a proper organizational form. Mao criticizes Wang Ming's approach of using legal channels to develop the communist movement and of shifting the focus of work from the countryside to the cities. Mao Zedong is placed in control of the daily work of the Secretariat.

25 October: Wuhan falls to the Japanese.

9 November: Yangtze Bureau is abolished and its former area of jurisdiction placed under two new bureaus, the Southern Bureau headed by Zhou Enlai (13 January 1939) and the Central Plain's Bureau headed by Liu Shaoqi.

15 January–

4 February: Meeting of the First People's Council of the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region convenes. It adopts a milder political line to be pursued during the war. Lin Boqu elected as chair of the Border Region government.

21–30 January: Fifth Plenum of the GMD CC meets and decides to step up its curbs on CCP activities.

10 February: CCP CC issues instructions concerning clashes between CCP and GMD troops.

10 June: Mao Zedong addresses a high-level cadres conference on the deteriorating relations with the GMD. He depicts all anti-communist activity as capitulation to the Japanese.

3–25 August: Enlarged meeting of the Politburo convened in Yan'an. It decides to stop the "storm membership drive" that had been in progress since the beginning of the war in 1937. Policy is to consolidate and to purge "undesirable elements."

9–18 September: National Political Consultative Assembly convenes its fourth session. The CCP tries to use the meeting to reject GMD attacks and to strengthen the anti-Japanese front. The GMD is unresponsive and criticizes the CCP's principal representative, Wang Ming.

October: GMD severs financial and logistical support to the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region government.

4 October: Mao Zedong publishes "Introduction to the Communist." It marks the beginning of Mao's attempt to define a new party history that is critical of Wang Ming and his supporters.

- January: Secret agreement between Wang Jingwei and the Japanese to set up a new “National Government” made public.
- 15 January: Mao Zedong publishes “New Democratic Politics and New Democratic Culture.” For the first time since the outbreak of the war, the CCP publicly advances its claim to lead the revolution.
- 1 February: CCP CC issues resolution warning that capitulation is the greatest danger at the present time.
- 6 March: CCP CC issues directive on the question of administration of the anti-Japanese base areas. It proposes adoption of the “three thirds” system of government.
- 13 August: CCP’s Northern Bureau adopts the “Double Ten Policy” for the administration of the Jin-Cha-Ji Border Region.
- 20 August: “100 Regiments” Campaign is launched by the Eighth Route Army to attack the Japanese troops in North China. It concludes on 5 December.

- January: “Southern Anhui Incident” (New Fourth Army Incident) occurs. The New Fourth Army troops are destroyed by the GMD.
- 20 January: New leadership of the New Fourth Army is announced that places it firmly under the control of Mao Zedong and his supporters. Chen Yi is made temporary commander and Liu Shaoqi appointed political commissar.
- 13 April: USSR and Japan conclude a five-year neutrality pact.
- 19 May: Mao Zedong delivers a speech to high-level cadres attending a study conference. He points out that the practical application of Marxism-Leninism in revolutionary work merits the most attention. (The speech is not published until 27 March 1942.)
- 22 June: Nazi Germany invades the Soviet Union.
- 2 July: Liu Shaoqi addresses the Central China Branch of the Party School on the question of how inner-party struggle should be conducted.
- 10 September–
22 October: An enlarged meeting of the Politburo convenes. The meeting marks the effective launch of the Rectification Campaign. The meeting decides that mistakes made by the party between 1931 and 1934 were ones of political line.
- 26 September: Central Secretariat publishes a decision on organizing study for senior cadres. A central study organization is formed with Mao Zedong as its head and Wang Jiaxiang as his deputy.
- 6–21 November: Second People’s Council of the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region convenes. It decides on the policy of “Better Troops and Simpler Administration.”

- 4 December: Border Region government sends out a directive to all counties on implementing “Better Troops and Simpler Administration.”
- 9 December: CCP calls for the formation of an anti-Japanese and antifascist front in the Pacific to include all the governments and peoples who are opposed to Japan.

- 28 January: Politburo ratifies a CC decision on land policy in the base areas. It is designed to appeal to all classes in the rural areas.
- 1 and 8 February: Mao Zedong addresses opening ceremony of the Central Party School in Yan'an. He highlights incorrect work methods in the party. The speech marks the formal beginning of the Rectification Campaign.
- 6 February: CC issues a directive explaining the need for moderation in current economic policy.
- 2–23 May: Yan'an Forum on Literature and Art convenes at which Mao Zedong outlines his policy.
- 27 May–11 June: Struggle sessions are held at the Central Research Institute to criticize Wang Shiwei.
- 28 May: Chen Duxiu dies.
- 8 June: Propaganda Department announces that a general study committee is to be set up in Yan'an with Mao Zedong as its head and Kang Sheng as his deputy.
- 19 October–
14 January 1943: CCP Northwest Bureau convenes a senior cadres conference that makes decisions supportive of Mao Zedong's view on party history and economic and administrative affairs. Mao delivers a speech on economic affairs setting forth the principles for future work.
- December: Party organs are instructed to begin investigation of cadres' backgrounds. However, the work formally begins only in April 1943.

- 10 March: Chiang Kai-shek's China's Destiny is published.
- 16–20 March: Politburo meets to discuss the question of strengthening party centralized leadership. The Secretariat is subordinated to the Politburo but is to carry out its day-to-day work. Mao Zedong appointed chair of the Politburo and the Secretariat. It is decided that the chair of the Secretariat will have the final power of decision on matters to be discussed at Secretariat meetings.
- 15 May: Comintern is dissolved.
- 26 May: CCP CC announces its agreement with the dissolution of the Comintern.

- 1 July: CCP begins to build up the public stature of Mao Zedong and his role in the history of the party.
- 6 July: Liu Shaoqi in an article attacks “false Marxists” and calls for party members to arm themselves with Mao Zedong’s system of thought.
- 15 August: CCP CC decision formally links the investigation of cadres with rectification.
- Early September–October: Politburo meets and criticizes Wang Ming’s “right opportunism” during the first year of the anti-Japanese war.
- 28 December: CC directives are sent out criticizing Wang Ming and Bo Gu for mistakes both during the anti-Japanese war and during the period 1931–34.

- April: Japan’s Operation Ichigo attempts to clear a land route from Korea down to Hanoi.
- 12 April: Mao Zedong addresses a meeting of senior cadres in Yan’an. He calls for work in urban areas to be stepped up.
- 4–8 May: Substantive contacts take place between the GMD and the CCP in Xi’an.
- 21 May: Seventh Plenum of the CCP CC convenes in Yan’an. It concludes on 20 April 1945. It meets on 21 May, 5 June, 9 November, 7 and 9 December 1944, 18 February, 31 March, and 20 April 1945. Mao Zedong chairs the Presidium and the meeting as a whole. While in session, the Presidium and the Plenum take over the work of the Secretariat and the Politburo.
- 5 June: Seventh Plenum at its second session issues an instruction on urban work and sets up an urban work committee with Peng Zhen as its head.
- 1 July: CCP directives clearly show that the party feels the war will end soon.
- 4 September: CC instructs urban work departments to be set up at all levels above the local party committee. Base area and urban work is placed on an equal footing.
- 10 November: General Patrick Hurley and Mao Zedong sign an agreement that is optimistically billed as one between the CCP and the national government of China.
- 22 November: GMD issues its own three-point agreement.

- 3 February: An agreement is reached between the CCP and the GMD calling for a political consultative conference to discuss the establish-

- ment of constitutional government and the unification of military forces.
- February: Yalta Conference convenes.
- 1 March: Chiang Kai-shek makes it clear that while Communists and members of other parties can participate in the national government, the GMD will not give up its ultimate decision-making power until the people's congress has been convened to inaugurate constitutional government.
- 20 April: Seventh Plenum of the CCP CC concludes and adopts the resolution on party history. For the first time in such an official document, Wang Ming and Bo Gu are named as the "two dogmatists" who led the incorrect third "left line."
- 23 April–11 June: Seventh National Congress of the CCP convenes in Yan'an. Mao Zedong presents his report "On Coalition Government." The Congress adopts a new constitution drafted under Liu Shaoqi's guidance. The constitution stresses Mao Zedong Thought, stating that together with Marxism-Leninism it provides the guiding principles for all party work. A new CC of forty-four full and thirty-three alternate members is elected. Wang Ming and Bo Gu appear as numbers forty-three and forty-four respectively on the list of full members.
- 19 June: First Plenum of the CCP CC convenes in Yan'an. Mao Zedong is elected chair of the CC, the Politburo, and the Secretariat. A Politburo of thirteen members is elected.
- 6 August: Atomic bomb is dropped on Hiroshima.
- 8 August: Soviet Russia declares war on Japan.
- 10 August: Japan indicates its intention to surrender.
- 14 August: Soviet Russia signs a treaty of alliance with the Chinese Nationalist government. Soviet Russia agrees to pull out of Manchuria by mid-November.
- 23 August: Enlarged meeting of the Politburo sets up the CC's Military Affairs Commission with Mao Zedong as chair. It decides that Mao Zedong should go to Chongqing for negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek.
- 25 August: CC publishes a declaration putting forward the slogans of peace, democracy, and unity.
- 26 August: Mao Zedong flies to Chongqing for negotiations, returning to Yan'an on 11 October 1945.
- 10 September: Communist troops successfully conduct the Shangdang battle.
- 14–15 September: Politburo meets to discuss work in the Northeast. It sets up a Northeast Bureau with Peng Zhen as secretary.
- 19 September: CC informs its bureaus that its policy is to expand in the north and defend in the south.

- 11 October: Mao Zedong and Chiang Kai-shek issue a joint statement pledging the desire for peace and unity.
- End October: GMD-CCP armed clashes break out in eleven provinces.
- 21 December: CC sends a directive to the Northeast Bureau calling for long-term bases to be set up in the region.

- 10 January: Under General Marshall's mediation, the GMD and the CCP agree to a ceasefire to begin at midnight, 13 January.
- 10-31 January: Political Consultative Conference meets and succeeds in resolving most of the political and military differences between the CCP and the GMD.
- 1 February: CC issues a directive claiming that the most important form of struggle is now a peaceful, parliamentary one.
- 25 February: Three-person military committee (Marshall, Zhang Zhizhong, and Zhou Enlai) announces plans for large-scale troop reductions on both sides.
- 12 March: GMD forces occupy Shenyang, one day after Soviet withdrawal. General Marshall returns to the United States to report to President Truman.
- 15 April: Zhou Enlai declares that a state of hostilities exists in the northeast because of persistent GMD attacks.
- 18 April: General Marshall returns to China.
- 4 May: CCP CC issues a directive drafted by Liu Shaoqi calling for land reform instead of the policy of rent-reduction in order to attract peasant support during the Civil War.
- 7 June: A two-week ceasefire in the northeast is scheduled to begin. It is extended to the end of the month but to no avail.
- 14 June: United States passes legislation to provide military assistance to the GMD.
- 23 June: Mao Zedong demands that the United States cease all aid to the GMD and calls for U.S. withdrawal.
- 7 July: CCP CC launches a public attack on U.S. policy in China and demands withdrawal of U.S. forces.
- 4 August: Bo Gu, Ye Ting, Wang Ruofei, and Deng Fa are killed in a plane crash while flying from Chongqing to Yan'an.
- 10 October: Kalgan falls to the GMD. The CCP announces that this means certain civil war.
- 15 November-25 December: The National Assembly convenes in Nanjing. The CCP boycotts it.

- 7 January: General Marshall returns to the United States admitting the failure of his mission in China.
- 1 February: Enlarged Politburo meeting is held in Yan'an primarily to discuss Mao Zedong's "Welcome the New High Tide of the Chinese Revolution."
- 11 February: CCP delegation in Nanjing headed by Zhou Enlai is ordered to leave by the Nationalist government.
- 19 March: CCP withdraws from Yan'an.
- 26 March: CCP CC meets in Zaolingou Village (north Shaanxi) and decides to divide the CC in two. A Front Line Committee is established headed by Mao Zedong, Zhou Enlai, and Ren Bishi. It remains in north Shaanxi to lead the national liberation struggle. A Work Committee is set up headed by Liu Shaoqi and Zhu De. It moves to the Jin-Cha-Ji Base Area.
- 9 April: It is decided that the CC and the general headquarters of the PLA will remain in the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region.
- 17 July–
13 September: CC Work Committee convenes the National Land Conference at Xibaipo Village (Hebei) and passes the "Outline Land Law of China."
- 1 September: Mao Zedong drafts a CC directive calling for a switch from strategic withdrawal to launching a nationwide counteroffensive.
- 10 October: CC approves and publishes the "Outline Land Law of China." Not only the land of landlords is to be appropriated but also houses and all movable property.
- 27 October: Nationalist government outlaws the Democratic League composed of third-party groups largely sympathetic to the CCP.
- 25–28 December: CCP CC convenes at Yangjiagou (north Shaanxi) to consider land policy as well as the general situation. This is preceded by preparatory meetings from 7 December. Mao Zedong warns that the "ultraleft" policy of 1931–34 of granting no land to landlords should not be repeated. Mao also raises the "10 basic military principles."

- 12 January: Ren Bishi talks to an enlarged meeting of the Northwest Field Operations Military Front Committee about rural problems. He highlights the problem of too many middle peasants being classified as rich peasants and then being deprived of property.
- 23 January: Liu Shaoqi writes to Bo Yibo restating the integral link between land reform and party rectification and warns against encroachment on the rights of middle peasants.

- 3 and 6 February: Mao Zedong outlines a threefold categorization of “liberated areas,” each requiring a different land policy.
- 1 April: Mao Zedong, addressing the Congress of Cadres of the Shaan-Sui Liberated Area, warns against “ultraleft” tendencies.
- 22 April: Communist forces reoccupy Yan’an.
- 30 April–7 May: Secretariat of the CCP CC meets in Chengnan Village (Hebei) to discuss strategy for the war. It decides to concentrate forces on the Central Plains for attack as preparation for destruction of enemy troops north of the Yangtze.
- 25 May: CCP CC issues a directive drafted by Mao Zedong moderating land reform. Mao suggests that in some areas the conditions are not ripe for land reform.
- Late July–
31 August: Northeast Bureau of the CCP convenes a conference on urban work stressing its primacy over that in the rural areas.
- 1–22 August: Sixth Congress of the ACFTU is held in Harbin. Chen Yun is elected chair.
- 8–13 September: Enlarged meeting of the Politburo takes place at Xibaipo to undertake a major review of the previous couple of years and to plan for the future. It predicts a basic victory within five years and calls for a recentralization of control in the party. The center of gravity of party work is to be shifted from the rural areas to the cities.
- 12 September–
2 November: Communist forces engage in the Liao-Shen Campaign. This is Lin Biao’s eighth offensive, and it results in the total defeat of GMD forces in the northeast.
- 6 November–
10 January 1949: Communist forces launch the Huai-Hai Campaign, which opens the route to the Yangtze and beyond.
- 21 November–
31 January 1949: Communist forces launch the Beijing-Tianjin Campaign. Tianjin is taken on 15 January, and on 31 January communist troops enter Beijing.

1949

- 6–8 January: Politburo meets at Xibaipo and predicts that victory will be achieved during 1949 and 1950. The resolution adopted calls for moderation in policy when entering the south, proposing rent and interest reduction rather than land redistribution.
- 14 January: Mao Zedong presents eight conditions for the surrender of the GMD.
- 5–13 March: Second Plenum of the CCP CC convenes in Xibaipo. The Plenum reaffirms the conditions for peace, confirms that the Political

- Consultative Conference should be convened and that a democratic coalition government be formed. The switch of focus of work from the countryside to the cities is confirmed.
- 1 April: Unsuccessful peace talks between the GMD and the CCP begin in Beijing.
- 11–18 April: First Congress of the New Democracy Youth Federation convenes in Beijing.
- 20 April: With the CCP deadline for GMD acceptance of terms past, communist troops advance across the Yangtze.
- 23 April: Communist troops take over Nanjing.
- 27 May: Shanghai falls to communist troops.
- 1 July: Mao Zedong publishes “On the People’s Democratic Dictatorship.”
- 16 July: Association of Sino-Soviet Friendship is established with Guo Moruo as its chair.
- Late July–
31 August: Northeast Bureau of the CCP holds a city work conference and outlines CCP policy for urban work.
- 27 August: Northeast People’s Government is formed with Gao Gang as chair.
- 21–30 September: Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference convenes in Beijing to prepare for the establishment of the PRC and the election of the People’s Government. On 27 September, it adopts the “Organic Law of the Central People’s Government” and the “Organic Law of the People’s Political Consultative Conference.”
- 1 October: PRC is formally founded with Mao Zedong as chair and Liu Shaoqi, Zhu De, Gao Gang (CCP), Song Qingling, Li Jishen, and Zhang Lan (democrats) as vice-chairs. Zhou Enlai is appointed premier of the State Council and minister of foreign affairs.

Introduction

The rise of Chinese communism has shaped the history of China for most of the twentieth century. Almost from the founding of the CCP in 1920 to its seizure of state power in 1949, its struggle with the GMD dominated the domestic stage of Chinese politics. From the founding of the PRC (1949) until the present, the CCP has presided over the world's most populous state. Its ambitious programs to transform these people's lives have affected everyone in staggering and sometimes catastrophic ways. On the international stage, the PRC's international behavior has had a major impact within the communist bloc, on the relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union, and on the balance of power in East Asia.

The CCP's struggle to gain power is a dramatic story of policy disputes and power struggles, intrigue and infighting, tragedy and ultimately triumph. The main outlines of this story have been known for a long time: a first congress in July 1921 inspired by the Bolshevik revolution and guided by a Comintern emissary that sought to find an identity for the fledgling party; a united front with the GMD from 1923 to 1927 that ended in disaster in 1927 when the GMD leader, Chiang Kai-shek, broke decisively with the CCP and slaughtered thousands; the early years in the wilderness when the guerrilla warfare gradually led to the buildup of base areas in south China; the increasingly ferocious campaigns by Chiang Kai-shek to exterminate the "bandits" that led to the evacuation of the central soviet area in October 1934; the epic journey of the Long March, which resulted in a sadly depleted Red Army arriving in northwest China a year later; the emergence of the military strategist Mao Zedong as the CCP's preeminent leader after bitter struggles with his political foes Zhang Guotao and Wang Ming; the formation of a second united front with the GMD to resist Japanese aggression in China in the mid-1930s; the expansion of the CCP during the anti-Japanese war and the creation of a new orthodoxy by Mao Zedong in Yan'an in the late 1930s and early 1940s; the slide from cooperation between the CCP and the GMD to civil war after the Japanese had been defeated; the better organization and discipline of the CCP's troops that led to a surprisingly swift triumph in the Civil War and the flight of the GMD to Taiwan.

Much was clear when A Documentary History of Chinese Communism was published at Harvard four decades ago. Unclear then, however, were the answers to why, how, and even when and where many key events took place, and who had shaped them. With almost the complete documentation now available, the story can be told here through contemporary CCP materials. The documents show how the CCP interpreted the revolution in which it was participating, how it devised policies to meet the changing circumstances, and how these were communicated both to party members and to the public at large. The message was not always the same, not even for party members. How much one was entitled to know or which particular interpretation of an event one was entitled to see depended on party rank.¹

I would like to thank Richard Baum, Michel Hunt, Benjamin Schwartz, Lawrence Sullivan, and C. Martin Wilbur for their comments on an earlier draft of this introduction. In particular, I would like to thank Roderick MacFarquhar and Frederick Teiwes, who both subjected this introduction to a very rigorous reading. These readers' suggestions have enabled me to correct certain faulty ideas, but I am afraid stubbornness has caused me to persist in what may be others.

The details of the Chinese revolution are, of course, unique but there are a number of general features that will be familiar to students of revolutions elsewhere. First, the traditional system in China had ceased to “deliver the goods” for its citizens and crucially for key groups such as the urban elites and intellectuals. Disillusionment set in and the imperial system lost its monopoly over feasible alternatives, allowing disaffected intellectuals to challenge the premises of state power. Second, the communist movement was able to thrive where the bases of power of local elites had been destroyed or lost the capacity to repress alternatives to its rule. There the Communists could establish local military superiority. Third, for the revolutionaries, the organization and organizational ethos were crucial in terms of providing the movement with its direction and purpose. This gave the activists their frame of reference. It enabled them to channel the energies of other social forces when necessary and to overcome the resistance and apathy of the local population.

The chronological introductions in this volume seek to place the documents in their specific historical context. They also reveal the high degree of policy diversity that existed within the CCP. The CCP has never been a monolithic entity despite the desires of some of its leaders and the misconceptions of some Western observers, particularly those writing in the 1950s when the influence of the Cold War was at its height.

In fact, the history of the CCP has been marked by great internal diversity and change. The documents selected reveal this policy diversity in two ways. First, they show the wide range of debate within the party on issues of strategy and tactics. Resolutions adopted were frequently compromises between different factions in the party. While this tendency was clearer in the first two decades, it persisted despite Mao’s consolidation of power in the 1940s. Second, there was a very strong regional dimension to the revolution. Put simply, the issue of strategy and tactics could look quite different depending on whether it was viewed from the top of a barren mountain or from a safe-house in Tianjin.

The First United Front, for example, brought contrasting responses from the underground party apparatus functioning in Shanghai, where the foreign presence dominated, and from the party apparatus working openly in Canton under the patronage of the GMD and free from foreign pressure. The local party organization often provided the focus of loyalty for its members, and the locality was frequently the source of policy initiative. In various base areas, the party had to be extremely flexible, on occasion, just to survive. Party documents frequently complain about this tendency toward localism, and the party devised various institutional arrangements to try to improve accountability to the Center.

The choice of documents is, of course, subjective, and intends to highlight the aspects and issues which the author feels are most important for understanding the rise to power of the CCP. Indeed, revolution itself is a contested concept, and its interpretation depends on one's viewpoint or position of involvement.² Revolution is a mental construct. This is true for participants and observers alike. The symbols used by participants to describe the events taking place depend on whether one wants to create a feeling of solidarity and incitement to action or to form a bond of solidarity to repress what is taking place. Thus, terms such as comrade, counterrevolutionary, and dictatorship of the proletariat summon up different images, depending on from where one views them. Observers and interpreters of revolution are no less affected. Interpretation is influenced by one's own political position as well as by the particular questions in the social sciences which seem most relevant at any specific time.³

The concentration on the CCP inevitably leaves out other important aspects of the revolution in twentieth-century China. Communist success in seizing state power was aided by factors beyond its control, and a major part of the explanation for communist success lies in the failure of the alternatives. For example, the GMD's neotraditional response failed to come to terms with China's situation. While the Japanese invasion may have sounded the death-knell for the GMD, the work of Lloyd Eastman and others has shown that even without this it would have been difficult for the GMD to have constructed a credible institutional framework to govern China.⁴

Two issues on which the documents shed light on must be briefly discussed: the role of the Comintern and the role of the CCP's military. Then, three broader issues that the documents touch on implicitly will be reviewed: the emergence of the CCP, the relationship between the CCP and social forces in China, and the development of the CCP as an organization and its ideology.

The Role of the Comintern

During the 1950s, the assumption that the CCP was under the tutelage of Moscow led to attempts to see Comintern influence on the CCP in earlier phases of the revolution. It was not difficult to find.⁵ Indeed, some scholars saw the destruction of the First United Front in China as tantamount to a failure of Soviet policy or even more particularly of Stalin himself.⁶ The work of Benjamin Schwartz stands out as an exception. While he acknowledged the debt owed by the Chinese Communists to Bolshevik theory and organization, he was aware of traditional Chinese influences and the "originality" of Mao Zedong and his supporters, which was of increasing importance after 1927.⁷ The indigenous elements that had gone into Chinese communism became major objects for retrieval, particularly after the Sino-Soviet rupture became apparent in the early 1960s. Some researchers began to explore the "sinification of Marxism" and to stress that much had happened in spite of Comintern interference rather than because of it.⁸

We can see now that there was continual tension between the CCP and the Comintern resulting from China's perceived position in the world revolution and Moscow's perception of Soviet geopolitical interest. Comintern influence was of major importance in the party's founding and development, but its authority was not always accepted or decisive in all periods.⁹ Yet it was a voice that could not be ignored, and until 1938, when the Comintern could articulate its message clearly and get it through the communication network to the CCP leadership, it had a reasonably decisive say.

Comintern agents in China enjoyed high prestige but had to find Chinese through whom they could transmit their orders and the Comintern's strategic and tactical visions. At best, they were always one step removed from the realities they were trying to influence and interpret.¹⁰ Even Chen Duxiu, who supported Maring's view of the need for cooperation with the GMD at the CCP's Third Congress (Doc. A.19), had originally rejected Maring's ideas (Doc. A.9). In fact, it was only after Maring appealed to Comintern discipline that he was able to bring Chen and other key CCP leaders briefly to his side. Conversely, Comintern agents relied on the Chinese leaders for their information about the local situation. Thus, Maring depended on Liao Zhongkai for information about the GMD and about cooperation with the CCP. Liao was on the left of the GMD and a strong supporter of such cooperation, perhaps leading Maring to adopt a positive assessment while underestimating opposition within the GMD.

Some previous analyses viewed Mao Zedong's rise to power within the CCP as occurring in spite of the Comintern, but it now appears that the Comintern was at least willing to acquiesce in Mao's rise and his victories over Zhang Guotao and Wang Ming (Moscow's own trainee). In both confrontations, the actions and words of the Comintern tended to favor Mao over his opponents.¹¹ Whether the Comintern clearly perceived what was at stake is another matter. Further, on a number of occasions the Comintern called for the CCP not to ape Soviet experience, but to develop its own policy, and the Comintern's Seventh Congress (1935) accepted that individual parties should have more freedom. Whether the Comintern approved of what was finally developed in China is a different question. Thus, the Comintern was not anti-Mao; nor was Mao inevitably opposed to the Comintern.¹²

The Role of the Military

Throughout the twentieth century, military strength has been a key factor in Chinese politics. The primary agent of CCP control of its base areas before 1949 and its seizure of state power was the military. Yet the CCP's Red Army was clearly different from previous warlord armies that had tried to rule China. By the early 1940s, it was a well-disciplined, multifunctional organization that submitted to party rule. This is not to say, however, that there were no tensions in the relationship.

Mao's initial breakthrough to the top leadership came at the Zunyi Conference (January 1935) with his criticism of the military tactics that had been used to defend the Central Soviet from GMD encirclement. Mao was identified with a correct military strategy that gained him the trust of most military leaders and, as his strategy proved successful, increasingly with other party leaders. The military commanders were Mao's staunchest supporters and were the first to praise Mao and his thought within the party. As Raymond Wylie has pointed out, it was military figures who rallied first to Mao's support after the Sixth Plenum of the Sixth CC (September–November 1938) and again in 1942 when they began publicly to praise Mao and his thought. This was one full year before such praise became common among party leaders.¹³ Also, the first collected works of Mao Zedong was published on the order of the military leader of the Jin-Cha-Ji Base Area, Nie Rongzhen.¹⁴

Similarly, Mao held the army in high esteem, seeing in it the virtues of plain living and selfless devotion to the cause, which he felt were often lacking in the party. In times of stress, Mao would turn to the army for support such as during the Cultural Revolution in the 1960s, when he sought to purify the ranks of the party and the state. He felt that under the leadership of Minister of Defense Lin Biao, it embodied the "true spirit" of the revolution. Earlier, at the Lushan meeting in 1959 when Mao came under attack for his mishandling of the Great Leap Forward, he threatened to retreat again into the countryside and lead the peasants to overthrow the government, even founding a new Red Army if necessary.¹⁵

This positive view of the army in the PRC has been widely held. Individual soldiers or units have frequently been promoted as models for emulation because of their embodiment of the communist spirit. The best example of this is Lei Feng, the soldier who was put forward in the early 1960s during the PLA campaigns to study the thought of Mao, again after the fall of the "Gang of Four" in 1976–77, and finally for young people to learn from after the party had called in the PLA to crush the student-led demonstrations in 1989. In the latter two cases the party wanted to restore its battered prestige and impress on the young that they should unthinkingly obey the party.

However, the close relationship between Mao and the military did not mean that the party was a military party.¹⁶ Mao was faithful to his dictum that "the party controls the gun." At the Seventh Party Congress (1945), despite Mao's close ties to the military and its previous importance for him, military representation in central party organs was not increased significantly. In the thirteen-person Politburo, for example, only Zhu De and Peng Dehuai could be classified as professional soldiers, and both had been figures of standing for a long time. However, the input of professional soldiers into military decision making did increase after the Congress and during the Civil War, when the military became crucial to the party's success. As Frederick Teiwes has remarked, there began a subtle long-term process which saw "increased military representation on authoritative policy-making bodies, greater professional military independence concerning military affairs, and the narrowing of civilian control to personal control by the Chairman."¹⁷

The PLA has never acted as a homogeneous group in the Chinese political system pursuing military interests against those of other apparats. On the whole, it has remained under party control or, more correctly, under that of the supreme leader, first Mao Zedong and later Deng Xiaoping. Thus, the cases of Peng Dehuai and Lin Biao, who were dismissed in 1959 and 1971, respectively, had more to do with political differences in the broad sense rather than the promotion of a narrow military interest.¹⁸ As with Mao, the military has provided Deng Xiaoping with a solid bedrock of support since his assumption of power in the late 1970s. For example, in 1989, despite obvious tensions, the military accepted Deng Xiaoping's tough line against the student-led protests.¹⁹

Party control of the military was backed up by a system of political commissars based on the pattern developed by the Red Army in Soviet Russia. The distinction of the military from other organizations before 1949 was blurred because leaders were often interchangeable. This overlap of personnel has continued since 1949, with many leaders concurrently holding party and military positions. This has contributed to the institutional overlap and lack of clear demarcation between different organizations that has been a major feature of PRC administrative life.

Finally, the military nature of the Chinese revolution has deeply affected the language of the CCP. While Marxism, especially in its Leninist form, is punctuated by the language of struggle, particularly that of class, the terminology of the CCP is one of war: war on class enemies or the struggle to achieve production targets or the battle to overcome nature. This language combined with the mobilization campaigns that accompanied policy initiatives or denunciations of enemies explains, in part, the severe nature of post-1949 Chinese politics.

The Emergence of the CCP

The story of the CCP's rise to power forms part of the much larger process of Chinese modernization. Crucial to the latter was the search for a suitable state structure to facilitate the pursuit of wealth and power and to enable China to assume "its rightful position" in the international arena. In the nineteenth century, the combination of internal degeneration and external pressure caused the imperial system to collapse. The institutions and belief system that had sustained successive dynasties were unable to meet China's contemporary needs. As the system rotted from within and was squeezed from without, some Chinese began to look for alternatives to guide future development. Their quest for new state and societal forms took on a number of guises. While the Taiping Rebellion (1850–64) was not a "modern" revolutionary movement, it came about partially as a consequence of Western economic and intellectual intervention. Joseph Levenson has shown that the rebellion presented a fundamental challenge to the intellectual orthodoxy of Confucian China, and he has described how it adopted elements foreign to the traditional order of peasant rebellions, many of which foreshadowed the intellectual revolution of the twentieth century.²⁰ The "rebellion" convinced some of the necessity for reform within the system. Others began to see the imperial system itself as the root cause of China's difficulties.

Initial reforms in the mid-nineteenth century consisted of a mechanical borrowing of certain features of Western "progress," particularly military ones, and were not intended to introduce new cultural values or systems of thought. This approach was best summed up in the phrase of the reformer Zhang Zhidong, "Chinese learning for the fundamental principles, Western learning for the practical application" (Zhongxue wei ti, xixue wei yong). The policy of selective adaptation proved short-sighted. Its supporters did not comprehend the interrelated nature of Western societies and failed to see that their technology could not easily be disentangled from the social and cultural matrix in which it was embedded.²¹

A second reaction was to fall back on China's xenophobic traditions and try to shut out the foreigners altogether, including their technology. At its most extreme, this view led to violent attacks on the foreign presence in China as witnessed in the Boxer Movement (1899–1900) with its slogan of "wipe out the foreigners."²²

The third reaction was to see China's tradition, with the emperor supported by Confucian principles reinforcing a system of hierarchical subordination, as the core of China's crisis. This caused certain groups to question the validity of China's tradition and even to propose all-out Westernization as a solution. The defeat of China in the Sino-Japanese War (1894–95) caused, according to Benjamin Schwartz, "an almost traumatic change in the climate of literati opinion."²³ A moderate response to this situation was to modernize within the existing imperial structure as witnessed by the Hundred Days' Reform (11 June–21 September 1898). However, some intellectuals became profoundly disillusioned with their heritage and sought solutions outside China. In their search, these Chinese went to Japan, Europe, the United States, and, later, Soviet Russia for the ideas that might save the Chinese nation.

The collapse of the dynastic system in 1911 sharply focused on the issues of what kind of government system would replace the old imperial bureaucracy and what kind of authority relationships there would be. The crumbling of Confucianism left a gap in the intellectual sphere which Chinese intellectuals used other thought systems to fill. The period of intellectual ferment and discussion that followed was called the May Fourth Movement (1915–19).²⁴ The movement embraced a wide-ranging cultural and nationalistic renaissance and opened up a Pandora's box of solutions to China's problems. However, the movement did not offer an answer to the crucial question of political power. Pragmatic liberalism, anarchism, and the various forms of socialist thought that were popular in these years did not seem to offer the quick, total solution to China's problems that many saw as necessary. Intellectuals like Hu Shi, the liberal reformer who proposed reform by "inches and drops," seemed increasingly irrelevant.

A new factor emerged with the 1917 Bolshevik revolution which demonstrated the possibilities for radical change within the context of underdevelopment. To men like Chen Duxiu and Li Dazhao, a Bolshevik-style party appeared to offer a strong organization committed to a radical break with the past, which could guide and coordinate change. However “sinified” Marxism-Leninism may have later become under Mao Zedong, it must be remembered that it was introduced into China by a generation of intellectuals who were profoundly disenchanted with their intellectual heritage and who sought China’s salvation in a foreign ideology. Marxism in its Leninist form seemed to provide an explanation for China’s humiliation that transcended the immediate situation and linked China’s domestic troubles to the international order. Domestically, the label of feudalism was used to describe the former imperial system and the subsequent degeneration of China into warlordism under which landlords exploited the peasantry. The concept of imperialism was used to explain the foreign enclaves and the collapse of native industry under pressure from the foreign powers. China’s national humiliation was linked to international forces, and thus, logically, its salvation was linked to the greater cause of working-class liberation from the shackles of capitalism. The choice of a Bolshevik form of organization represented an implicit acceptance that a basic political transformation was a prerequisite for any effective solution to the social problems confronting China. Yet, it also opened the door to future problems which the founding generation could not foresee. The choice of a party organized on the principle of democratic centralism may have offered the hope of rapid, coordinated action, but it also created a tension between authoritarian organization and the antidespotic, iconoclastic thrust of the May Fourth Movement.

Leninism seemed to offer an organizational ideology that was antithetical to a leader-centered traditional political culture. Yet, the concentration of power also inherent in the Bolshevik-style party created a tension between collective responsibility and individual power. This tension came to the fore briefly in the late 1920s under Li Lisan and more dramatically in Yan’an as Mao Zedong achieved an exalted status.²⁵ The humiliation of the writer Wang Shiwei and the Rectification Campaign launched in Yan’an (1941–44) marked the triumph of the party apparatus and its apparatchiks over the few cosmopolitan intellectuals who had managed to survive in the party since the days of the May Fourth Movement (Docs. G.10, G.16, G.17, G.18, and G.19). Finally, as Arif Dirlik has perceptively argued, the adoption of a Bolshevik organization put an end to the discussion of Marxism within the CCP. The “clichés of Bolshevism substituted for independent analysis,” and the organization itself and its principles substituted for theoretical analysis.²⁶

The CCP and Its Constituencies of Support

In the 1960s and 1970s, academics debated whether the Communists won because they responded as nationalists to the Japanese invasion, or because they proved capable of mobilizing the population through sound socioeconomic policies or, inevitably, some vaguely defined combination of the two. Chalmers Johnson provided the most cogent argument that essentially the Communists used the Japanese invasion to portray the CCP as a patriotic party.²⁷ Lucien Bianco offered a more complex explanation that combined the national thesis with a stress on the socio-economic program of the Communists. He wrote, "it was the national problem, not the social problem, that acted as a catalyst" but added the important rider that "at the very heart of the decisive 'national' stage of the revolution lay the social problem."²⁸ By contrast, Mark Selden maintained that it was the Communists' program for socioeconomic transformation, as implemented in the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region, that had paved the way for their ultimate success.²⁹ Tetsuya Kataoka was almost alone in arguing that it was the CCP's organizational control that led to its victory.³⁰ Later, Shum Kui-kwong stressed the importance of the Second United Front for neutralizing the hostility of local elites and wooing the "intermediate classes" over to the CCP's side. Shum viewed this component of the equation as equally important to CCP success as peasant support.³¹

More recent research and newly available sources present an infinitely more complex picture of the party's policies and its relationship to different social forces in the Chinese countryside.³²

Perhaps the most striking thing about the documents and recent studies is that they reveal the extent to which the CCP had difficulty in mobilizing support within society. Establishing effective contact with both the workers and the peasantry proved to be a problem. In fact, mobilization was so acutely difficult on occasions that the question seems not to be why were the Communists so successful, but rather how did they ever manage to gain state power against such considerable odds.³³ The CCP was successful in putting down local roots where it showed flexibility in adapting policy to local circumstances, where initially it was good at micropolitics. By contrast, attempts to transform local environments to conform with predetermined ideological predispositions were unsuccessful. Thus, to succeed, local party leaders were forced to compromise on party principles and were left open to attacks by the Party Center or its commissioners for "crimes" such as "corruption," "tailism," "right opportunism," and pursuing "superstitious practices."³⁴

The Party and the Working Class

The founders of the CCP adopted the sectarian stance of basing their revolutionary strategy on the working class. The prime objective was to organize the working class and promote a social revolution through the use of the strike weapon (Docs. A.1 and A.3). The focus on labor organization was aided by the presence of the Comintern representative, Maring, who had begun his revolutionary career in the Dutch labor movement. Maring, however, was opposed to the initial decision to shun other classes and to adopt an attitude toward them of "independence, aggression, and hostility" (Docs. A.8 and A.20). This exclusionism was shown to be ineffective with the defeat of the Beijing-Hankou Railway Workers' Strike in February 1923. Defeat revealed to party members the inability of the working class to conduct the revolution by itself. The blow was all the harder because it was the railway workers who had been most receptive to CCP ideas, as compared with the two other elements of the traditional revolutionary “holy trinity,” the miners and the sailors (Docs. A.7 and A.16).

Despite the CCP’s grudging acceptance of cooperation with other classes, pride of place in the revolutionary struggle still remained with the working class. Yet, the party in Shanghai, Beijing, and other major industrial centers had great difficulty in penetrating the proletariat (see, for example, Doc. A.5).³⁵ Partly, this was owing to the fact that early party members were few in number and were almost exclusively intellectuals with little or no practical experience in organization and little genuine understanding of the social conditions of the nascent working class. In Beijing, some headway was made through the use of workers’ schools, and although education was used as “agitprop,” for instance to promote the idea of the eight-hour workday, party activists were wary of declaring themselves to be Communists.³⁶

The shortage of party members was especially a problem in China’s main industrial center, Shanghai (see Doc. B.4). Work in Shanghai was further hampered by the foreign presence. In addition, the Communists had to compete with other organizations that had already established a presence among the working class. In Shanghai, communist access was frequently blocked by the Green and Red Gangs and even by the YMCA, while in Canton the GMD and the anarchists enjoyed greater popularity and influence.³⁷ This caused party leader Chen Duxiu frequently to bemoan the situation with respect to labor work in Shanghai (see, for example, Docs. A.19 and A.28). In May 1924, the Shanghai party committee summed up the results to date in labor organization as “nil” (Doc. B.4).

The outbreak of the May 30 Movement (1925) and the start of the Northern Expedition (1926) appeared to change this situation and enable the CCP to break out of its relative isolation (Doc. B.10).³⁸ Party membership expanded rapidly from just under 1,000 in January 1924 to 3,000 by October 1925 and then by leaps and bounds to around 58,000 at the time of the Fifth Party Congress (April 1927). However, these figures conceal problems. The party was still short of skilled personnel to organize on the ground and to develop extensive grass-roots support. Many of the new recruits, because of the reduced membership requirements, were not conversant with party norms.

As a result of its lack of labor power at the grass roots, the party attempted to gain control of the movement generated by nationalist sentiment from the top down. Thus, the CCP set up the Shanghai General Labor Union at the start of the May 30 Movement, but this had to be closed down in mid-September 1925 partly because of a lack of revolutionary momentum and partly because of attacks on it by various groups in Shanghai. Indeed, Chen Duxiu was later to admit that, despite the rhetoric, the movement in Shanghai had really been coordinated by the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce and genuine communist influence seems to have been slight. This opportunism was combined with attempts to take over leading positions in existing organizations rather than building up solid grass-roots support.³⁹ those in Shanghai, into a false sense of security. A CCP-led revolution on the back of a swelling nationalist, anti-imperialist revolution seemed to be a possibility. Thus, in May 1926, Chen Duxiu was moved to claim that 1.25 million workers were under CCP leadership. This claim was based on a head-count of members in organizations whose representatives had attended the Third Labor Congress. However, the CCP had constructed no colossus but rather a Buddha that turned out to have feet of clay. As the strength of the movement ebbed, familiar problems resurfaced with labor work in Shanghai: the persistence of the guild tradition and the influence of the Green and Red Gangs (see, for example, Doc. B.19).

In the 1920s, the CCP did not develop the necessary support base in urban China; nor, as is argued below, was it able to build up solid support in the southern countryside. Once the military power of the GMD was turned on the CCP, it had very little with which to defend itself. Given the short history of the CCP and its small size, it was most unlikely that a sufficient base of support could have been developed. Building up an independent armed force was also out of the question, not only because of the lack of numbers and financial resources, but also because it would have inevitably speeded up the clash with the GMD, especially the powerful GMD right.

In this sense, the failure of the First Revolution was not caused directly by either rigid implementation of a misguided Comintern policy or the “capitulationism” and “opportunism” of Chen Duxiu vis-à-vis the GMD.⁴⁰ It was more closely related to the CCP’s inability to develop genuine support in urban and rural China⁴¹ and to develop a military force with which to defend itself.⁴² The CCP tended to follow behind events in China, interpreting positive signs as the next revolutionary wave that would cause history to flow in the right direction. When the waves came, the party was unable to channel the flow to its own benefit.

Yet, the period was not entirely without benefit to the CCP. Cooperation with the GMD had allowed the CCP to develop its organization on a much wider scale, especially in the south, than would otherwise have been the case. Further, it had been a valuable learning experience for the CCP. With expanded membership, it had begun to pay serious attention to its organizational structure. Despite all the problems, it had gained some influence in the southern labor movements, and more particularly the southern peasant movements, and had trained a body of cadres. It had no army of its own, but the CCP did have a number of military officers who had been trained in the Whampoa Military Academy. These officers would play an important role in the subsequent phase of the revolution. The vulnerability of the CCP to the GMD’s armed force was made more apparent when the Red Army was driven out of the Jiangxi Soviet. These two experiences deeply affected Mao Zedong and caused him to try to hold the Second United Front together for as long as possible during the 1940s.

The CCP only gave up its focus on the working class as the primary agent of revolutionary change when forced to do so by the prevailing circumstances. The failure of legal communism in 1927, and the further disasters wrought by first Li Lisan's and then Qu Qiubai's insurrectionist policies (Docs. C.18 and C.19, respectively), caused the CCP to lose effective contact with the major urban centers of Shanghai, Wuhan, and Canton.⁴³ This marked a break in substantial contact between the CCP and the working class for the next twenty-two years. However, the ideology of the CCP never ceased to stress working-class leadership over the peasantry. In the absence of the working class this meant the rule of its "vanguard," the party. As soon as conditions permitted, the party again reasserted the primacy of urban work over that in the countryside. In April 1944, Mao Zedong called for work in urban areas to be stepped up, and on 5 June the CC passed a resolution that highlighted this renewed emphasis (Doc. G.24).

It was circumstance which forced leaders such as Mao Zedong, Zhu De, and Zhang Guotao to retreat to the barren mountainous areas where they could put together a successful new strategy. They clearly recognized that the road to power in China had to pass through the countryside.

The CCP in the Countryside

The centrality of the discontented peasant affected practical revolutionaries and also social science observers. Revolutionary leaders such as Che Guevara saw rural bases and the mobilization of the peasantry as the way to seize state power. This revolutionary practice derived its origins from the experience of the Chinese revolution, but these perceptions related to a mythic form of the Chinese revolution rather than to its reality.

Since the 1960s, social science literature has placed strong emphasis on the central role played by the peasantry in the revolutionary process. The centrality of the peasant question dominated the work of social scientists such as Eric Wolf, Joel Migdal, and Theda Skocpol.⁴⁴ With respect to China, the most enthusiastic supporter of the peasants' central role in the revolution is to be found in the work of Ralph Thaxton. Thaxton takes James Scott's notion of the "moral economy of the peasant" as his point of departure. Scott's research on southeast Asia shows that the peasantry could actually influence the historical process to create a state form incorporating their communalist and egalitarian traditions.⁴⁵ Using these premises, Thaxton argues that the peasantry could conduct revolution without the insertion of outside organizers and that when the CCP came, it accommodated the "counter-values" of the peasantry and, in combination, they were able to overthrow the traditional local elite.⁴⁶

The CCP encountered great difficulties in finding a ready support base in the countryside. It proved to be no easier than in the urban areas. Most recent research on the CCP in the rural base areas indicates that it was not only difficult to mobilize the peasantry, but that, once mobilized, it was difficult both to maintain the momentum and to keep it under control. Indeed, Lucien Bianco has written that the CCP was in the difficult position of trying to initiate a peasant movement without peasants.⁴⁷

While as early as November 1922 Chen Duxiu had recognized the importance of the peasant question in China (Doc. A.18) the issue was not extensively addressed until the CCP's Fourth Congress in January 1925. Even so, the resolution adopted did not amount to a plan of action (Doc. B.8). In the more radical post-May 30 atmosphere, the CCP adopted a radical program of land confiscation, although it was swiftly reined in when perceived "peasant excesses" during the Northern Expedition were deemed to be threatening cooperation with the GMD. Mao Zedong took exception to this viewpoint and was greatly impressed with the power of the peasantry, as he depicted in his report of March 1927 (Doc. B.20). At the time of his report, however, Mao had not yet combined the notion of peasant power with military organization.

The main developments in the peasant movement were all in the south in Hubei, Hunan, Guangdong, and Jiangxi. As the Northern Expedition moved out from the GMD strongholds in the south, large rural areas came under joint GMD-CCP control. Here peasant associations were established, often under the leadership of professionally trained peasant organizers. CCP supporters ran many of the associations, and the party leadership saw this as a way to gain control over the peasant movement. However, as in urban China, the CCP lacked sufficient local cadres. A July 1926 report on the peasant movement in Guangdong outlined the problem. While some 800,000 peasants were members of peasant associations in 60 counties, there were only 600 party members working in 20 counties (Doc. B.18). Thus, the party had weak links to many local communities. The CCP adopted the same head-counting, top-down approach to controlling the peasantry as they had used with respect to the working class in urban China. Thus, at the CCP's Fifth Congress, Chen Duxiu spoke of almost 10 million peasants being organized in the countryside via the peasant associations and seemed to count this as being synonymous with CCP control (Doc. B.25).

Yet, the communist presence was kept in place only by GMD military power. Once attacked by the GMD, CCP members had very little alternative but to retreat into more inhospitable rural areas. While CCP policy vis-à-vis the peasantry was radicalized in the wake of its defeat (Doc. C.1), the policy of rural-led uprisings to help recapture the urban centers weakened the CCP even further.⁴⁸ However, these failed uprisings did leave the CCP with the basis for the Red Army.

The sine qua non for CCP success was sustained control over a particular locality on the basis of military force. This provided the party with the time and space to devise policies relevant to the particular region. Moreover, a continuous CCP presence backed by armed force caused the local elite either to cooperate or acquiesce in CCP rule. For the peasantry, it offered a continuity of rule to which they could respond. Simple military control and rule through repression, however, would have rendered the CCP indistinguishable from the warlords of whom they had been so critical. As a result, the CCP found itself faced with devising policies to suit localities without compromising its general principles, while simultaneously avoiding driving potentially hostile groups into outright opposition.

The lack of alternatives for the local elites was vital. Thus, the CCP survived in those areas where it could gain a local military superiority over the GMD as in the base areas around Wuhan from 1928 to 1934⁴⁹ or where the invading Japanese forces had driven out the GMD as happened in north and northeast China from 1937 onward. Steven Levine has shown how the Japanese invasion destroyed the local elite in the northeast, thus making communist penetration much easier.⁵⁰ The Communists thus established themselves as a new “state authority” primarily by means of military conquest.⁵¹

Contrary to conventional wisdom, in the period after 1937 the rural elite was more readily attracted to the CCP program of resistance than was the local peasantry.⁵² Indeed, the threat posed by the Japanese forces bonded the CCP and the local elite together in an uneasy marriage of convenience. Further positive support in this period came from rural students and teachers.⁵³ In July 1927, when the CCP fully recognized the important role of the peasantry, it also pointed out the respect that school teachers enjoyed in local communities. As a result, the party called for the election of primary school teachers to the area executive committees of peasant associations (Doc. C.1). This was in marked contrast to the disdain with which such groups were viewed by the party when it tried to organize urban China during the early 1920s.

Kathleen Hartford has shown how in the Jin-Cha-Ji (Shanxi-Chahar-Hebei) Base Area the CCP devised policy programs that sought to neutralize the threat from the local elite by co-opting them into the power structure and appearing to give them a place in the new political structure. The term she uses to describe this process is “power management.”⁵⁴ “Power management” was one of Peng Zhen’s main themes in his September 1941 report to the Politburo (Doc. G.5). Peng outlined local CCP policy for ensuring that the old power structure could be broken up without alienating the powerful traditional elite. Policy moderation formed one aspect, while the administrative solution was the “three-thirds” system of government that guaranteed the local elite one-third of governmental positions. Peng was at pains to point out that this approach needed a strengthening of the party apparatus at the village level to ensure that the local elite was not able to dominate the political process.

This co-optation of the local elite was accompanied by attempts to gain the support of the local peasantry for the CCP’s program of social reform. In this process, the CCP attempted to define political and economic relationships in the villages in terms of classification by class rather than by the traditional forms of patronage and familial relationships. The introduction of class as the defining characteristic in village life was new. However, many of the documents in the collection clearly reveal the continual problem that the CCP had in defining classes in the countryside precisely and working out a policy for land redistribution or interest and rent-reduction based on these suppositions.

Both in the early 1930s and in the period from 1937 onward, the party faced the problem of, first, winning acceptance by the local peasantry, second, getting them mobilized for practical support, and then, finally, once mobilized trying to keep them under control. The politics of mobilization was complicated in the post-1937 period not only by the problems arising from the use of class labels but, more particularly, by the need not to alienate the local elite, a need partly created and defined by the Japanese invasion.

The attempts at accommodation with the local elites were reinforced by the earlier experiences with radical policy in the Jiangxi Soviet. There, radicalization had alienated groups such as the middle and rich peasants who were crucial to CCP survival. The CCP had decided that land redistribution was imperative for ensuring peasant support in their resistance to the GMD, but changes in landownership based on strict class definitions caused unforeseen economic and social problems that in turn led to further readjustment. Thus, the Soviet Land Law adopted in November 1931 (Doc. D.8) contained prescriptions more liberal than previous policy and did not mention land nationalization and collectivization. It represented a deliberate attempt to woo back the alienated “middle classes.” Later, between June and September 1933, many “middle peasants” were reclassified as “landlords,” with serious consequences for them. This reradicalization of policy began with the investigation movement that was again intended to ensure peasant support in the conflict with the GMD (Doc. D.15). Between October and December, the new “landlords” were demoted to the ranks of “middle peasants.” Finally, in early 1934, policy was radicalized once again with attacks on the “rich peasants.” This merry-go-round was halted only with the expulsion of the communist forces from their base area. The CCP did learn from this experience; as Shum Kui-kwong has noted, “No matter how successful the land revolution was in generating support within their base areas, their strength derived from the lower masses was no match for the reactionary order.”⁵⁵ Yet, the learning process was not complete, as the party never lost its inclination to radicalize policy once it felt securely embedded in an area.

Despite CCP emphasis on the support of the poor peasantry, this support was never firm, and when the rural dispossessed did act, they tended to take matters into their own hands, often producing a radicalization that went beyond party wishes. This occurred not only in Jiangxi but also in the Civil War period, 1945–49. The need to keep up with peasant voluntarism, combined with the desire to mobilize the poor peasantry against the GMD, lay behind the radical turn in land policy that began in May 1946 (Doc. H.14). “Land to the tillers” replaced the more moderate approach of rent and interest reduction.⁵⁶ Equal distribution of land became party policy (Docs. H.16 and H.17), leading to a radical upsurge that threatened to undermine the party’s position in relationship to the middle peasantry as well as the local elites. Having mobilized the poor peasantry to support the CCP against the GMD in the Civil War, the CCP became afraid that social dislocation would undermine the war effort. In particular, the middle peasantry in recently liberated areas were being classified as rich peasants and being deprived of property (Doc. H.18). As a result, in late 1947 and early 1948, land reform was slowed down.⁵⁷

Invariably, the initial support for the CCP came from displaced rural elements such as students, rural school teachers, and roving groups of bandits. According to Pauline Keating's research on two counties in the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region, it was those who had lost farms after defaulting on tax or loan payments who joined the CCP fighting groups. She notes that it was the widespread anger against the local authorities for taxation that had enabled the communist partisans to set up two soviet governments in northwest China in the early 1930s.⁵⁸

This reliance on middle peasant and elite support forced the CCP to make many policy compromises. Thus, when He Long's Third Army arrived in north Guizhou in January 1934, it dropped its revolutionary propaganda in order to appeal to the local peasantry. To try to seek an identity of interests with the "celestial soldiers," it claimed that the latter's attacks on exorbitant taxes and levies could be interpreted as a form of primitive revolutionary struggle (Docs. D.11 and D.12).

As Bianco contends, the economic policy pursued by the CCP did not ensure the party automatic peasant support.⁵⁹ It was always conditional. Hartford's study of the Jin-Cha-Ji Border Region shows that widespread and deep-seated peasant support was not necessary to produce CCP success. One can take this argument one step further to suggest that what was necessary for the CCP was not so much large-scale positive support, but that key and potentially hostile groups should acquiesce in party control. The CCP was assisted by the lack of any viable alternatives. Traditional power structures had broken down with the Japanese invasion, and the GMD appeared morally bankrupt and economically incompetent.

Organization and Ideology

Given rapidly changing circumstances and policy lines, it is not surprising that party organization was much more fluid than theory would have indicated. The notion of a modern mass political party run by activists was alien to the Chinese political culture, and a major process of adjustment and adaptation was necessary before the CCP became embedded in a local polity. Yet, CCP leaders intended that commitment to an overall organizational unity should link together the different locales within which the CCP had to work and provide a loyalty transcending that to particular individuals or regions. Commitment to the organization was strengthened by adherence to the ideology that gave a common purpose to action and linked it to "supranational" and "supernatural" forces that operated beyond the party itself.

For the activists who worked in the CCP, more than simple acquiescence was required, and commitment was provided by organization and ideology. The organization could transform all these disparate local experiences into a national goal; its ideology could give the experiment a greater importance and dignity for participants than mere survival. The presence of a resilient, disciplined revolutionary organization performed the crucial function of retaining the loyalty of the activists who might have otherwise deserted the cause.

Early Debates on the Nature of the Party

Before notions of organizational discipline could readily be accepted by the majority of members, however, there had to be a consensus about what kind of a party it should be and what its function was. Acceptance of a modern political party as a suitable form of organization could fill the vacuum left by the collapse of the Confucian bureaucracy. It was expected to provide an institutional form that transcended the personal authority of an individual leader⁶⁰ and a rational hierarchical structure that would facilitate decision making and policy implementation. The introduction of such a party form was not easy, and from the beginning a number of problems emerged that have persisted in varying degrees throughout the party's existence. Here two problems will be considered.

First, there has been the continual tension between loyalty to the organization itself and to the supreme leader. Many of the CCP's early leaders were attracted to the Bolshevik form of organization because they felt that it would challenge what they saw as a traditional Chinese political culture that stressed obedience to the powerful individual leader.⁶¹ This view simplified the past, as the traditional system culminated in an institution centered on an individual, the "emperorship," and previous Chinese rulers had been aware of the role played by "abstract" institutions. In their search for organization, these early CCP leaders missed the fact that while, in theory, Bolshevik organization would transcend the individual, from the outset it was inseparable from the role of Lenin. Later, this tendency toward the domination of the organization by the supreme leader became more apparent under Stalin.

In addition, Bolshevik organization seemed to offer an alternative to the rule of individual warlords or the GMD, which, from its reorganization in the early 1920s, combined Leninist organization with leader worship. Sun Yat-sen was a supreme leader, a function subsequently taken over by Chiang Kai-shek. In the CCP, the reemergence of this tradition took longer and came with the assumption of supreme power by Mao Zedong in Yan'an in the 1940s. There were antecedents in the CCP, especially under Li Lisan's brief leadership. Chinese communist historians have blamed Chen Duxiu for authoritarianism and, after Chen's removal from power, Lominadze, the Comintern representative, denounced the "patriarchal" style of leadership in the party. He called for its replacement by the "collective model" of leadership (Doc. C.3). While his personality may have displayed this tendency, Chen does not appear to have sought total power, not even in the last years of his leadership. Debate remained very wide-ranging, and the question of collective control over the individual received consistent attention in party documents.

Second, there was the tension in lines of authority between the Party Center and the regional apparatus and noncentral party organs. While much of the Leninist party apparatus was theoretically in place by 1922, it did not always dominate life for party members. The problem was particularly acute in the early phase of party formation, but it persisted in varying degrees throughout the period under consideration. The regional autonomy that was inherent in the origins of the party exerted its influence for a long time.⁶² Cells or local parties often owed their origins more to the local environment than to being a product of Comintern machinations or the influence of Li Dazhao and Chen Duxiu. One example is the tension evident throughout the 1920s in the policy disputes between the nominal Party Center in Shanghai and the party organization in Canton.⁶³

The documents reveal the variety of views in the early debates about just what kind of a party it should be. The first party document of November 1920 had outlined the structure of a highly orthodox Bolshevik party, and the organizational outlines drawn up at the First and Second Party Congresses provided a detailed Bolshevik organizational structure (Docs. A.1, A.3, and A.12, respectively). However, this structure was not readily acceptable to all members and began to assume a reality only as the party expanded rapidly as a result of the May 30 Movement (1925). Among the first party members, anarchist influences were strong as were ideas of guild socialism (Docs. A.5 and A.6). Indeed, seven of the nine original members in the CP group in Canton were anarchists. Such members had to be purged from the organization, and the notion of the party as the focus of loyalty had to be substituted for the personal loyalty ties that dominated a number of the early party groups. The party's founding congress became the forum for debating these different views (see Doc. A.2 for an official summary of these debates).

Founders such as Li Hanjun and Zhou Fuhai argued for the review of alternatives and placed stress on the need for a lengthy period of education. Li was opposed at this stage to direct involvement in the workers' movement.⁶⁴ Li felt that the working class was unprepared and had an inadequate understanding of Marxism. For him, the first task was to undertake a lengthy period of educational and propaganda work, organizing Marxist universities, publishing journals and pamphlets. Intellectuals were to be armed with Marxism and then workers were to be organized and educated to raise their class consciousness. While this was in progress, study could be done of the comparative values of Russian Bolshevism and German Social Democracy before deciding on which form was most suitable to China's needs. As a result of this trend of thinking, Li Hanjun was opposed to the creation of a tightly organized party based on the proletariat with the objective of establishing its dictatorship. While recognizing the need for some form of organization to conduct party work, he did not see it as vitally important. He preferred a more loosely based party that would also recruit students, intellectuals, and anyone who believed in Marxism and was willing to propagate it.

A tougher, highly orthodox line was argued by other founders such as Liu Renjing and Zhang Guotao. They favored the promotion of the dictatorship of the proletariat as the immediate objective. They objected to joining the bourgeois democratic revolution and placed their faith in the power of the nascent working class and its organization under the leadership of the CCP. Finally, somewhat ironically, they were against recruitment of intellectuals into the party. It was this latter view that was reflected in the documents of the First Party Congress (Docs. A.2, A.3, and A.4).

A number of factors combined to instill the notion of the Bolshevik party among CCP members. First, there was the translation of key works and the promotion of the Bolshevik form of organization in the party press. Second, there was the influence of Comintern emissaries like Voitinsky and Maring who already had experience of such party organization and devoted considerable time to propagating their views. Indeed, Maring was appalled by the lack of discipline which he witnessed in the early CCP. Maring provided information on the idea and importance of party organization and of propaganda as a political weapon.⁶⁵ Further, he stressed the view that the struggle was linked to a much wider one: it was a part of the worldwide struggle against imperialism. Within this context, according to Maring and subsequent Comintern agents, the national party was subordinate to the Comintern.⁶⁶

Third, in the early 1920s there was the gradual return of key figures, such as Cai Hesen, who had studied in Europe and had become acquainted with communist ideology and organization as well as the modern labor movement. As the 1920s progressed, the idea of a Bolshevik party was strengthened through the visits or training of key CCP figures in Soviet Russia. The first group of Chinese students went to Soviet Russia for study as early as spring 1921, and some 1,000 were trained in the 1920s and 1930s at the Communist University of the Working People of China.⁶⁷ While the students who returned from Soviet Russia were a very varied group, they had all received a thorough training in notions of party organization and discipline.

Despite the adoption of the Bolshevik form of organization from the beginning, the CCP has shown a remarkable degree of organizational fluidity, even since its seizure of power in 1949.⁶⁸ While the party was often bitterly divided over tactics and strategy, party organization provided the framework within which debates had to take place. This limited the options for groups opposed to a particular policy line dictated by the Center. Yet, in the early years, the nominal Party Center had little capacity, and perhaps little authority, to exert its will over the localities. The Center could quite simply be ignored, and in the first half of the 1920s, the local organizations enjoyed considerable independence in practice.

Only with the May 30 Movement did the party begin to move toward being a genuine mass party and were attempts made to establish a more differentiated central party apparatus with greater control over the regional organizations (Doc. B.11). While this was still often ignored, it did give the Party Center the capacity for concentrating power. In fact, as early as the Fourth Party Congress (January 1925) attempts were made to tighten up organization (Docs. B.7 and B.9) in order to ensure survival, and improvements were seen as the way to enable the party to break out from being merely a collection of "small propaganda groups."⁶⁹ However, at the Fifth Party Congress (1927), Chen Duxiu was still complaining that something had to be done to enforce the discipline of the Center and adherence to its directives or the party would be little more than an accumulation of provincially based organizations (Doc. B.25).

The rush to create a mass party during the May 30 Movement did have an adverse effect on party development by permitting many new members to join who had little or no idea of communism or Bolshevik organization. To confront these problems and to equip the party as a fighting force to seize power, the Fifth Party Congress adopted a number of measures to tighten up centralization and discipline. For the first time, the basic Leninist notion of democratic centralism was included in the party's Constitution as the guiding principle of the party (Doc. B.28). Further, a Central Supervisory Committee was established as were counterparts at the lower levels. To these organs was entrusted the task of tightening up on discipline in the party.

This move toward tighter control and centralization was increased at the 7 August Emergency Conference (1927) as the effects of the collapse of CCP-GMD cooperation became apparent.⁷⁰ First, as the "Decision on Political Discipline" makes clear, the process of political surveillance and persecution in the party was stepped up. Surveillance over intellectuals in particular was to be increased, and they were blamed for the previous policy failures.⁷¹ Second, the Party Center was forced into an underground existence, and this was reflected in the development of a party profile conducive to such work. An extensive campaign was launched to "Bolshevize" the party further. This tendency became stronger after Li Lisan's removal from power after the failure of his insurrectionist policy. This stress was helped by the return from Soviet Russia of a group of students with a mandate to Bolshevize the party, and they effectively took over the running of the central party apparatus during the next few years (Docs. C.21 and D.18). These men included Bo Gu, Wang Ming, Zhang Wentian, and Wang Jiaxiang. Yet, while democratic centralism was first mentioned in the party Constitution adopted in June 1927 (Doc. B.28), organization as a cohesive factor was accepted only after the Rectification Campaign in Yan'an in the early 1940s.

Ideology and Struggle

The influence of the Comintern and the use of ideology as a weapon in inner-party struggle was increased by the events at the 7 August Emergency Conference (Docs. C.2 and C.4). The removal of Chen Duxiu as party leader was a potentially traumatic event in CCP history. For many, Chen had been a symbol of progress not just from the May Fourth Movement but from his earlier struggle against the imperial system. A number of the early leaders had been drawn into the party because of personal connections and loyalty to Chen. In terms of the Chinese tradition, to turn on a respected senior and elder was of major significance.

Chen's removal was legitimized not merely through criticism of his "mistakes" but also through the invocation of ideological symbols to justify the attack. Adherence to the correct ideological line came to legitimize policy, and understanding of the "line" was a necessary condition for leadership. This had the effect of strengthening Comintern control over party leadership as the Comintern possessed a higher wisdom and vision of the revolutionary process than a mere national party. Concurrently, debate in the party became governed by the manipulation of ideological symbols with the result that genuine debate about policy disputes became even less feasible than before. As the resolution of the Second Plenum of the Sixth CC pointed out (June 1929, Doc. C.14), there was no such thing as peace in the party. Erroneous tendencies always had to be fought against. All too often policy dispute was raised to the level of line struggle.

Thus, the 7 August Emergency Conference ushered in ideological correctness as a key element in control, leadership, and cohesion within the CCP. This tendency and the problems it created were noted by Liu Shaoqi. In a letter of 4 March 1937, Liu suggested to the Party Center that methods in ideological struggle had always been excessive and had created a situation that blocked "calm discussion" of problems within the party. Further, he noted that the hallmark of the party since the 7 August meeting had been "leftism," which in turn had exacerbated the factionalism within the party (Doc. E.22).

Chen Duxiu had already noted, in December 1929, the lack of rational discussion within the party. He complained of the party leaders using the notion of "iron discipline" as a mechanism of control (Doc. C.17). Chen felt that this had created a situation where no one dared to speak out, with the result that strategy and tactics that many knew to be wrong were still implemented. Those who opposed party policy were labeled "Trotskyites," "anarchists," "right deviationists," "left deviationists," etc. Once labeled, their objection to policy was more easily dealt with by the Party Center. The idea of "correct line" also had consequences for the Party Center itself. It could not recognize faults in its own leadership, and thus policy failure was followed by the hunt for "scapegoats" who had sabotaged the party's correct line. As Chen Duxiu wrote, the party leadership became committed to covering up its mistakes in order to maintain its rule.

The tendency toward the dominance of an organizationally derived ideological truth was inherent in the choice of a Bolshevik organization from the beginning. Yet in the early stages it was not so readily apparent. The CCP had been organized before there had been any serious discussion of Marxism, and indeed the choice of a Bolshevik organization removed the need for theoretical analysis. As a result, "an organizationally defined analysis became for them [the original founders] a substitute for theoretical analysis."⁷² Naturally, it was presumed that those from Soviet Russia or their emissaries had a greater understanding of this problem and the relevant needs.

Certainly, the early 1930s were marked by intense inner-party struggles that took on a sharp ideological tone and resulted in fratricide within the party. The stress on secrecy, discipline, and reorienting work for life underground backed up by this drive for ideological orthodoxy brought the Party Center into conflict with operations in the rural soviets. In the soviets, the party operated openly as the local government, and compromise was the order of the day. The compromises made by local leaders in the base areas in order to survive looked like ideological laxness to those in the Party Center.

The criticism of local leaders contained another dimension of power struggle within it. When officials from the Party Center in Shanghai arrived in the base areas, they were given high positions as their standing deserved, but they were shut out from real power-holding. They were simply not a part of the local power structure.⁷³ Accusations of the flaunting of ideological correctness became the main weapon with which to attack the local leaders. This led to the arrest of many local leaders, the increase of factionalism, and in extreme cases fighting and murder. Such clashes were experienced in Jiangxi, E-Yu-Wan, Xiang-Exi, and the northwest (Docs. D.2, D.6, D.13, D.14, and G.20). One of the most extreme cases occurred with the Futian Incident of 1930 (Doc. D.3).⁷⁴

Opposition to the Party Center was confined to a limited number of strategies. The most effective tactic was to take over power at the Center. The struggles between Mao Zedong and Zhang Guotao and subsequently Wang Ming were both about seizing power at the Party Center in order to be able to implement conflicting policy programs.⁷⁵

A second strategy was to ignore central party directives as happened not only in the early 1920s but also on a number of occasions in the base areas in the early 1930s. Mao Zedong himself was very adept at turning a blind eye to those directives with which he did not agree. However, this could not provide a long-term solution to the problem and was at best viable only when the Party Center and its coercive apparatus were remote from the area.

Third, opponents could try to set up a rival organization to try to take over the legitimacy of the Party Center. This had been attempted by He Mengxiong and Luo Zhanglong when they set up a second Jiangsu party committee in 1931 (Doc. C.22), and by Zhang Guotao in the mid-1930s when he began to use the name of the CC. This breakaway strategy never proved successful. Neither He and Luo nor Zhang was able to assume legitimacy, and indeed all were seen to have broken the most fundamental norms governing party discipline. Further, recognition by the Comintern was a crucial element in legitimation. The Comintern was unwilling to support such breakaways.

Finally, opponents could leave the party entirely. This was, in fact, the case with many of the original party members who were opposed to, or were not entirely happy with, the adoption of a Bolshevik form of organization. Sniping from the outside was quite easily dismissed as attacks by counterrevolutionaries.⁷⁶

Mao Zedong's Political Skill and the Rectification Campaign

The party clearly needed a guiding framework of reference that could rally the allegiance of most party members and give a purpose to their actions that was greater than simple survival. While a modern political party may have been alien to Chinese political culture, adherence to an idealistic belief system was not.⁷⁷ The ethical system that underpinned the Confucian state formed an important part of the institutions of government, and the correct explanation of the world was an important part of the legitimacy to rule. The CCP was able to supply an ideology that provided an “entire cosmology that summed up all of human history on a cosmopolitan, supra-national basis.”⁷⁸ Yet, it had to be a belief system to which the party faithful could relate. This framework would also have to allow flexibility for local action while still linking it to some greater overall objective and would have to put an end to bloodshed. Having engaged in his own fratricidal struggles, Mao Zedong was to provide this framework in Yan’an in what is commonly referred to as the sinification of Marxism.⁷⁹

The documents covering the mid-1930s to early 1940s reveal what an able politician Mao Zedong was. He was able to outmaneuver Zhang Guotao, who commanded a far larger number of troops, and also Wang Ming, who supposedly possessed greater theoretical knowledge.⁸⁰ Mao responded quickly and practically to the rapidly unfolding events. The documents he produced concerning the Second United Front (Docs. E.28, F.3, F.7, and F.8), the rapidly changing military situation (Docs. E.25, F.19, H.1, and H.8), the dissolution of the Comintern (Doc. G.21), and the Soviet attitude toward the war (Docs. F.20 and F.21) stood in marked contrast to the sterile references to class analysis that marked those of the First United Front.⁸¹ Mao was able to reassure party leaders that he understood a rapidly changing world. More important, he appeared to be successful. As Teiwes has noted, “[I]n a movement weaned on the notion of ideological correctness, the apparent correlation between party success and Mao’s ideas was powerful persuasion indeed.”⁸²

Crucial to the clarification of organizational goals and the process of creating a binding loyalty was the Rectification Campaign of 1941–44 (Docs. G.2, G.4, G.10, G.11, G.13, G.14, and G.19). The need to tighten up organization and to produce ideological conformity was increased by the influx of new members who had been recruited during the “storm membership drives” and by the numbers of intellectuals who had come to Yan’an as patriots to resist the Japanese rather than as good Communists dedicated to social revolution (Doc. G.3).⁸³ For Mao, if this new organizational and ideological orthodoxy could be defined in such a way as to position him in the central role of the CCP’s revolutionary history, it would provide him with the legitimacy necessary to secure an unchallengeable leadership position. A crucial step in this process was the construction of an official party history adopted as a CC resolution in April 1945 (Doc. G.25).⁸⁴ Mao as the correct interpreter of the past would become the ideological authority defining the present and future course of revolution. Through this discourse, Mao created the necessary “symbolic capital” to enhance his own status as the revolution’s supreme leader and interpreter.⁸⁵

There was more to creating this Maoist discourse than simply providing a guiding framework for party members to relate to. It was also intended to end alternative discourses within the movement. Disagreement with Mao’s viewpoint would be tantamount to committing a mistake in “line.” Rectification was not just a peaceful proselytizing event but entailed the eradication of alternative intellectual responses to his policy, no matter whether the challenge came from Wang Ming and his supporters or from those intellectuals who represented the cosmopolitan trend of the May Fourth Movement within the CCP. The creation of this single discourse eliminated the pluralism of ideas that had temporarily replaced the monism customary in the Chinese polity. Thus, the Rectification Campaign had to ensure that most party members would behave in a predictable way most of the time despite the enormously varied environments in which they operated. This left the party's security apparatus merely with the task of cleaning up the mess where this system broke down.

The new orthodoxy being constructed by Mao Zedong provided the basis for the "reattachment" of many disaffected intellectuals who had moved to the base areas. With the collapse of the imperial system, intellectuals as a group had been detached from the function of public service which they had fulfilled in the Confucian order. This detachment led them to take a more critical look at their own society. In John Fairbank's view this split the literati into two groups: "those in public service and those in public criticism."⁸⁶

One did not have to be a "true believer" to propagate the new orthodoxy. At worst, it simply provided the new "rules of the game" that should not be overstepped. Yet the work of Timothy Cheek on the Jin-Cha-Ji Base Area shows that the version of Maoism propagated there sat quite comfortably with elite culture. Further, Cheek claims that the CCP successfully "attracted, motivated, organized and controlled deviance" among a number of metropolitan intellectuals. The party achieved this goal by allowing these intellectuals to view propaganda work as "an honorable vocation."⁸⁷

For those who may have wavered in terms of positive compliance, the linking of the Rectification Campaign and the "screening" of cadres served as warnings to those unwilling to accept the new orthodoxy. According to David Apter, the establishment of Mao Zedong Thought as the "way to a superior and more virtuous social existence" disguised Mao's "ruthless pursuit of power and the hardboiled morality of his leadership generally."⁸⁸ In Yan'an, Mao Zedong made it quite clear that the independent critical role of the intellectual as it had developed from the May Fourth Movement would no longer be tolerated within his republic. The rules were made plain in his Yan'an talks on literature and art (Doc. G.10), and in case anyone had missed the message there was the humiliation of Wang Shiwei to serve as a warning (Docs. G.17 and G.18).⁸⁹

Rectification took on a more ominous note, not merely with the persecution of Wang Shiwei but also with the campaign to "screen" cadres, indicating that the threat of the use of terror was the obverse of education.⁹⁰ Ostensibly, the investigations that took place were to protect the party against presumed GMD and Japanese supporters who had infiltrated the party and the base areas. In August 1943, cadre screening and rectification were formally linked, and some 4,000 people were "screened" in the Shaan-Gan-Ning Border Region, 2,000 in Yan'an alone.⁹¹ While spies there may have been, the intensity of the movement indicated the kind of paranoia that was to mark Mao Zedong in his later years. Kang Sheng, the organizer of the campaign, indicated its exaggerated nature by claiming that of those who “confessed” less than 10 percent were actually spies or enemies.⁹² This campaign would certainly have caused those contemplating openly challenging Mao and the Party Center to think twice for fear of being accused of being a traitor or a spy.

While the campaign in Yan’an forged a unified leadership that helped the CCP win the Civil War, the new system created there at its outset planted the roots of a number of problems that would come back to haunt the party. First, there was a distrust of independent intellectual criticism, which was thereafter associated with a lack of loyalty. Intellectuals have been almost continually regarded with suspicion since 1949. This reached a high point in the Cultural Revolution when intellectuals were denounced as the “stinking ninth category.”

Second, the emphasis on orthodoxy led to recurrent campaigns to cleanse people’s souls to enable them to be rescued from their errors. The hounding of people by Kang Sheng and the security apparatus during the “screening” campaign and the style of the criticism of Wang Shiwei were both to reappear as forms of struggle during the Anti-Rightist campaign of the mid-1950s and the Cultural Revolution of the mid-1960s.

Third, there was the stress on unity of thought within the party. This carried on the trend of negating genuine debate within the party, and since 1949, policy difference has regularly been interpreted as antiparty activity.

Fourth, there was the stress on the use of mass mobilization as a means to achieve a policy objective. Although this has been a permanent feature of post-1949 Chinese politics, the continual reliance on this method as a means of bringing about change has reduced it to a ritual. Particularly in the years since the Cultural Revolution was launched, this has resulted in the devaluation of the effectiveness of the method through overuse or through the direction of the movement toward spurious targets.

The CCP was successful in those areas where its cadres understood the local environment and where they were good at micropolitics. In part, this sensitivity to the locality was reinforced by the simple need to survive, and it provided the party with the strong rural bases from which it could launch its assault on the GMD-held areas or those evacuated by the Japanese after their defeat. On assuming power, the CCP’s policy-making center moved away from the countryside, and leaders soon forgot that survival and expansion had depended on detailed negotiation and brokerage. With state power in their hands, senior party leaders no longer felt the need to negotiate with other groups and social forces. When party members thought about the lessons of the revolution, it was increasingly in terms of the myth that had been created with the CCP being swept to power by a massive wave of popular peasant support. The party leadership became increasingly divorced from the everyday realities of politics, and policy making began to suffer.

Finally, the stress on organizational stability and ideological orthodoxy went, somewhat paradoxically, hand in hand with the accretion of power in Mao’s hands. Indeed, it went even further than this, as loyalty to the organization was reinforced through a campaign to promote Mao Zedong the individual as the font of supreme wisdom in China's revolution, a campaign that built up momentum from July 1943 onward (Docs. G.22 and H.6). At the time, it does not seem to have occurred to other senior leaders that the buildup of a Mao cult negated the stress on collective leadership and loyalty to the CCP as an organization. Indeed, it seems that senior party supporters of Mao saw the buildup of Mao not only as a necessary counter to the concurrent buildup of Chiang Kai-shek as a national leader but also as the way to bind the peasant party and army members together with the organization. Some leaders believed that the thought of Mao Zedong embodied the collective wisdom of the top leadership. While the persona of Mao did not dominate the CCP as totally as did that of Chiang Kai-shek, in it lay the seeds of future problems that would all but destroy the party during the Cultural Revolution.

Notes to Introduction

1. For example, the September 1935 Party Center resolution on Zhang Guotao's "mistakes" was for the eyes of CC members only (Doc. E.3). Clearly, it was felt that circulation within the party at large could prove destabilizing. Similarly, events could be interpreted in different ways depending on the audience. A good example is provided by the three documents included covering the Southern Anhui Incident of 1941. Mao Zedong's public statement stressed the premeditated action of the anticommunists in the GMD (Doc. F.16), while party members were told to use the Incident to reform the GMD and expel pro-Japanese elements within it (Doc. F.17). For the party elite, the interpretation offered related to the inner-party struggle between Mao Zedong and Wang Ming (Doc. F.18). Xiang Ying, who Mao saw as a Wang Ming supporter, was blamed for the Incident because of his "right opportunist" mistakes in the united front.

crucial for forging together the party in its nascent period. By contrast, Hans van de Ven highlights the indigenous roots of the communist movement. Not only did this localism have a strong impact on the first decade of the CCP but also there were regional groupings, such as that in Sichuan, that came into existence without reference to the Comintern and even without contact with the "founding fathers," Chen Duxiu and Li Dazhao. 33. Hartford and Goldstein reach a similar conclusion and state that revolution at the basic level was a “political process, not the predetermined working out of structural factors or the inevitable Big Boom emanating from the mixture of revolutionary preconditions and revolutionary consciousness.” Hartford and Goldstein, “Introduction,” p. 33. This follows the kind of argumentation used in R. Aya, Rethinking Revolutions and Collective Violence.

37. Much of the CCP’s early struggle was against the anarchists and other radical and socialist groupings.

38. The May 30 Movement broke out after police in the International Settlement, Shanghai, had opened fire on those protesting against imperialism. As a result, a large-scale movement against the imperialist presence in China developed. The Northern Expedition was the name given to the advance of the GMD-led armies in their drive to unify China.

39. Indeed the whole strategy of the CCP-GMD cooperation in the eyes of some CCP leaders was to take over the leading positions and thus to exert an influence out of all proportion to the actual numerical strength of the CCP.

40. Brandt in Stalin’s Failure had argued the first view, while orthodox CCP histories place the blame on Chen’s shoulders.

41. This point is argued in H. van de Ven, The Founding of the Chinese Communist Party.

42. However, the Comintern did stress the view that the CCP should work within the framework of the united front and not develop its own, separate armed force. Given the circumstances, the development of an independent armed force would not have been practical and would have precipitated a break with the CCP even more quickly.

43. The Party Center did remain in Shanghai until 1933, but it is questionable how effective its contacts were.

Commentary A

The Founding of the Chinese Communist Party and the Origins of Cooperation with the Guomindang, 1920–1923

The CCP emerged from the cultural and political movement named for the incident of 4 May 1919. The period from roughly 1915 to 1921 saw the introduction to China of many new ideas for regenerating the Chinese state and society. Some of China's patriotic youth came to believe that the international credo of Marxism and its Leninist variant could provide China's national salvation. The spread of Marxism was aided by its adoption by a number of key intellectuals. The best known of these were the two founding fathers of the CCP, Chen Duxiu and Li Dazhao, but there were others, such as Li Da, who played a key role in promoting the study of Marxism.¹

Apart from the intellectual attraction of Marxism, a number of factors led to an increase of its appeal in its Bolshevik form.² First, there was the Bolshevik revolution itself. It demonstrated to some Chinese the possibilities for radical change in the context of underdevelopment. Second, the growing prestige of Soviet Russia was boosted by the Karakhan Declaration (1919), which appeared to renounce the former czarist privileges in China. This portrayed new Soviet Russia in a favorable light in comparison with the old imperialist powers that seemed intent on dismembering China. Third, during the May Fourth Movement a politically conscious urban proletariat began its entry onto the political stage. Although the workforce remained small, its members were dramatically increasing, primarily as a result of World War I. China's tardy industrialization had been propelled forward as many foreign imports disappeared because of the war.

Finally, the Comintern took a strong interest in events in China and was able to promote the idea of the development of a revolutionary party to guide and control future actions. In April 1920, Voitinsky visited China as the head of a group sent by the Vladivostok Branch of the Bolshevik's Far Eastern Bureau. He and his fellow visitors found fertile soil in which to plant the seeds of a Bolshevik organization.³ According to the historian Arif Dirlik, the timing was fortuitous as the radical movement in China had reached a point of crisis because the previous ideological and organizational premises appeared to have run into a dead end.⁴ Voitinsky's group established contacts with radical intellectuals such as Li Dazhao in Beijing and Chen Duxiu in Shanghai. Out of their discussions emerged the idea of founding a CP in China.⁵

Yet the early communist organizations in China did not simply emerge out of the blue; they evolved from the study societies set up during the May Fourth period. Out of study groups such as the New People's Study Society, the Awakening Society, and the Social Welfare Society came many of China's later communist leaders.⁶

The group in Shanghai was the first communist organization to be set up, most probably in August 1920.⁷ It functioned as the provisional Party Center until the First Congress was convened in the following year. Although the precise structure and names varied from place to place, by the time of the First Party Congress the communist organizations functioned in a threefold structure. Operating illegally at the core were the communist small groups; then there were units of the SYC operating semi-openly and providing a recruitment pool for the party; and finally the Marxist study societies presented a public face, trying to reach the widest possible audience.⁸

a) The First Party Congress (July–August 1921)— Pro-proletariat, Antibourgeoisie

The First Congress of the CCP that began its meeting on 23 July 1921 adopted a sectarian attitude of hostility toward cooperation with other forces in Chinese society and an exclusive focus on the working class. This attitude is already clear in "The Manifesto of the CCP" (Doc. A.1) drawn up in November 1920. The publication of this manifesto coincided with the launching of the party's first journal, the monthly Gongchandang (The Communist). Clearly, the organization was now thinking of itself as distinct from the other radical groupings and was trying to establish its own profile and program.

In a very simple fashion, the manifesto outlines basic concepts of communism, its goals, and the tasks of the CP. It is remarkable for its orthodoxy. It shows little feeling for China's situation or for the policy of tactical alliance with the bourgeoisie that was being developed at that time within the Comintern. The bourgeoisie is clearly identified as the key target to be destroyed in the process of class struggle. After the overthrow of the bourgeoisie, the soviet was to provide the governmental form. Reflecting the anarchist ideas that were highly influential in the communist movement at the time, it states that the political ideal of communism is the abolition of state power.

These ideas dominated debates at the First Party Congress (see Doc. A.2).⁹ Essentially two main viewpoints were put forward, with Li Hanjun the main proponent of the minority view and Liu Renjing the fiercest defender of the majority viewpoint. In Li's opinion, it was too soon to become directly involved in the workers' movement as the working class was still unprepared and had an inadequate understanding of Marxism. As a result, the first task was to undertake a lengthy period of educational and propaganda work. First, intellectuals were to be armed with Marxism, and then workers were to be organized and educated to raise their class consciousness. While this was in process, study could be made of the comparative values of Bolshevism and German Social Democracy, before it was decided which was most suitable to China's needs.

The "Program" and the "Resolution" passed by the Congress (Docs. A.3, A.4) both show the rejection of the minority view on crucial issues. The "Program" calls for the "revolutionary army of the proletariat to overthrow the capitalistic classes" and for the adoption of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Both documents are uncompromising in their hostility to collaboration with other parties, groups, or the "yellow intellectual class." A related debate concerned whether party members should hold government posts. The "Program," in general, barred members from holding posts as government officials or members of parliament, but exempted soldiers, police officers, and civil service employees. The workers' movement was confirmed as the core of party work, with the chief aim being the creation of industrial unions.

The party itself was to adopt a secretive, hierarchical structure based on local soviets. Supreme power was vested in a CEC that still had to be set up. It would have the right to supervise and direct the finances, publications, and policies of any local soviet. The appeals of Li Hanjun for a decentralized system of power were thus rejected. The final session of the Congress elected the central leadership. As party membership was still small, it was decided to set up a Provisional Central Executive Bureau to maintain liaison, etc., with the various branches. Chen Duxiu, Zhang Guotao, and Li Da were elected members with Chen as secretary. Zhang and Li were in charge of organization and propaganda respectively.¹⁰ In Chen Duxiu's continued absence, Zhou Fuhai was to deputize for him.

The reports of the Beijing and Canton party groups to the Congress (Docs. A.5, A.6) give an idea of party work in these localities. The first battle the communist groups faced was to eradicate the influence of the anarchists. In Canton, seven of the original members and in Beijing six of the original eight members were anarchists.¹¹ Most of the anarchists left these nascent organizations because they refused to accept the necessity of the dictatorship of the proletariat. While work varied from place to place and, in reality, local organizational independence was a strong feature of the early years of party life, all the groups sought to establish propaganda organs to propagate Marxism and to involve themselves in the labor movement.

Despite the high-sounding phrases adopted by the Congress, party work was slow in getting off the ground because of continued differences of opinion, financial difficulties, and the fact that the newly elected party secretary, Chen Duxiu, did not return to Shanghai until late August-mid-September.¹² By November 1921, however, a preliminary work plan was agreed upon (Doc. A.7) and circulated to the localities. It tried to formalize party structure by calling on the five major districts to set up district executive committees, each recruiting some thirty members. This would allow a "formal CEC" to be set up in accordance with the party program. Labor work was stressed, and each district was instructed to have at least one labor union under its control. The focus was on organizing railway workers, with the objective of creating a national railway union.

The exclusive focus on the working class and hostility toward the bourgeoisie ran counter to the policy line that was evolving in the Comintern. The Comintern's Second Congress (July–August 1920) had put forward the idea of a temporary alliance between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie during the phase of the national revolution. It was in light of this that the Comintern had decided to send Maring as its representative to China. He arrived in June 1921.¹³ The subsequent period saw an attempt to force on the CCP a policy of cooperation with the bourgeoisie in the nationalist revolutionary movement.

b) The Second Congress (16–23 July 1922)—Pro-CCP Cooperation with the Bourgeois GMD—the “Bloc Without”

As Maring made clear in his July 1922 “Report” to the ECCI concerning his first year in China (Doc. A.8), he was very pessimistic about the work of the CCP. In contrast, his visit to Sun Yat-sen's headquarters in south China in the winter of 1921–22 produced a very favorable view of the GMD. In particular, the GMD's involvement in the Hong Kong sailors' strike (January–May 1922) left a deep impression on Maring. This led Maring to propose that CCP members join the GMD to form a bloc within. The ideological complication of the proletariat joining a bourgeois party was swept aside with the assertion that the GMD was not a bourgeois party at all but a combination of four groups: the intelligentsia, the Chinese patriots overseas, the soldiers, and the workers.

Initially the idea of CCP members joining the GMD was totally unacceptable to the CCP leaders, as Chen Duxiu's letter of 6 April 1922 to Voitinsky clearly shows (Doc. A.9). Yet by June 1922 signs of a shift in attitude were apparent. Presumably the influence of both Maring and the Youth International representative, Dalin, was beginning to take effect.¹⁴ The CCP's June “Statement” (Doc. A.10) referred to the GMD as the only existing political party that could be called a revolutionary party. Support was qualified for the GMD—it was only “relatively democratic and revolutionary”; while the southern (Canton) government's involvement in the labor movement was commented on favorably, the GMD's occasional dalliances with the imperialists externally and with northern militarists internally were criticized. However, this was the first public sign of a shift in views.

The Second Congress of the CCP (16–23 July 1922) confirmed the party's decision to join the democratic revolutionary movement in a temporary alliance (Doc. A.11).¹⁵ It is important to note that this decision referred to “all the nation's revolutionary parties,” not just the GMD. However, since the “democratic elements” did not represent the interests of the proletariat, the CCP was to promote an independent class movement. Lest cooperation be misconstrued, the “Manifesto” issued by the Congress (Doc. A.12) began with the statement that such cooperation should not be seen as a proletarian surrender to the capitalists. This willingness to work with other groups was accompanied by a change in attitude toward work within the system. The idea of entering parliament to promote the interests of the proletariat and the poor peasant classes was positively embraced (Doc. A.13).

The Congress also sought to tighten up on organization in an attempt to transform the party from its intellectual study group origins into a more orthodox Leninist party (Docs. A.14, A.15). The CEC was enshrined as the most powerful organ in the party with the tasks of enforcing Congress decisions and examining and deciding on the policies and actions of the party.¹⁶ To overcome the tendency toward anarchy, the party was to operate under “centralized and iron-like laws.” However, constitutions of themselves do not establish discipline, and the party remained internally divided on key questions such as whether cooperation with the GMD should be pursued and, if so, what form it should take.

Work in the labor movement continued to be defined as the party’s main raison d’être, and the Congress outlined the role of the CCP in the labor movement (Doc. A.16). Labor unions were to represent all workers regardless of their political opinions while educating them toward acceptance of socialist and communist principles. The party itself, however, was the army of the class-conscious elements of the proletariat, and it embodied the objective of overthrowing capitalism.

The Congress acknowledged the need for some form of cooperation in the national revolution but favored a horizontal alignment alongside the GMD rather than a “bloc within” as had been proposed by Maring. On his return to China in the summer of 1922, Maring found the party in disarray; Chen Duxiu had tendered his resignation, and the other four members of the CEC all appear to have belonged to Zhang Guotao’s “small group.” This “small group” was based on the Labor Secretariat, and it attempted to recruit activists and delegate them work as a way to overcome what it saw as the inactivity of members such as Li Hanjun. It was also hostile to the idea of cooperation with the GMD.

c) The Third Congress (12–20 June 1923)—Pro-CCP Members Joining GMD as Individuals—“The Bloc Within”

To get his ideas accepted, Maring convened the Hangzhou Plenum (28–30 August 1922), the first plenum ever held by the CCP. To overcome the opposition of the majority, Maring was able to cite the “Instructions for the ECCI Representative in South China” (Doc. A.17). This document, drafted by Radek on the basis of Maring’s statements, was an endorsement of the latter’s views. This imposition of Comintern discipline was intended to move the CCP away from its idealism and exclusionist position to embrace the bourgeoisie in a tactical alliance. Moreover, Maring used it to argue that CCP members should accept his view that they join the GMD to form a “bloc within.” While some form of tactical cooperation with the bourgeoisie was generally accepted within the CCP, the idea of forming a “bloc within” the GMD was strongly resisted and became a major point of controversy at the Third Party Congress.

The orthodox approach of the CCP was criticized by Radek at the Comintern's Fourth Congress (November–December 1922). He lambasted the Chinese Communists for their unworldliness, remarking on how they behaved like traditional Confucian scholars. Locking themselves away to study Marx and Lenin meant that they had failed to “associate themselves with the laboring masses.” Neither socialism nor the Soviet system should be on the political agenda; the current task of the party was to work together with the “revolutionary bourgeois elements” to “organize the struggle against European and Asiatic imperialism.”¹⁷ However, Radek did not identify this cooperation with forming a communist “bloc within” the GMD.

Chen Duxiu took the words of the Congress to heart and while in Moscow (November 1922) drafted “The Immediate Tactics of the Communist Party of China” (Doc. A.18). He noted the weak position of the proletariat in China and the failure of the bourgeoisie to oppose sufficiently the foreign imperialists and the native feudal class. Thus, the proletariat was to use its economic power to convince the bourgeoisie of the necessity of forming a united front. However, Chen was concerned with the preservation of CCP independence within the united front, and he remained skeptical whether this class collaboration could be achieved through the CCP operating as a “bloc within” the GMD.

This document is also remarkable for the first detailed handling of peasant policy by a senior CCP leader. Taking his cue from “The Theses on the Eastern Problem” adopted by the Comintern Congress, Chen outlined a detailed program. He acknowledged that the proletariat could not achieve its goals without the support of the “poor peasant masses.” Were the party to remain isolated from the peasantry, it would never be able to become a “great mass party.”

The party was in bad shape by the time it convened its Third Congress (12–20 June 1923).¹⁸ The brutal crushing of the February 1923 Beijing–Hankou railway workers’ strike had shattered the party’s high hopes for the workers’ movement.¹⁹ The destruction of the railway union, the best communist organization, and the ensuing crackdown on labor in general made many party members realize that the strength of the proletariat alone was insufficient. Maring’s reports to the Comintern at this time paint a very gloomy picture²⁰ that is echoed by Chen Duxiu’s report to the Party Congress (Doc. A.19).

The main point of contention at the Congress was the form of cooperation between the CCP and the GMD, and the main protagonists were Maring and Zhang Guotao (Docs. A.20, A.21, respectively). While Zhang accepted that for the sake of the revolution the GMD and the CCP should be more closely linked, he did not feel that the GMD yet represented the nationalist movement. Neither was the GMD geographically a national movement. Zhang felt that it should be supported only where it had strong links with the masses but not in the north where it had no organization. Given his background in the labor movement, Zhang would not accept subordination of it to the GMD. With the exception of Canton and Hankou, where Zhang saw no other choice, the CCP-controlled labor movement was to remain outside the GMD. Zhang received his strongest support from Cai Hesen, who stressed that the bourgeoisie had no revolutionary significance and that it was important to build up an independent workers' party.²¹

Maring defended himself and Chen Duxiu against charges that they wished to dissolve the CCP through cooperation with the GMD. Again he invoked Comintern discipline to force his points home. In his view, the strong emphasis on the working class derived from an overestimation of the potential of the proletariat in China; he reasserted that the only way forward for the CCP was to develop the GMD from within. He accused both Zhang and Cai of ignoring the Comintern's January 1923 formulation that because the central task in China was the nationalist revolution, the activities of the GMD and the "young CCP" should be coordinated.

The Congress "Manifesto" and the "Resolution" on cooperation with the GMD (Docs. A.22, A.23, respectively) show that Maring's and Chen Duxiu's ideas carried the day.²² The "Manifesto" clearly acknowledged the GMD as the central force of the national revolution. The "Resolution" spelled out in more detail the need to rally around the GMD, noting that the weakness of the working class prevented the development of a mass communist party. Within the GMD, the communist organization would be maintained and attract to itself radical elements who would provide a solid basis for the development of the CCP.²³

Organizationally, the Congress made a number of minor adjustments in the Constitution (Doc. A.24); more importantly, the central party apparatus was clearly outlined (Doc. A.25). Membership of the CEC was increased to nine but, at its first session, it was to elect a five-person Central Bureau to exercise power on its behalf. The Bureau was to meet every week while the CEC was to meet only every four months. Thus, effective power was to remain centralized in a few hands. The CEC also elected a chair to preside over both organs, a secretary to handle party correspondence and documentation, and a party accountant.²⁴

Despite the passing of resolutions for cooperation with the GMD, the policy was not smoothly implemented immediately afterward; indeed it was hardly implemented at all. The Central Bureau of the party decided to move back to Shanghai as it felt that not much could be achieved with Sun Yat-sen and because it wanted to create new organizations in the north either to bring about a radical change in the dominant opinions within the GMD, or to create a new nationalist party. This was quite contrary to Maring's intentions, although even he was moved to muse about a GMD without Sun at its head.

The disillusionment with Sun stemmed from his obsession with a military solution to China's problems and his resistance to the reorganization of the GMD. This was fueled by what the Communists saw as his inactivity concerning the situation in Beijing. In June 1923, through the intrigues of Cao Kun, Li Yuanhong was dismissed as president of the Republic. The CCP saw the resultant power vacuum as providing Sun with the perfect chance to place himself at the head of the national movement by going to Shanghai and convening there a national assembly. A letter by senior CCP members who were also in the GMD was sent to Sun to this effect (Docs. A.26).²⁵ However, Sun rejected these overtures, claiming that the assembly was an impossibility and that when the merchants understood this they would rally to him.²⁶

The problem of realizing cooperation between the CCP and the GMD was a major topic discussed at the first meeting of the CEC on 24–25 November 1923.²⁷ The report of the Central Bureau (Doc. A.27) noted that some members still opposed the “Resolution” adopted at the Third Party Congress and that differences of opinion and lack of trust existed between members of the two parties. Lack of progress was mentioned in the regional reports to the meeting (Doc. A.28), the main exception being Guangdong. Borodin’s arrival in Canton had put life back into the process of expanding cooperation between the CCP and the GMD. The meeting reaffirmed the CCP’s principles of cooperation, calling for all members to join the GMD where its organization existed and to strive to create organizations where it did not (Doc. A.29). The meeting also confirmed the tactic of taking over the GMD from within. CCP members were to form secret organizations within the GMD, and all their political pronouncements were to come under party guidance.

The meeting addressed the problem of labor work. Most workers’ organizations in north and central China had been shattered in the aftermath of the February 1923 railway workers’ strike. In the future, work was to concentrate on the triumvirate of railway workers, sailors, and miners with the intention of creating a National Labor Union (Doc. A.30). The bleak situation with respect to labor organization was borne out by the regional reports, with only the situation in Anyuan seeming to be a bright spot.

Further cooperation between the CCP and the GMD was spurred by Borodin’s arrival with promises of even greater Soviet financial support and the reorganization of the GMD, which was to take place in January 1924.

DOCUMENTS 1920–1923

A.1 The Manifesto of the CCP (November 1920)²⁸

Dear Comrades!

This manifesto was agreed on by the CCP in November of last year. Since it does not contain all the communist principles, the manifesto has not been made public and is used only as guidance for accepting new party members. Since the original Chinese text of the manifesto could not be found here, I translated it from English. Because it was a year ago that this manifesto was agreed on, of course by now parts of it need to be revised and new things need to be added. I very much hope that every comrade will read it carefully because every Communist must pay attention to important documents such as this—the Manifesto of the CP. Furthermore, it is proposed that the communist group of the Chinese delegation to the Congress of the Toilers of the Far East discuss this document.²⁹ The result of the discussion will be given to the CCP for consideration and adoption.

1) Communist Ideals

A) Views on the Economy: Communists advocate social and common ownership and use of the means of production—machinery, factories, raw materials, land, transportation facilities, and so on. Once common ownership and common use of the means of production have been achieved, private property and the system of moneylending will naturally be eliminated. The current phenomenon of exploitation of man by man in society will cease to exist because the origin of the exploitation—surplus value—will cease to exist.

B) Views on Politics: Communists advocate the abolition of the state. Anything akin to current state institutions and government absolutely cannot be allowed to exist. Because the state, the army, and the courts protect the interests of the minority and oppress the majority working masses, they are very necessary when the means of production are privately owned. Of course, if private property and the system of moneylending are abolished, the state, the army, and the courts are no longer useful.

C) Views on Society: Communists will ensure that society has only one class (i.e., it will be classless)—this is the class of the laboring masses. The origin of all special powers in today's society is private property; special classes would not exist if no one could concentrate property.

2) The Communists' Goal

The goal of Communists is to create a new society in accordance with communist ideals. In order to make the realization of our ideal society feasible, the first step is the elimination of the present capitalist system. The elimination of the capitalist system requires strong power to defeat the capitalist countries. The power of the laboring masses—the proletariat—is growing stronger and is becoming more concentrated. This is precisely the result of class conflicts within capitalist countries. The form that this power takes is class struggle.

Thus the instrument to defeat capitalism is class struggle. Class struggle has always existed in human society, but because its form is determined by the development of the means of production, its form has changed a number of times. Class struggle also existed under the feudal system, but it differed from that in capitalist countries. Class struggle in capitalist countries is exceptionally intense, with a momentum great enough to shake the whole world. This power is becoming increasingly consolidated and eventually will eliminate capitalism. This kind of intensification of struggle is determined by the logic of history.

The CP's task is to organize and concentrate the power of this class struggle and to make the force opposing capitalism stronger.

To be successful, this [idea] must be propagated among workers, peasants, soldiers, sailors, and students. The objective is to organize some large industrial associations and combine them into a general federation of industrial associations, and also to organize a revolutionary, proletarian political party—the CP. The CP is to guide the revolutionary proletariat to fight against capitalists and to seize political power from them. This power is used to maintain the capitalist system. Instead, power will be placed in the hands of workers and peasants, just as the Russian CP did in 1917.

The revolutionary proletariat's industrial associations must use general strikes to cause constant agitation in capitalist countries to make the enemy of the working masses weaker and weaker. When the time of the final struggle to seize political power from capitalists is at hand, the CP will call a general, all-out strike. This will deal a fatal blow to the capitalist system.

After the proletariat defeats the capitalists, the industrial associations will become the organs responsible for the economy in the communist society.

The overthrow of capitalist government and transfer of political power to the revolutionary proletariat is only one of the goals of the CP, and it is already showing success. However, this will not be the end of the CP's task, as class struggle will continue to exist. Only its form will change and will become the dictatorship of the proletariat.

3) Recent Conditions of Class Struggle

As it appears now, the whole world can be viewed as a single capitalist institution. Therefore class struggle in one country can have repercussions in others. The result of the victory of the Russian proletarian revolution was the transformation of class struggle in Russia into the dictatorship of the workers and peasants. This causes class struggle in other countries to become more intense, and it tends toward the same form as class struggle in Russia—the dictatorship of the proletariat.

It is no accident that the form of class struggle in Russia was transformed into the dictatorship of the proletariat; it is a natural state of affairs in the development of human society. It is a natural state of affairs at the time when the capitalists are being defeated and a communist society is being created. At a certain moment, the political form that exists in Russia is destined to emerge. Therefore it is true that this political form is destined to emerge in every other country. This is the case because these countries are the same. If one looks at their methods of production and distribution, they are all capitalist. The dictatorship of the proletariat in Russia only demonstrates that in one part of the world victory has been achieved in the struggle between the proletarian and capitalist. It would be a major mistake to believe that a single communist state can be established within the boundary of Russia at a time when the proletariat in other countries is still struggling against capitalism and has yet to achieve victory. Since the Russian proletariat cannot immediately establish a communist state, and since capitalism has already been overthrown, the proletariat has to defend itself against enemies within the country and without. This is obvious. Therefore only through the realization of the dictatorship of the proletariat can the enemies within the country and without be successfully resisted. That is to say, the power of one class is used to create communist society. Furthermore this class will make the society of the future. The fulfillment of this task is ordained by history.

Moreover, this is characteristic not only of the development of Russian history but also of world history. Every country in the world will go through this phase of class struggle.

The meaning of the dictatorship of the proletariat lies solely in that political power has been seized by the revolutionary proletariat. Yet this does not mean that residual forces of capitalism, such as counterrevolutionary forces, have been totally eradicated. This is not at all the case. The task facing the dictatorship of the proletariat is, on the one hand, to continue using force to fight the residual forces of capitalism and, on the other, to use revolutionary methods to produce many communist methods of construction. Methods like these will be devised by the elected representatives of the proletariat—those of the proletariat with the highest class consciousness and revolutionary spirit.

By the time capitalists' forces have been eliminated all over the world and productive activities begin to operate in accordance with communist principles, the dictatorship of the proletariat will move on to carve out a path leading to communism.

A.2 The First Congress of the CCP (August 1921)³¹

The Chinese communist organization was established in the middle of last year [1920]. Initially, the Shanghai organization had only five members. The leader is the editor of the well-received journal New Youth [Xin qingnian], Comrade Chen [Duxiu]. This organization has gradually expanded the scope of its activities and now comprises six small groups³² with a total of fifty-three party members. The Congress was originally scheduled to open on 20 June, but because the delegates from Beijing, Hankou, Canton, Changsha, Jinan, and Japan did not all arrive in Shanghai until 23 July, the Congress only began then. Twelve representatives participated in the Congress. They came from seven localities, including Shanghai. Two localities sent one delegate each, and five localities sent two.³³

At the first session, the chairman, Comrade Zhang [Guotao], explained the significance of the Congress. The Congress was to formulate a program and a plan for practical work. An agenda was drawn up, and the Congress listened to reports concerning the activities of the local small groups and the general situation. In total, this took two days. These reports all pointed out three things: party members are very few; it is necessary to increase party membership; and the methods of organizing workers and making propaganda have to be improved. We are extremely pleased to mention here that Comrades Maring³⁴ and Nikolsky attended the First Congress and that they provided us with valuable guidance. Comrade Maring, in his speech, discussed his activities in Java and recommended that we should pay special attention to establishing workers' organizations.

Comrade Nikolsky told us about the circumstances surrounding the establishment of the Far Eastern Secretariat³⁵ and gave his impressions of Russia. After this report, and on the basis of Nikolsky's suggestion, we decided to send a telegram to Irkutsk informing them of the progress of the Congress. Following Maring's recommendation it was decided to elect a commission to draft the program and the work plan. The commission was given two days to draft the plan and the program. During this period, there were no Congress sessions.

The third, fourth, and fifth sessions of the Congress were devoted to the study of the program. After a long debate, final decisions were reached, with the exception of one point that caused heated debate. This point was whether party members could, with the permission of the Executive Committee, become government officials and members of parliament. On this point, there were two different viewpoints. One was that there was no danger in our party members' becoming officials. Moreover, the selection of party members to enter parliament was even recommended so that they could carry out their work under party leadership. The other viewpoint did not accept this.

At the third meeting, the representatives did not reach an agreement, and at the fourth meeting the discussion became even more heated. One side firmly believed that acceptance into parliament could turn our party into a yellow party. They quoted the example of the Social Democratic Party in Germany to show that when people entered parliament they gradually abandoned their principles and became a part of the bourgeoisie, becoming traitors and recognizing the parliamentary system as the only means of struggle and work. So as not to undertake any activities in common with the bourgeoisie and in order to concentrate our forces for attack, we certainly should not participate in parliament but should engage in struggle outside it. Moreover, taking advantage of parliament could not improve our situation, yet entering parliament might make people think that taking advantage of parliament, and only that, could improve our situation and enable us to be of service to the revolutionary cause. The others persisted in advocating that we must link open work with secret work. If we believed that the state could not be abolished within twenty-four hours and that a general strike could be suppressed by the capitalists, then political activities would be a necessity. Although opportunities for uprisings were few and far between, we had to make preparations in the meantime. We had to improve the workers' conditions, expand their outlook, and lead them to take part in the revolutionary struggle and the struggle for freedom of publication and assembly. The open propagation of our theories was an absolute condition for success, and the adoption of activities in common with other parties and factions oppressed in parliament could have brought partial success. However, we must point out to the people that it is futile to hope to build a new society within the old system even if we are the ones trying to do so. The working class must liberate itself because it is not possible to force it to carry out revolution. Otherwise, it will entertain illusions about parliament and adopt peaceful, instead of radical, means.

By the end, the issue still had not been resolved, and its resolution was left to the next Congress. The question of whether we should become government officials was intentionally avoided, but it was unanimously believed that we should not become ministers or provincial governors and that, in general, we should not take up important administrative posts. In China, the word "official" can be applied to all the posts mentioned above. However, we would permit our comrades to take up such official posts such as plant directors.

The sixth session of the Congress was held at night in a comrade's home. The meeting had only just started when a detective barged into the house.³⁶ Although he apologized for coming in by mistake, it was impossible for us to carry on with the meeting. The arrival of the detective did not damage the party, although after he came the police quickly arrived and carried out a search. After this incident, we were on our guard, and in order to continue the Congress we had to move to a small town nearby.³⁷

There we discussed the commission's draft of the practical work plan. Concerning our attitude to other parties and factions, there was a short but intense debate. Some people maintained that no matter whether in theory or in practice, the proletariat should always struggle against other parties and factions. At the same time, however, undertaking common activities with other parties and factions did not violate our party's principles. Also, we were to do our utmost to cooperate with all other elements to oppose our common enemy—the warlords who are the enemy of all other classes in society. Others advocated that although we should cooperate in activities with other parties and factions to oppose the common enemy, at the same time, we should not forsake principles and must criticize them in our newspaper. Even if we were not able to seize power immediately, at least we would be able to strengthen ourselves so that we would be able to take further action. Because our strength would inevitably be improved by achievements in this respect, the ruling class that is in the process of replacing the current ruling class might not dare to oppress the people in the same way as the feudal lords. In this way, we could concentrate our revolutionary strength and expand our revolutionary activities. Therefore, even if the proletariat could not take over political power immediately, we should still unite with other classes to oppose the common enemy and strengthen ourselves so that we could struggle further to overthrow the class that has gained political power. In this way, one would be able to see that our unity with other classes is for the purpose of engaging in struggle of a destructive nature. However, the meeting made a decision in favor of the first option, namely, the recommendation submitted by the commission that drafted the practical work plan.

Because party members are few, the questions of organizing the peasantry and an army were suspended, and it was decided to concentrate our energies on organizing the factory workers. In order to win good and reliable comrades to our side, it was decided that party members must be admitted with special caution and via a strict selection process. In view of the fact that up to now our party has been composed almost entirely of intellectuals, the Congress decided to pay special attention to the organization of workers and their education in the communist spirit. The Central Bureau of the party was entrusted with the drafting of the party Constitution. After having elected three comrades to organize the Secretariat and having elected the Organization Department and the Propaganda Committee,³⁸ the Congress shouted the following slogans and declared the meeting closed: "Long Live the CP, Long Live the Third International, Long Live Communism—the Emancipator of Humankind."

A.3 The First Program of the CCP (July–August 1921)³⁹

1. Our party shall be named the Chinese Communist Party.
2. The program of our party is as follows:
 - a) With the revolutionary army of the proletariat, to overthrow the capitalistic classes and to reconstruct the nation from the labor class, until class distinctions are eliminated.
 - b) To adopt the dictatorship of the proletariat in order to complete the end of class struggle—abolishing classes.
 - c) To overthrow the private ownership of capital, to confiscate all the productive means, such as machines, land, buildings, semimanufactured products, and so on, and to entrust them to social ownership.
 - d) To unite with the Third International.
- 3) Our party, with the adoption of the soviet form, organizes the industrial and agricultural laborers and soldiers, propagates communism, and recognizes the social revolution as our chief policy; it absolutely cuts off all relations with the yellow intellectual class and other such groups.

4) No discrimination as to sex or nationality is allowed in the membership; anyone who accepts the programs and policies of our party and who promises loyalty to our party after introduction by one of our members can be our comrade, but before he [she] enters our party, he [she] shall sever relations with any other party or group which opposes our program.

5) The procedure for introducing a member is this: the candidate should be suggested to the local soviet for investigation; the time for investigation is limited to at most two months. After investigation, through the consent of the majority of the members, the membership of the new applicant is recognized. If in that locality an executive committee has been established, its membership should be approved by that committee.

6) Until the time for disclosure is ripe, the doctrines of the party and even membership in it must be kept secret.

7) In any locality which has as many as five members, a local soviet can be organized.

8) The member of a soviet, through a formal introduction from his [her] local secretary can transfer to another local soviet.

9) In any local soviet numbering less than ten members, only one secretary is appointed to manage affairs; if the soviet has over ten members, a treasurer, an organizer, and a propagandist should be appointed; if the soviet has over thirty members, an executive committee should be organized. The rules of such a committee will be stipulated hereafter.

10) In various localities when the membership increases, the organizations of laborers, peasants, soldiers, and students should be utilized for external activity according to occupations, but such organizations should be under the direction of the local executive committee.

12) The finances, publications, and policies of any local soviet shall be supervised and directed by the CEC.

13) When the members exceed 500 or when more than five local executive committees have been established in the whole country, a convenient place should be chosen in which to organize an executive committee, including ten members elected by the national representative conference. When the above-mentioned conditions are not carried out, a provisional CEC should be organized to fill the need. The detailed regulations of the CEC will be stipulated thereafter.

14) The members, unless they are under pressure of existing law or have obtained consent from the party, cannot be government officials or members of parliament, but soldiers, policemen, and civil service employees are not held to this restriction.

15) This program can be amended when a bill concerning such amendments is passed by two-thirds of the representatives of the national representative conference.

A.4 The First Decision as to the Objects of the CCP (July–August 1921)⁴⁰

1) Labor Organization

To form industrial unions is the chief aim of our party. In any locality where there is more than one kind of industry, an industrial union shall be organized; if there is no great industry in a certain locality but only one or two factories, a factory union can be organized suitable to conditions in that locality.

The party should imbue the unions with the spirit of the class struggle. If the political struggle, fostered by various unions, does not agree with our program, this party should avoid becoming the puppet of other parties.

As to the existing guilds and technical unions, this party is allowed to send members to join these organizations in order to take the first step toward reorganization.

A labor union cannot be formed unless more than 200 members can be secured. At least two of our members should be sent to a new union to aid in organization.

2) Propaganda

Magazines, daily publications, encyclopedias, and pamphlets must all be under the management of the CEC or the provisional CEC.

Each locality can publish a union magazine, a daily and a weekly paper and pamphlets, and temporary circulars according to its needs.

Whether a publication is central or local, it should be directly managed and edited by the members of the party.

Any publication of a central or local [organization] must not contain articles inconsistent with the principles, policies, and decisions of the party.

3) Labor Supplementary Schools

As a labor supplementary school is the preparatory step in the organization of an industrial union, such schools should be formed within units of various industries, such as the transportation supplementary labor school, the textile supplementary school, etc. No supplementary school teaching several different kinds of work is permitted, except in those cases where the need for such an arrangement cannot be met.

In the supplementary school, only workers can be members of the managing board of the school that takes charge of school affairs. Teachers are employed by the party, but they can attend such board meetings.

Labor supplementary schools should gradually become the centers of labor organs; otherwise they are not permitted and can be suspended or reorganized by the party according to conditions.

The most important doctrine taught should be that which can awake the consciousness of laborers and show them the need for organizing labor unions.

4) Institution for Studying Labor Organization

This institution should be organized by the leaders of various industries, class-conscious workers, and comrades of the party and should teach the proper methods of industrial organization.

The object of such an institution is to discipline the workers who carry on the practical work of the party so that special attention can be paid to such phases as the organization of labor unions, assistance in the various other movements of the proletariat, and investigation of the conditions of the labor unions and of the proletariat.

For the purpose of increasing the ability of the members, the institution may be divided into research groups in the following subjects: the history of the labor movement, the method of organizing factory laborers, Karl Marx's economic theories, and the present aspects of the labor movement of various nations. The results of this research may be published in a series. (In the discussion of these problems, special attention is paid to local conditions in China.)

5) The Attitude Toward Existing Political Parties

Toward existing political parties, an attitude of independence, aggression, and exclusion should be adopted. In the political struggle, in opposing militarism and bureaucracy, and in demanding freedom of speech, press, and assemblage, when we must declare our attitude, our party should stand up on behalf of the proletariat and should allow no relationship with the other parties or groups.

6) The Relationship Between the Party and the Third International

The central organ should make a report to the Third International every month. If necessary, a formal representative should be sent to be stationed in the Far Eastern Secretariat of the Third International in Irkutsk, and deputies should be sent to the various Far Eastern nations to further plans for union in the class struggle.

A.5 Report of the Beijing Communist Group. Zhang Guotao (July 1921)⁴¹

Comrades:

The Beijing communist organization was founded only ten months ago [October 1920]. Just a few intellectuals have joined this youthful organization, and most of them lack revolutionary experience. Because of changes in the political situation itself, our entire operation has encountered quite a few difficulties. For this reason, our work has not been very fruitful. We very much regret to say that we cannot report to you much more about our experiences at this Congress. However, we sincerely hope that this Congress will greatly enrich our experience and will issue principles and instructions concerning all our future activities.

Before beginning the report, I [Zhang Guotao] will give you as brief a description as possible of Beijing society.

1) As you know, Beijing is the political center of north China and, for the past

500 years, has been China's capital. In the Qing dynasty [1644–1911], many Manchus lived there, maintaining an unruly and lawless life-style because of their relationship to the emperor. Even now there are 200,000 such residents. Because of their continuing loyalty, they cannot find regular work. Apart from these good-for-nothings, there are high- and low-level civil and military officials on whom all manner of parasites hang. Then there are their family members. Finally, there are about 30,000 characters engaged in all kinds of suspicious professions. Beijing's population is only about 930,000 and, I dare say, half of them are loafing around. Indeed, one might say that Beijing is the strangest city in the world.

As I said, Beijing is the acknowledged political center. Hence people here should be concerned about politics. Yet this is far from the case. When China had an imperial system, people regarded politics as the emperor's personal concern. After the revolution, it was considered the business of the military. That is to say that politics is seen as the personal concern of senior and junior officers and of politicians who pursue their own selfish ends in struggles for all kinds of privileges. For this reason, people do not pay much attention to politics.

How can this passive attitude of people in Beijing be explained? First, people in Beijing remember very well what the ancient philosophers said—"Politics is not for the common people." This fatalistic idea is ingrained in their minds. Second, for thousands of years they lived under the oppression of a despotic system. Obedience and feelings of dependency are very strong. Third, industrial development is in its infancy and extreme egoism is rampant among workers. Steeped in a conservative, traditional ethos, they have no sense of collectivity; at teahouses or restaurants, one often sees signs saying "No Discussing Affairs of State." This kind of sanction on any discussions of state and political affairs seems designed to influence people from the lower classes.

After the revolution in "literature" (the popularization of baihua,⁴² etc.), for the first time the intellectuals felt the need for new ideals, aspirations, and ambitions. At the same time, disputes developed between China and Japan over the Shandong issue at the conference for dividing war booty. This provoked an unprecedented nationalist movement among students—the May Fourth Movement.⁴³ At that time, students made a great effort to get the masses interested in political matters, but to no avail. Without support from the masses, the student movement languished. This example demonstrates that in this political center the patriotic spirit of the intellectuals has not taken root among the proletariat.

The political movement among the intellectuals can be divided into three schools: (1) the democratic movement; (2) guild socialism; and (3) the anarchist movement. Supporters of the democratic movement do not have stable organizations. Guild socialism has only a small number of supporters. Therefore, their influence is limited. In order to spread their very confused ideas, they simply use whatever papers and other periodicals exist. Even the anarchists are no different from these people. Pick up any newspaper, even including those run by the warlords, and you can find articles about this mish-mash of different, confused ideas; democracy, guild socialism, anarchism, and more. Naturally, this kind of movement, given the means employed, cannot achieve its purpose. As for anarchists, although they probably have realized how important it is to arouse the masses, besides giving out their little pamphlets and sitting in prison, they do not know what to do. For example, during the recent May Fourth Movement, the anarchists gathered together thirty people but were unable to organize demonstrations among workers. They just put out a few weeklies but because they could not organize their distribution in a sensible way, they were distributed randomly.

Those in intellectual circles think that the transformation of society needs their knowledge. The fulfillment of scientific tasks will enable them to gain influential positions, and so they want more education. They regard the proletariat as an ignorant, poor, and impotent class that can be used to further their goals. While intellectuals think themselves very important, the proletariat is not worth mentioning. This tendency on their part is very obvious and as a result is a big obstacle in the workers' revolutionary movement.

Comrades, based on what I have said, we face two important questions that need immediate resolution. First, how can we get the workers and the destitute interested in politics and use the spirit of rebellion to educate and organize them and get them involved in revolutionary work? Second, how can they be dissuaded from their desire to become scholars thus joining the intellectual circles? How can they be persuaded to participate in the revolutionary movement of the proletariat? Finally, how can they be made into a part of the proletariat?

In general, this government of warlords and bureaucrats is not stable at all. It does not have any consistent political direction. It would be easy to get rid of this government if the proletariat made an effort.

2) Beijing's economic situation is not very complex. Beijing is a political center, not an industrial or commercial one. In fact, only millionaires have money in banks. There are very few industrialists, and there are not many big merchants either. Some relatively large factories and enterprises such as editorial offices, publishing houses, the local treasury, precision machinery factories, measurement-equipment factories, and railways are all government institutions. Therefore, the factory owners and the employers are the government itself. To strengthen the patriotic spirit among the workers of the above-mentioned factories and enterprises and to make them work long hours, the government says, "You should do this for the prosperity of the country." Naturally, under such conditions it is very difficult to carry out propaganda work. It is more difficult than dealing with capitalists. Comrades, I would like to call your attention to this problem.

There are many rickshaw pullers among the workers, between fifty and sixty thousand. Although they do not work for the capitalists, they come from lower social strata and their work enables them to be in contact with people of all social backgrounds. We must find ways to conduct propaganda work among them.

3) In Beijing, it is common to see people being bullied. Foreigners insult Chinese; military officers harshly treat civilians; passengers drive on rickshaw pullers with whips, canes, etc. In my opinion, no matter where, once things like that happen, we should seize the opportunity to arouse the revolutionary spirit of the proletariat.

Government officials, officers, bureaucrats, and the police compete to oppress the common people. The cars of the “VIP’s” can run down pedestrians with impunity. They can direct traffic as they please and deploy police to oppress people arbitrarily. All this indicates that there are many opportunities for propaganda among the masses.

Now let me return to talk about the past activities and the program of the Beijing communist organization. We should point out that in October last year when the organization was founded, a few sham Communists also joined. These people were really anarchists, and they made some trouble for us. Because of their extreme view of politics, they left the organization. After they left, things began to go smoothly. We do not have many people, so we cannot now propose any comprehensive tasks. We must concentrate on propaganda and organization work among intellectuals and workers.

Propaganda Work Among Workers

Beijing’s industry is not very developed. There are no big factories concentrating the workers in one place. For this reason, we decided to shift our attention to railway workers. However, all of us come from intellectual families and are distanced from the working class. Therefore the first thing to do was increase communication among the workers themselves. We decided to set up a workers’ supplementary school at Changxindian to train 2,000 railway workers. This school is not far from Beijing and it has three teachers—they are socialists.

This school is one way we approach workers. On more than one occasion our suggestions caused excitement. As a result, all kinds of classes have made demands, and ideas of wage increases, shortening working hours, and establishing trade unions have spread among the workers. Later, they set up a railway union with 340 to 350 members.

Comrades, we should not confine ourselves to setting up trade unions. After they are set up, we should guide the trade unions to fight with factory bosses. Only then can workers show concern for their own unions and believe in their strength. The workers are uneducated and illiterate. Only one out of ten can read a newspaper. Of course, propaganda work using printed materials is not effective. As you can see, we must fight these difficulties and overcome them at any cost.

In brief, the lessons we learned during this short time are: First, good relations should be established between those loyal to the workers’ cause and the workers themselves. Second, leaders should be selected from the workers. Third, we should remind them of the purpose of our organization and to use their own unions to fight with employers so that class hatred will be intensified. Fourth, we must seize every opportunity to encourage the masses to demonstrate and launch strikes.

Of course, because of inadequacies with our staff and a lack of funds we cannot expect to raise the general education level of the workers immediately. Through this school, we seek to achieve only the two aims outlined above. The purpose of the school is mainly to educate workers and get them accustomed to a situation in which they themselves elect those among them with high consciousness and enthusiasm to govern the school and the union. Student meetings provide good opportunities for propaganda work, and it is extremely important to develop the custom of calling public, mass meetings. This kind of meeting is the best way to develop people's sense of common interest and discipline.

What do we teach workers? We constantly tell them that they are being exploited by capitalist factory owners and that this is the reason why they have a wretched life. Also, we introduce them to the history of workers' movements in foreign countries. We constantly point out to them the significance and methods of becoming organized. We often give lectures and teach them how to read. At the same time, we teach them to use words to express their thoughts and make them write about their family's daily life and all the injustices happening in the factory. At first, they were rather reluctant, but we did produce some very good agitators. However, the task of finding true proletarian leaders is very difficult.

I think it is unnecessary to open such schools for workers from every profession. Only in those places where there are no workers' organizations and leaders is it necessary to have a school like this. Experience shows that we cannot have general schools but schools that are specialized, such as schools for textile and railway workers, etc. This kind of school is the necessary preparatory stage for setting up unions along professional lines.

With respect to the Beijing-Hankou Railway trade union, our effort is to get its workers to develop close relationships with us. At the same time, we pay special attention to strikes that occur here and there. Once, as soon as we heard about a strike launched by coal mine and other workers, Comrade Luo [Zhanglong] and I rushed there by train. We wanted to help the strikers but they did not believe that they could get help from outsiders and furthermore they suspected us of being spies and were afraid of us. Hence our effort failed.

Most of the propaganda publications we publish for the proletariat have only a few pages. We often encourage workers to write brief news pieces and print them in our or other publications. Our first publication was Workers' Weekly [Laodong zhoukan], but after the sixth issue, the government banned it. After this restraining order by the government, we changed the name to Voice of Benevolence [Rensheng], but after the third issue we had to cease publication because of lack of funds. We also put out some pamphlets such as Workers' Victory [Gongren de shengli] and May Day [Wuyijie]. These publications had a wide circulation. However, our main propaganda work so far has concentrated on increasing wages and shortening working hours. These demands have become the most effective slogans for our struggle.

I want to give an example to illustrate how important it is for workers to openly organize strikes and demonstrations. As I said before, we planted the first seeds of propaganda work at Changxindian, and on 1 May last year the first strike occurred. I want to praise this strike organized by our comrades. On that day, a mass rally was called with thousands of people attending. Workers made agitational speeches, and some did not even have the opportunity to speak even though the rally lasted three hours. After the rally, they took to the streets. Some 1,500 people marched through the streets, holding banners bearing important slogans, singing revolutionary songs, and shouting "Higher wages; shorter working hours!" Less than one week after this demonstration, about ten small-scale incidents occurred in the factory that caused the management great concern. I would like to remind you, comrades, that we must work with workers who have a sense of discipline. In my opinion, the best way is to help them organize strikes and demonstrations. We must take every measure that can speed up this movement.

Propaganda Work Among Intellectuals

We tried to conduct propaganda work on a wider basis among intellectuals, but our printing house was under surveillance and we could not print anything. We translated some small pamphlets, The Russian Revolution and Class Struggle and The Program of the Communist Party, for example, but we have not printed the translated texts. We only circulated The Communist Manifesto and Conversations on Economics, which were printed in Shanghai.

Although one of our comrades is responsible for the publication of the journal Dawn Light [Shuguang], the journal is run jointly with others. We published some translations and creative pieces. When Professor [Bertrand] Russell was lecturing in Shanghai and endorsed guild socialism, we organized public debates to voice our criticism of him. Very often we have to argue with anarchists and social democrats, but most of the arguments are conducted in the form of public debates and private conversations rather than through articles.

In recent years, the number of public schools has increased appreciably. These schools first teach their students to be patriotic, but we are making an effort to get these schools to teach communism, and we have made some headway in that regard.

This is the end of my report, but let me add a few more things. Although we now concentrate all our energy on organizing and educating the masses, at the same time we should also pay attention to propaganda work directed toward intellectuals. Comrades, a bleak political situation pervades our corrupt society; unbearable social injustices and pathetic living conditions are all factors leading to the outbreak of revolution. Whether we can capitalize on the easily evoked revolutionary spirit of the proletariat and whether we can channel a democratic political revolution into a proletarian social revolution all depends on the degree of effort we put into the struggle where we hold high the red banner. This founding Congress should deal with all the tasks facing us in a concrete way and draw up specific work plans. It seems that the task of this Congress is not an easy one.

A.6 Report of the Canton CP. Chen Gongbo (July 1921)⁴⁴

1) Last Year

There was no organization here last year, nor was it possible to find people to do organizational work in Canton. When we returned to Canton, we established a daily newspaper, The Socialist [Shehuizhuyizhe];⁴⁵ but we cannot claim that The Socialist was a kind of organization. It was a propaganda organ. At that time Canton was ruled by the people from Guangxi, who cruelly repressed all kinds of movements; we also had financial problems then, so there was no progress.

At the end of last year, B and Perlin came to Canton and opened an office of the Russian News Agency [Rosta]. They took some measures to organize labor unions and wrote articles for the weekly magazine The Workers' World [Laodongjie].⁴⁶ Comrade Huang Lingshuang introduced them to the revolutionaries in Canton, and thus they were surrounded by the anarchists.⁴⁷ Although a CP was organized, it would have been more appropriate to have called it the anarchists' CP. Of the nine members of the party's executive committee, seven were anarchists; only Comrades Perlin and Stoyanovich were Communists.⁴⁸ Because of our different views, Tan Pingshan, Tan Zhitang, and I refused to join this group. The paper they published was called The Worker [Laodongzhe], with a circulation of 3,000 copies. At that time, two workers' organizations emerged in Canton: one was the Mechanical Workers' Club and the other was the Kuanshan [Foshan?] Workers' Club; Kuanshan is a small place about 25 kilometers from Canton. Each of the organizations had about forty to fifty members. Because we were not members of these clubs, we cannot provide detailed reports about them.

Comrade Chen Duxiu came to Canton in January together with Comrade B.⁴⁹ They had very intensive discussions and concluded that we must get rid of the anarchists. Just at that time, the anarchists left the party, so we began the building of the real CP, and we declared that the daily newspaper The Socialist was the official newspaper for party propaganda. Altogether there were nine party members, including Chen Duxiu, Stoyanovich, and Perlin.

Regrettably, we were in great need of funds. The Worker [as of 2 January 1921] had already folded; two labor unions had to close because of, first, financial difficulties and, second, the wide dissemination of anarchist thinking inside labor unions.

2) The Present Situation

Now our propaganda agency's newspaper is the daily paper The Socialist. This newspaper needs 700 yuan a month; it is very difficult to continue publishing. In addition, we have a Marxist Research Society with about eighty members. Twenty percent of the members are law students, 20 percent are students from universities and trade schools, and the rest are members of all kinds of political and editorial groups. There are no workers in these groups because it is very difficult for us to establish contacts with them. It is even more difficult to establish ties with soldiers. In order to keep afloat the monthly magazine The Communist [Gongchandang]⁵⁰ and pay for the costs of the workers' evening schools, every month we appropriate 10 percent of each party member's income.

In Shanghai [error for Canton] we have established a school for mechanical workers. Thanks to help from the seven school committee members, we have propagated our principles and hope to increase the number of schools. In addition, we have also established the training institute for propagandists, which is directly managed by the propaganda committee. I was appointed director of the institute. This institute is the principal agency for carrying out socialist education in Guangdong Province. Many teachers are good comrades of ours. We hope that the training institute will set up affiliated evening schools for workers and schools for organizational work among workers. But the existence of this training institute depends on political connections; we can only use such connections.

3) Suggestions for the Future

A. Recruit new party members.

The number of party members in Canton is small; this reminds us that we should pay much more attention to this work. However, when just beginning such work, we should not be casual about admitting new party members. The situation in Canton is very different from that in other places. Even if we exclude the workers and soldiers, we can say that university students sympathize with the secretive anarchists, or are manipulated by the GMD. Because of such difficulties, we should be especially determined. In the future, we plan to recruit new party members from some Marxist groups, from the school for mechanical workers, and from the training institute for propagandists. If other people want to join our party, we cannot deal with them at the present time as it is not a part of our plan.

B. Establish labor unions.

This is a tough problem because, in the past year, the number of labor unions has increased to over one hundred. But all these labor unions have been contaminated by anarchism or are controlled by the GMD. We don't have to talk about the anarchists because there are only five or six in Canton. Of these, three are going to France very soon. We should also point out that, in general, the anarchists themselves have no organization. Our struggle with the GMD is a much tougher one because relations between the workers and the GMD have a long history. As early as ten years ago the GMD was trying to disseminate their ideas and influence among workers and soldiers. Last year, they also instigated the workers to go on strike to support General Chen [Jiongming].⁵¹ Many of the members of this party consider themselves socialist. The GMD CC has a propaganda department that is exclusively in charge of liaison work with the workers, especially with the machine tool workers and the mechanical workers.

Our number one task in organizing workers is to establish the mechanical workers' labor union and the railway workers' club. Now we are taking measures to organize the teachers' union.

On the surface we have ties with the GMD, but we are still trying to organize labor unions independently. Now we have connections with some labor unions like the barbers' union; we are taking effective measures to create influence among the mechanical workers' union. It seems that our initial efforts will succeed.

C. Establish schools for workers.

(i) Schools for labor unions

The plan to establish such schools is: ask each labor union to send two representatives to come to the school two or three times a week. The courses taught at the school include: organizational laws of labor unions, history of the labor movement, the current situation of the labor movement in Europe and America, etc. We think that this school will certainly achieve great results in two or three months and that many unions will be satisfied with our work.

(ii) Evening schools for workers

At the moment only one school is directly governed by our comrades. Although many schools have been established by workers who have ties with us, the work at these schools has not been smooth. The union of mechanical workers has the greatest influence in Canton. This union contains many members who support us. After this school has gained conspicuous results, we will start working on other schools.

D. Propaganda for the peasants.

Comrade Zhu Nuochen, a member of the Marxist group, founded The New Village [Xin nongcun] to disseminate our communist thought; we should do our best to help it and enable it to have great influence and expand its propaganda.

E. Ties with soldiers.

We purposefully put this point at the end because there are no soldiers in Canton. The soldiers in the army are either rotten eggs or bandits. They are dangerous; we must be very cautious with them. Many officers have our respect. We should win them over to our side before too long.

A.7 Circular of the CCP Central Bureau—Concerning Building and Developing the Party, the Youth League, Labor Unions, and Propaganda Work (November 1921)⁵²

Colleagues, please take note:

The following is the circular of the Central Bureau to each district:

1) According to the financial situation of each group, it has been decided that at a minimum the following four things must be done.

A) The five districts of Shanghai, Beijing, Canton, Wuhan, and Changsha must each recruit twenty comrades to form district executive committees, preferably this year and before the Congress next July at the latest. Thus, at the next Congress, the

CEC can be formally established in accordance with the party Program.⁵³

B) The membership of the country's SYL must exceed 2,000 before July of next year.

C) Each district must have more than one labor union under its direct control and establish solid relations with other labor unions. At next year's Congress, representatives from each district must give summarized reports about the labor situation in their respective districts.

D) The Central Bureau's Propaganda Department must publish more than twenty books (concerning true Communists) before July of next year.

2) On the labor movement, it was decided to use our entire strength to organize a national union of railway workers. Our comrades in Shanghai, Beijing, Wuhan, Changsha, Jinan, Nanjing, Tianjin, Zhengzhou, Hangzhou, and Changxindian should work hard on this project.

3) All districts must pay attention to the youth and women's movements. In the next few days, we shall be forwarding to you the reformulated manifestos and constitutions of the Youth League and the "Women's Federation." You should immediately start working on these movements in accordance with these new constitutions.

Secretary of the Central Bureau
T.S. Chen [Chen Duxiu]

A.8 Report of Comrade H. Maring to the Executive (11 July 1922)⁵⁴

From 10 December to the End of April 1922. Contacts with the GMD

On 10 December, with Comrade Zhang Tailei as interpreter I undertook a trip inland through Hunan to visit Sun Yat-sen. At the time, Sun had concentrated his troops in Guilin (Guangxi Province). As a guest of Sun Yat-sen I spent nine days there and then continued on to Canton, where I was in daily communication with GMD leaders during the sailors' strike.⁵⁵ I spent ten days in Canton and then left overland for Shantou [Swatow]. In my opinion, this trip to the south was the most important part of my stay in China. In Shanghai, I had become very pessimistic about the movement in China and its possibilities. In the south, I became convinced that fruitful work was possible. In a few provincial cities I saw how interested the young people are in socialist questions. I attended young people's meetings in Changsha, Guilin, Canton, and Haifeng, where there are student clubs concerned with anarchist and socialist theories. Of these youth organizations, one can say, in general, that they have contributed little in practical terms to the development of the labor movement. Only in Changsha did our youth organization hold a demonstration against the Washington [Conference] and found an association of local textile workers, who went on strike at the end of December 1921. The two leaders of the youth organization were arrested and murdered by the governor.⁵⁶ Especially in the interior it is difficult for the young people to engage in practical work because conditions are still totally medieval. There is no transportation; I was in villages where neither European nor Japanese goods could be found, everything was still produced by the village itself. In such areas, one can do very little with local artisans for our purposes.

Now I would like to talk about the character of the GMD. In discussions with various leaders it became clear that there are four kinds of members in the GMD.

1) The leading Intelligentsia, mostly men who participated in the 1911 Revolution. A number of them became acquainted with socialism in Japan or France and call themselves Socialists. Sun Yat-sen is one of these, and he told me personally that he considers himself a Bolshevik. A group of three of Sun Yat-sen's aides published a monthly Marxist journal in Canton for some time. This was interrupted only when the expedition against the north was being organized. Also among the officers with whom I had contact, there was a great interest in the Russian revolution and the Red Army.

2) The Immigrants. These are the capitalist elements of the GMD. These Chinese have always financed the workers' party⁵⁷ and expect it to reunify China, to establish law and order, to eradicate the divisive influence of the constantly fighting dujuns,⁵⁸ and to defend China's independence from foreign domination. This Chinese bourgeoisie is situated in the colonies and has only very recently begun to set up capitalist firms in China. It has no clear political goal. The leadership of the GMD can never really express the needs of this group.

3) The Soldiers of the Southern Army. These déclassé elements, who live under very unfavorable conditions, have joined the party in some numbers, although some of the generals are against the political organization of soldiers. The younger officers who belong to the GMD conduct propaganda among the soldiers. Sun Yat-sen himself, after his arrival in Guilin, discussed the goals of the GMD organization in several meetings, and he specifically referred to the example of the Red Army.

4) The Workers. Especially in Guangdong Province and among the immigrants, Sun Yat-sen has long had contacts with workers. Leaders of his party supported the trade union organization in Canton and during the strikes always took the side of the workers. During the great sailors' strike in January of this year, it became clear to me how close the ties between the workers and the GMD are. The entire strike was led by leaders of this political organization.⁵⁹ The striking workers participated in the nationalist demonstrations of the party, and all the financial support came from the GMD. The communist group in Canton had no links whatsoever with the striking sailors and did not support the strike because the local party thought it could only work illegally. The ties between the GMD and strikers were so close that about 12,000 sailors in Canton, Hong Kong, and Shantou joined that political party.

The program of the party makes it possible for these very different groups to join the party. Its character is nationalist. It has three principles: it opposes foreign domination; it is for democracy; and it is for a worthy life for all citizens. This last demand is interpreted in a socialist sense by Sun Yat-sen. In 1920, Sun Yat-sen published a book on China's economic development.⁶⁰ This book contains his plans for a state capitalist economy; he states in the preface that this state capitalist economy must lead to a socialist form of production. Sun Yat-sen wants to develop China through the use of foreign loans, but he wants to exclude all foreign intervention in Chinese affairs. After the GMD had been defeated in the first revolution by Yuan Shikai, many members went over to the enemy camp.⁶¹ As a consequence, discipline was taken up in the program of the GMD as a fourth point. That is to say, unconditional obedience to the chair was demanded. On joining the party, members must swear an oath to this effect. This fourth principle is a hindrance to the growth of the party among young intellectuals. Sun Yat-sen complained to me about the younger intellectuals, who are interested in socialism, form small groups and sects, and are worthless as far as China's political life is concerned. Other party leaders told me that since the [1911] defeat of the Manchus the appeal of the party has decreased greatly because the nationalist principles of the party are not emphasized as strongly as before. The formulation of the program makes it possible for socialists to become members, and representatives of various socialist tendencies can be found among the members. Since Sun Yat-sen began to organize the expedition against the northern government, the party's situation has become abnormal. Congresses are not held. Sun Yat-sen has personal dictatorial powers, just as in the Southern [Canton] Government, whose president he was.⁶² The former Parliament of the Chinese Republic, which had been convened in Canton, gave Sun Yat-sen these powers. The expedition is his idea but he has been opposed from the beginning by General Chen Jiongming, the party secretary. This leader thought that the GMD should limit its activities to Guangdong Province at the present time. He opposed Sun Yat-sen's election as president of the Southern Government because he favors decentralization, not centralization. Because he wanted a federation of autonomous provinces, he was sympathetic to the policy of Wu Peifu. Guangdong Province had to bear nearly all the costs of the expedition. Chen Jiongming did not want to have any responsibility for the expedition. Although he was asked three times to assume the post of commander-in-chief of the expedition, he remained in Canton and refused to have anything to do with it. His troops, the best in the Southern Army, also remained in Guangdong. In January and February, a complete break between the two leaders of the GMD was avoided. I had three long discussions with Sun Yat-sen about the possibility of recognition of and an alliance with Russia. He felt that the Washington Conference had created an even more unfavorable situation for China, but he thought that an alliance with Russia would be a practical impossibility until the expedition against the north had been successful. He declared that after the expedition he would immediately propose an open alliance with Russia. It was his opinion that Russia and China together could bring about the liberation of Asia. An untimely alliance with Russia would cause an immediate intervention by the Great Powers. He expressed the opinion that he thought it possible to settle Chinese affairs without intervention of the great powers if there were no links with Russia. I pointed out that his nationalist party propaganda must also lead to intervention, and that he dare not neglect this propaganda, because his entire position would be dependent on the support of a few generals who, at best, could lead him no further than another Nanjing compromise. Several times generals who linked up with him, left him again, and the example of Chen Jiongming shows that Sun Yat-sen's interpretation does not lead anywhere. In January, he would go no further than establishing unofficial links with Russia, and he declared himself prepared to send some of his best comrades to Russia.

In Canton, I met a few members of the Southern Government who all had a positive attitude toward the Russian Revolution. In particular, the president of the first Chinese Parliament, Zhang Ji, spoke in favor of a party dictatorship in China and hoped to be able to support the movement in the south by organizing revolutionary Chinese in the north, either in Mongolia or in Siberia. Only Chen Jiongming, with whom I spoke three times, wanted to know nothing of a party dictatorship. He also called himself a Socialist; while general of a revolutionary army in Fujian Province, he was completely on the side of the Russian Revolution. Developments in Russia had pushed him to the right. He defended the view that in Guangdong Province, which has a population of 30 million, it would be possible to institute state capitalism. Private capitalism could be pushed back, and politically a democratic form of government, with a high level of local autonomy, could be set up. In his view, centralization of all of China would be impossible and the GMD's program was insufficient. It was necessary to build a new socialist party. He financially supported a daily newspaper with a communist editorship, just as he had always helped striking workers. He wanted to send a representative to Russia and declared that he would have nothing against the founding of a Comintern office in Canton. Also, he hoped to reorganize the army with Russian military advisers. Although his attitude toward Sun Yat-sen was very negative, it was not clear at this time that an open break was imminent. Now, after his aide was murdered and he was dismissed as governor of Guangdong, this break has come about. He withdrew into the province with his army to await what measures Sun Yat-sen, who had returned to Canton, would undertake. He then turned against Sun Yat-sen, with the result that the latter was driven out,⁶³ the Southern Government was dissolved, and Chen Jiongming declared himself to be in agreement with the reorganization plans of Wu Peifu. At the time when I was with Chen Jiongming, he knew that Sun Yat-sen was concluding a military alliance with the Manchurian warlord, Zhang Zuolin. This tactic was defended with the claim that only in this way could Wu Peifu be defeated.

To date, the governor of Guangdong has possessed dictatorial powers in the province. No reforms of a socialist nature have been carried out. In Canton, no measures have been taken that indicate a socialist policy is being followed. A few workers' representatives have been given jobs in the city administration, but their number is so small that they cannot exert any influence. The organization of trade unions, under Chinese conditions, has made great progress. The construction workers have a large modern trade union with branches in the province, and it has conducted a few successful local strikes for higher wages. This organization is under the influence of a few comrades. It seeks links with local federations in other Chinese cities and wants to set up a national union. More important than this organization is the Seamen's Union, which has around 12,000 members and which won the big strike in January against the steamship companies and the British government in Hong Kong, with the help of the GMD. Among the metal workers only old forms of labor organization exist, but people are now busy trying to form a modern union. I believe that I am not exaggerating when I estimate the number of unionized workers in Canton to be around 50,000. To date, one can find no Profinintern literature. To me it seems possible to bring the organized workers in Canton into contact with the Profinintern. There is a mutual-aid association of workers under the leadership of a Chinese comrade who came back from America and who is conducting communist propaganda. On 15 January, this organization held a demonstration with the youth group in commemoration of Rosa Luxemburg and Karl Liebknecht. Some 2,000 workers participated in this demonstration. Noticeably, the communist group stood outside of this propaganda.

The province has founded a school to train propagandists for the GMD. It gives evening classes to the workers in Canton. The curriculum provides for instruction in socialist theories.

After my trip through southern China, I visited the Russian legation in Beijing to report and to propose Russian representation in the south. The consul [A. Paikes] sent my preliminary report for Narkomindel and the Comintern to Russia. Because I could not take the overland route via Siberia, I left Shanghai on 24 April after some discussions with leaders of the communist organization and with members of the GMD CC there. I suggested to our comrades that they give up their exclusive attitude toward the GMD and that they begin to develop activities within the GMD, through which one can gain access much more easily to the workers and soldiers in the south. The small group does not have to give up its independence; on the contrary, the comrades must together decide which tactics they should follow within the GMD. The leaders of the GMD have told me that they will permit communist propaganda within their party. Our comrades were against the idea. The prospects for propaganda by the small groups, as long as they are not linked to the GMD, are dim. Only among the young is it more favorable. In Shanghai, a Russian comrade, a representative of the Youth International [S.A. Dalin] has arrived. Together with our Comrade Zhang Tailei, he arranged a youth congress in Canton; it took place in May. Especially in the south, youth organizations are well developed. If these local federations can be brought together it is possible to create an important youth organization. I advised our party leadership to move its seat to Canton and to work openly there. On the return trip, I spoke with the Dutch comrades about the possibility of sending some Communists to Java to overcome the bad consequences of the government's policy.

With communist greetings

H. Maring

Moscow, 11 July 1922

To the ECCI.

Having returned from China as representative of the Comintern in the Far East, I hereby propose the following:

1) The establishment of a representation for the Comintern and Profintern⁶⁴ in Canton in the form of an office to undertake the distribution of communist literature in China, Japan, and Korea; to translate communist literature into the languages of these three countries; to print one of our English-language weeklies; to regulate and support relations between the nationalist and communist movements in China and Korea; and to report regularly to the Comintern and Profintern about such activities as well as on the situation in the various countries. At the same time, this office can serve as a center for the work among youths and women.

2) Organization of the office. The staff of the office should be limited to the smallest number possible. I firmly believe that a joint representative of the Comintern and the Profintern and a representative of the parties of each of the three countries will be enough. At the same time, the latter can take care of the translations into the national languages. For the time being, I do not see the necessity for our own printing shop since a printing shop to take over this work can be found very easily in Canton.

3) Budget. My estimation for the expenses of the office are 500 pounds sterling per month. Included in this are the costs of the English newspapers as well as all the current expenses. The budget must be guaranteed for one year.

[[Points 4 and 5 concern proposals for the improvement of work in the Dutch East Indies.]]

H. Maring.

Moscow, 11 July 1922

Explanatory Memorandum

1) Concerning the Office in Canton. Canton is the only city in the Far East where such a permanent representation is possible without being bothered by the authorities. Links via Hong Kong with the three countries are very favorable, and, with the help of Chinese sailors, the distribution of literature published there would not be difficult. The permanent presence of a representative of the Comintern and Profintern is made necessary by the situation of the young Chinese movement, especially in the south, the expansion of the labor movement, the problems in the Korean movement, and the important situation of the Japanese labor movement.

Optimally, there should be a representative of the Comintern present at the forthcoming conference of the Koreans to cooperate in the preparatory work there.

[[Point 2 concerns sending European Communists to Java to strengthen work in the colony.]]

H. Maring

A.9 Letter from Chen Duxiu to G. Voitinsky (6 April 1922)⁶⁵

Mr. Voitinsky,

This special missive concerns: the proposal of Mr. Maring that all the members of the CCP and the SYL should join the GMD. The following reasons are given for opposing this:

1) The revolutionary aims of the CP and the GMD and their basic policies are not the same.

2) The GMD policy of cooperation with America, Zhang Zuolin, Duan Qirui, and others is totally incompatible with communism.

3) The GMD has not published a party program. Other than in Guangdong, the people of each province regard it as a political party scrambling for power and profit. If the CP enters this party, the faith of members of society will be completely lost (particularly among the young), there will never be an opportunity for development.

4) Chen Jiongming of the Guangdong Shili [Zhili] clique, known as the GMD, in reality intensely opposes the Sun Yat-sen clique. If we join the GMD, we shall immediately meet with the hostility of the Chen clique and we will be unable to carry out activities in Guangdong.

5) The Sun Yat-sen clique of the GMD never tolerates the ideas of new members and uses lies as power.

6) The comrades from Guangdong, Beijing, Shanghai, Changsha, and Wuhan have already met to consider the issue of joining the GMD and, unanimously, passed a resolution expressing total disapproval. In reality, this makes entry an impossibility.

Should the Third International discuss this matter, please, sir, take the responsibility of conveying Chen's six points.

A.10 Statement of the CCP on the Current Situation (15 June 1922)⁶⁶

[[Section One: Before the 1911 Revolution, China suffered from "feudal economic conditions" and increasing foreign encroachment. Section Two: The 1911 Revolution tion failed to change the feudal system into a democratic political regime. The GMD took a conciliatory approach to Yuan Shikai in 1912 and to Duan Qirui in 1916. The CCP calls on the GMD to avoid a third defeat through conciliation by taking "the path of revolutionary struggle." Continued civil war in China only helps the imperialists and hinders the development of indigenous industry.]]

Three

[[The struggles between the GMD and its opponents such as Yuan Shikai and Duan Qirui demonstrate the following.]]

The struggle to achieve democracy is a struggle of one class to overthrow another; it is the replacement of one system by another. It cannot be seen as a struggle of one individual or one group for the overthrow of another individual or group.

Four

A genuine democratic party must show the people two things: (1) its party program and policies must be correlated with the concepts of democracy; and (2) from beginning to end, its actions must support democracy in the struggle against the warlords. Taking this into account, of all the political parties in China, only the GMD can be characterized as a relatively revolutionary democratic party, a relatively genuine democratic party. The party's program has not yet been fully elaborated. However, its public expression of the Three Principles of the People and its plans to develop the economy have a democratic character. In addition to its participation in the revolutionary movement, other actions of the GMD attest to its democratic spirit, such as the actions of its parliamentary representatives in 1911, 1913, and 1917 during the struggles in the parliament and against the opposition parties; the Canton government's [headed by Sun Yat-sen, 1921-22] not restricting the labor movement; its abolishing police regulations concerning "public order and national security"; and its abolishing the law by which workers were deprived of the right to strike. Often, however, this party's actions have been contradictory in nature. On occasion the GMD manifests a friendly attitude toward groups with imperialist tendencies, and on two occasions has worked hand-in-hand with the Beiyang militarists.⁶⁷ If the GMD wants to maintain its place in the democratic revolution, it must change this kind of vacillating policy.

[[Section Five: Revitalizing the presidency and restoring the legal power of parliament will not solve the current problems. The warlords continued to dominate and Li Yuanhong proved inadequate when he was last president in 1916-17. Section Six: A federation of autonomous provinces provides no solution. Section Seven: Those who hold the view that Wu Peifu is a supporter of democracy and is different from the nation's other warlords and thus has the strength to resolve the current problems are mistaken. He must be supported against the northeast warlord, Zhang Zuolin, but Wu is no democrat. Although he opposes the pro-Japanese groupings in Beijing, he is also supported by foreigners. His use of troops against the south was antidemocratic, while his attempts to consolidate the north use feudal means. Section Eight: As long as the warlords remain they will fight against the democratic forces and among themselves. Thus, the warlords are the cause of civil war in China. The warlords prevent the creation of a so-called good government, as a military government can only be a “bad government.”]]

Nine

Advocates of good government! Just after uttering your cries of “Endeavor,” “Struggle,” and “Wage War on the Evil Forces,” Xu Shichang was exiled,⁶⁸ and you immediately opposed the Northern Expedition. In line with all revolutionary lessons, your compromising, petty bourgeois pacificism is an obstacle to realizing your slogans of “Endeavor,” “Struggle,” and “Wage War on the Evil Forces.” Can you realize your aim of a so-called good government while under the power of the warlords? Given the current atmosphere in Beijing, Tianjin, Baoding [Wu Peifu’s headquarters], do you think you can carry out your three principles and the six concrete aims of your program? After the fall of the Qing dynasty [1911], the Unification Party of Zhang Binglin et al. stridently advocated compromise with Yuan Shikai and opposition to continued war. After Yuan Shikai died, the Progressive Party of Liang Qichao et al. stridently advocated compromise with Duan Qirui and opposition to continued war. The results created reactionary turmoil. You with your petty bourgeois pacificism are heading down the same path!

GMD members! Originally, you were revolutionary fighters for the triumph of democracy. It would be better to fight and lose than make a compromise with the warlords and still perish. During the first year of the Chinese Republic [1912], Yuan Shikai made a pledge to support the Republic, and you compromised with Yuan Shikai. In 1916, when Duan Qirui proposed a restoration of parliament, you again compromised. Now you cannot once more compromise with the northern warlords when they propose to restore parliament and the constitution, to abolish the dujun system, and to demobilize the troops. Does the present constitutional parliament differ in any way from the parliament of the fifth and the sixth years of the Republic [1916–17]? Are not the hopes for abolishing the dujun system and for demobilization merely hopes that the tiger will shed its own skin? Would the change of title from dujun to commander-in-chief, as in Yunnan, Sichuan, and Hunan Provinces, make any difference?

Is there any hope whatever for a troop demobilization at a time when war between the militarists is at its height, when they are pitted against one another, and they are thus increasing their troop numbers? Previously [General] Xu Shuzheng said, “I am an advocate of disarmament, but wait until my soldiers are adequately trained and equipped, so that I may disarm the soldiers of my adversaries.” [General] Zhang Shaozeng said: “There are many problems in such provinces as Zhili, Jiangxi, and Henan, and each province needs to be brought under control. If Generals Cao [Kun] and Wu [Peifu] should actually put the demobilization scheme into effect, can you imagine what would become of the provinces?" In reality, they cannot take the trouble to demobilize the troops and abolish the dujun system. This can be seen from the candid words spoken by these two Beiyang representatives. You must complete the historical task of the democratic revolution; do not act like these people; understand their empty words for the lies they are!

Workers, peasants, students, soldiers, police, and merchants! So long as the warlords are not overthrown, there will be no hope of disarming the provincial armies and abolishing the dujun system. So long as the warlords are not overthrown, there will be no hope of reducing the demands for funds to cover military expenses, and this will disrupt further the entire national and local financial system. So long as the warlords are not overthrown, they will be able to secure new loans from the foreigners, bringing about an increase in foreign influence in China. So long as the warlords are not overthrown, the exorbitant levies and taxes will continue, the disorder and chaos will continue, and there will be no hope of restoring order in the regions. So long as the warlords are not overthrown, industry cannot develop, and how can education be maintained and promoted? So long as the warlords are not overthrown, there is no hope that their struggles to expand their spheres of influence will cease. Peasants, workers, and merchants are always the victims of these conflicts. Innocent soldiers and police fall before their bullets. Their war is without end. We must stop this endless sacrifice.

Only by joining the democratic struggle can warlordism be smashed and a genuine peace and prosperity be attained. There is no other way; certainly one cannot adopt the methods of compromise to attain a false peace. Some petty bourgeois figures and politicians use their tendency toward compromise to attain a false peace to oppose the democratic struggle, but we must not listen to them. Naturally, we all want peace, but real rather than false peace. We welcome a war to achieve democracy, to destroy the warlords and to liberate the people. We would sing the praises of this kind of war.

Ten

The CCP is the vanguard army of the proletariat, struggling for the proletariat and acting as its revolutionary party. Until the Chinese proletariat is able to seize power in its own hands, and considering the present political and economic conditions of China's development and all the historical processes now occurring in China, the proletariat's urgent task is to unite with the democratic parties to oppose the feudal warlords and in so doing create a democratic government.

The concrete aims of the present political struggle cannot be limited to a fight for the publication of data on public finances or for surveillance over elections, etc. Our immediate aims are as follows:

- 1) Reform of the tariff system; abolition of extraterritoriality and the special privileges of the great powers in China, estimation of railway subsidies made to China by foreign capital, and immediate transfer of all railways to state management.

2) Elimination of the warlords, confiscation of the property of warlords and bureaucrats, and distribution of their landholdings to the poorest peasants.

3) Adoption of the system of universal suffrage.

4) Guarantee of the people's freedom of association, assembly, speech, and publication; annulment of the police regulations concerning safeguarding public order and the criminal law on the suppression of strikes.

5) Legislation to protect child and female labor and laws governing safety in factories and workers' insurance.

6) Law to restrict taxation on land.

7) Implementation of compulsory education.

8) Abolition of the lijin system⁶⁹ and of other surtaxes.

9) Revision of the legal code with the abolition of the death penalty and of physical torture.

10) Introduction of a progressive tax system.

11) Establishment of a system of equal rights of men and women before the law.

Under the rule of the feudal warlords, none of this minimum program can be carried out by the methods of compromise or by petition. The CCP's method is to invite the GMD, other democratic parties, and all revolutionary socialist groupings to participate in a joint conference and, on the basis of the above principles, establish a democratic united front to continue the fight against the warlords. Since this united fight is one to liberate the Chinese people from the double oppression of the great powers and the warlords, it is an inevitable war that is necessary for China at the present time.

A.11 Resolution on the "Democratic United Front" (July 1922)⁷⁰

The economic and political evolution of humankind constitutes, of course, class struggle. Because of major economic and political changes, it is inevitable that the bourgeoisie will fight against feudalism during the transition from feudalism to democracy. During the period of transition from democracy to communism, because of major economic and political changes, the proletariat must fight against the bourgeoisie.

The current history of humankind is a record of struggle. The great war waged by the proletariat against the bourgeoisie has not yet been victorious, while that between democracy and feudalism is still raging. Especially in the Eastern nations with their young industry, the power of feudalism persists in social traditions as well as in national sovereignty. In those nations where feudalism is powerful, the lives and property of the people are firmly grasped in military hands; law and public opinion do not have any effect. Democratic elements must overthrow feudalism to secure the people's welfare. If the proletariat alone cannot bring about the revolution against feudalism, it must be helped by the democratic elements. Because the feudal militarists are the common enemy of the proletarians and democratic elements, the two groups must unite in common attack. Only in this way can they achieve freedom of the press, meeting, and assembly. No class can find the opportunity for development if it cannot secure these liberties. After the democrats achieve success, naturally, desiring privileges, they too will oppress the proletariat by using the political power seized from the feudal rulers. At that time, the power of the proletariat will depend on its ability to organize and fight as manifested in the period of the democratic struggle.

China is a republic in name, but in fact it is controlled by feudal warlords. Externally, it is a semi-independent nation controlled by international imperialistic powers. Under such economic and political conditions, with the twin internal and external pressures, it is imperative that the proletariat gain freedom and join the democratic revolutionary movement. There is no other way. We must realize that joining the democratic revolutionary movement does not mean that the proletariat surrenders to the democratic elements who represent only the bourgeoisie. Neither will victory by the democratic elements signal the complete liberation of the proletariat. Yet it is a fact that there must be a temporary alliance with the democratic elements to overthrow the exploitation by our common enemies—the feudal warlords internally and the international imperialists externally. Since the democratic elements do not constitute a political party that represents the proletariat or struggles on its behalf, under no circumstances should it [the proletariat] become dependent on them or merge with them even though it should unite with and assist these elements. It must assemble in the political party of the proletariat—under the CP's banner—and independently construct its own class movement.

The CP is not a party of utopians or revolutionary candidates but is a party that at all times stands for indefatigable work, striving hard for the benefit of the proletariat. In China's economic and political conditions, we recognize that a democratic revolution will benefit not only the bourgeoisie but also the proletariat. Thus, our CP should unite with all the nation's revolutionary parties⁷¹ and organize a democratic united front to bring about the overthrow of the feudal militarists and imperialist oppression and establish a real democratic, independent nation. We must call on all workers and peasants to join the struggle under our party's banner. We should tell them that this struggle, although it will not completely release the workers and peasants from their miseries, is the first step in helping them on the way to establishing their rights. At the same time, we should tell them again that the proletariat does not join this kind of struggle for the benefit of the democratic elements. The sacrifice is not for them but to gain a freedom that remains temporary. The proletariat must not forget its own independent organization during the struggle.

posed by the CEC because it meets the needs of the present conditions. From now on it should be expanded; regulations should implement the following plan:

A) The GMD and the SYL are asked to call a representative conference in a suitable place to discuss the best method of summoning other revolutionary parties and what should be done.

B) Members of parliament who support communism are to contact members who are truly democratic to form a democratic left-wing alliance.

C) Labor unions; peasant, merchant, teacher, and student associations; women's political alliances; lawyers' clubs; and editors' clubs in various cities are to organize a "democratic great alliance."

A.12 Manifesto of the Second Party Congress (July 1922)⁷²

[[Section One: International imperialism has wreaked havoc in China.]]

Two: China's Political and Economic Situation and the Oppression of the Toiling Masses

[[A new feature in China's political situation is that since the convocation of the Washington Conference, the imperialist powers have been conniving together in their division of China. British and American support for Wu Peifu in his conflict with Zhang Zuolin is evident. Further, it is clear that the imperialists want to destroy China's old economic system and replace it with capitalism.]]

China's infant bourgeoisie already can unite the nation's strength to oppose the foreign imperialists and the traitorous Beijing government. This was seen in the 1919 anti-Japanese movement [May Fourth Movement]. The Guangdong government organized by the GMD represents the enlightened bourgeois democratic movement. Although the Guangdong government has been turned over, the petty bourgeois democratic movement in China cannot be destroyed. In addition, there is China's intellectual class and the merchant and industrial bourgeoisie who want to avoid the deceit of the Americans. If they do this, their democratic movement can advance along the right track.

The 300 million peasants in China are the most important factor in the revolutionary movement. Because of the scarcity of land, density of population, rampant natural disasters, wars, and harassment by bandits, the extra levies imposed and exploitation by warlords, oppression by foreign commodities and rising living costs, the peasants have become increasingly poor and miserable. At present, three kinds of peasants can be distinguished: (1) wealthy rural landlords, (2) independent small peasant self-cultivators, and (3) tenant peasants and hired hands. The first kind is the minority; poor peasants of the second and the third kinds account for at least 95 percent [of the total rural population]. The poor peasants must rise in revolt if they want to rid themselves of poverty and their miserable plight. Then, most of the poor peasants will be able to join forces with the workers in the revolution, thus guaranteeing the success of the Chinese revolution.

Since foreign goods flooded the Chinese market, the artisans, small shopkeepers, and employers have also become increasingly poor, even bankrupt. In addition, the development of capitalism in China has also speeded up the rate of proletarianization of the artisans. This enormous mass will, of course, bitterly hate the system of world capitalism that has brought them such miseries. They will then join the ranks of the revolutionaries.

The Chinese labor movement has already evolved out of this infancy period. The strikes that were staged for meeting economic demands by the sailors in Hong Kong and other workers are sufficient proof of the enormous strength of the workers and the rapid expansion of workers' organizations recently. Moreover, the workers suffer extreme oppression from Chinese and foreign capitalists; their revolutionary movement will advance continuously. The development of this revolutionary movement will produce the leading army of revolutionaries who will overthrow world capitalism in China.

Three

Many things show that those who have imposed the greatest miseries on the Chinese people (including the bourgeoisie, workers, and peasants) are the capitalist imperialists and the feudal forces of the warlords and bureaucrats. Thus, the democratic revolutionary movement to oppose these two forces is of great significance, because when the democratic revolution succeeds, we can gain independence and greater freedom. Therefore, we the proletariat must examine the political and economic situation of China today. We the proletariat and the poor peasants must support the democratic revolutionary movement. Moreover, we the proletariat believe that in the course of the current struggles, only the joint efforts of the revolutionary forces of the proletariat and the democratic revolutionary forces will enable the real democratic revolution to achieve extraordinary success.

3. The Tasks of the CCP and Its Current Struggle

1. The proletariat's offer to help the democratic revolution does not mean that the proletariat will conquer the bourgeoisie. Rather, this is a necessary step to shorten the life of the feudal system and to nurture the proletariat's real strength.

We the proletariat have our own class interests. When the democratic revolution succeeds, the proletariat will simply gain some liberties and rights, but will not achieve complete liberation. Moreover, the success of the democratic movement will only help the rapid development of the nascent bourgeoisie, who will come into opposition to the proletariat. Therefore, the proletariat must deal with the bourgeoisie immediately, establishing "a proletarian dictatorship in alliance with the poor peasants.” If the organizational and fighting strength of the proletariat increases, this second struggle will succeed immediately after the victory of the democratic revolution.

2. The CCP is China’s proletarian political party. Its goal is to organize the proletariat, use the means of class struggle, establish the politics of the workers and peasants’ dictatorship, eradicate the system of private property, and advance gradually to a communist society.

In order to advance the current interests of the workers and peasants, the CCP is guiding the workers to help the democratic revolutionary movement, so that the workers and peasants can establish a democratic united front with the petty bourgeoisie. In the interests of the workers and poor peasants, the goals of struggle for the CCP in this united front are:

- 1) Eradicate internal chaos, overthrow the warlords, and build domestic peace.
- 2) Overthrow oppression by the international imperialists and win the complete independence of the Chinese nation.
- 3) Unify China proper (including the three provinces in the northeast)⁷³ and establish a real democratic republic.
- 4) Establish autonomous rule in Mongolia, Tibet, and Muslim Xinjiang to turn them into democratic autonomous republics.
- 5) Use the free federal system to unify China proper, Mongolia, Tibet, and Muslim Xinjiang in order to establish a Chinese Federal Republic.
- 6) Workers and peasants, irrespective of sex, should have unlimited voting rights in parliaments at all levels and city councils. They should have absolute freedom of speech, publication, assembly, association, and strike.
- 7) Establishment of laws concerning workers, peasants, and women.
 - i) Improve workers’ benefits: (a) abolish the contract system, (b) adopt the eight-hour working day, (c) provide factory insurance, (d) protect women and child labor, (e) protect unemployed workers.
 - ii) Abolish the individual capitation tax, the river transportation tax, and other major taxes; regulate property tax provisions throughout the country—in both cities and villages.
 - iii) Abolish cash commissions and all other extra taxes; establish progressive income taxes.
 - iv) Make laws to limit the land lease rates.
 - v) Abolish all laws that restrict women. Women should enjoy equally all political, economic, social, and education rights.
 - vi) Improve the educational system and popularize education.

The seven proposals above will benefit the interests of workers, peasants, and the petty bourgeoisie and are the necessary conditions for liberating them from the current oppression. We must join in the common struggle to liberate ourselves! Workers and peasants must rally to the CCP’s flag and unite with the petty bourgeoisie in joining this struggle!

However, the workers should not become the appendage of the petty bourgeoisie in this democratic united front; they must simultaneously fight for the interests of their own class. Therefore, it is very important to have organizations of workers both in the party and in the labor unions, so that the workers are frequently reminded that they constitute an independent class and that they may train their organizational and fighting capacities, prepare to unite the poor peasants to form soviets, and attain the goal of complete emancipation.

The CCP is a branch of the Comintern. Now it cries aloud to the Chinese workers and poor peasants: Rally to the flag of the CP and join our struggle quickly! It also cries aloud to all the oppressed people in China: Come and join the workers and peasants who have rallied to the flag of the CCP and take part in their struggle! It also cries aloud: Come and join our revolutionary friends in the world and advance shoulder to shoulder! "The union of the proletariat and the oppressed people all over the world" is the only means to liberate the whole world! March! March together!

Down with warlords!

Down with international imperialists!

Fight for peace!

Fight for freedom!

Fight for independence!

Long live peace, freedom, and independence!

Long live the liberation of all the oppressed masses!

Long live the CCP!

Long live the Comintern!

A.13 Resolution on Parliamentary Actions (July 1922)⁷⁴

1) In economically advanced nations, the smooth development of large-scale capitalist production over several decades has led to the consolidation of parliamentary politics, which provides a screen for the former. Against this background, parliamentary activities by political parties gradually became opportunist and reformist. That is to say, they became the parliamentary action of the Second International. The social democratic parties and the socialist parties of Germany, Austria, France, and Belgium simply focused all their energy on these legal, tongue-wagging, reformist activities and totally ignored proletarian revolutionary propaganda movements and all other necessary illegal work.

2) The Third International came into being in the midst of the bloody bankruptcy of opportunist reformism. That is to say, it came into being during the imperialist world war [1914-18]. The reevaluation of proletarian participation in "institutions of popular will" under bourgeois dictatorship is important in a number of respects. It wipes the reformist makeup off the face of Marxism and elucidates the revolutionary nature of proletarian parliamentary action. It specifies the steps to be taken by the proletariat in its participation, abandonment, and withdrawal from the bourgeois parliament and in its total destruction of the bourgeois institution of the state. Finally it subjugates totally such legal action to illegal revolutionary action, thereby making revolutionary parliamentary activities an important method of instigating, or supporting, major revolutionary uprisings.

3) An economically backward China has become, on the one hand, a looting ground and a colony for imperialism and, on the other hand, an object of butchery and a land of corruption for armed forces fostered by international imperialism. Therefore, the democratic revolution has not yet succeeded and parliamentary politics has not yet been established. Although parliamentary forms have been established at various levels, they are constantly terrorized because of sabotage and threats of interference and havoc wreaked by the armed forces.

4) The CCP is the vanguard army representing the interests of the proletariat and the poor peasants of China. Therefore, it should enter the parliament that is often threatened and sabotaged by feudal armed forces. It should raise its voice against the recurrent evils of the military politics fostered by international imperialism and bring the democratic revolution to a high tide so as to achieve the goal of social revolution.

5) To conduct revolutionary parliamentary action, and in accordance with the principles passed by the Second Congress of the Third International, the CCP lays down the following rules:

a) Candidates for the national parliament will be named by the CEC; candidates for parliaments of provinces, municipalities, and counties will be named by regional and local executive committees and approved by the CEC. If the CEC considers all, or some, of those nominated to be unfit for their duties, it will order the regional or local executive committee to nominate others.

b) Qualifications of candidates will definitely not be limited to so-called learning or experience. One should feel free to nominate laborers in our party who are the bravest and the most imbued with revolutionary spirit.

c) Members of our party in the national parliament are under the absolute supervision and command of the CEC. Members in provincial, municipal, and county-level parliaments are under the absolute supervision and command of the CEC commissioner and of the regional and local executive committees. All major political issues will follow the guidelines issued by the CEC; members of our party in parliament, either as individuals or as a group (the parliamentary group of the CP), enjoy absolutely no autonomy. Drafts of speeches to be made by members to the national parliament shall be submitted in advance to the CEC for approval. Drafts of speeches to be made by members to provincial, municipal, and county-level parliaments shall be submitted in advance to the CEC commissioner and to the regional and local executive committees for approval.

d) Members of our party in parliament should take advantage of their inviolability to participate in all mass movements and illegal organizations outside of parliament. Whenever demonstrations break out, members of our party in parliament should take the lead and should be at the forefront of the masses.

e) Members of our party in parliament must maintain constant, direct contact with the masses; make several visits a year to the district that elected them; call various voters' meetings; speak on political, economic, and international issues; and investigate new demands of the masses. Their speeches in parliament should be written in a language that can be understood by the masses and that arouses them. Regularly, they should be collected, printed in pamphlet form, and distributed in cities and the countryside.

f) When a member of our party refuses the supervision of the CEC or violates the CEC's guidelines, he or she shall be deprived immediately of his or her position as a member of parliament and expelled from the party.

A.14 Resolution on the Constitution of the Organization of the CP (July 1922)⁷⁵

We, the CP, are not a "Marxist society formed by intellectuals"; nor are we a "utopian, revolutionary society formed by a few Communists who place themselves above the masses," [but we] should be the "party organized by the most revolutionary masses among the proletariat, fighting on behalf of the interests of the proletariat and the vanguard of the revolutionary movement of the proletariat." Because we are not intellectuals going around on the lecture circuit or utopian revolutionaries, we need not frequent research societies and libraries. Because we are the party fighting for the proletariat, we must go deep among the masses, forming a large-scale " 'mass' party." Because we are to organize a large-scale masses' party for the revolutionary movement, we must not forget two important rules:

- 1) Every action of the party must take deep root among the broad masses.
- 2) Within the party, there must be organization and training that serve the needs of the revolution.

Without strict, centralized, disciplined organization and training, a revolutionary party only possesses revolutionary ambitions without sufficient strength to launch a revolutionary movement.

Strict, centralized, and disciplined organization and training must observe the following principles:

- 1) From the central organs down to the small groups at the basic levels, there must be a well-organized system to avoid chaos; there must be a spirit of centralization and ironlike discipline to avoid anarchy.
- 2) All members must be trained by the party to conduct themselves in a military-like fashion.

3) All party members should not only be Communists in their words; more importantly, they must show themselves to be Communists by their deeds.

4) All party members must sacrifice their personal emotions, opinions, and interests to preserve party unity.

5) All party members must remember that the day that they do not work for the CP is the day that they undermine communism.

6) At all times and under all circumstances, the words and deeds of all party members must be those of the party. [No one] may use individualistic or local reasons to desert the party. To engage in the communist movement outside the supervision of the party is an individualistic act, not that of the party, and it belongs to anarcho-communism.

7) Every party member must understand that when the CP enforces centralization and training, they are not enforced in terms of the bourgeois concept of law and order; they must be practiced in accordance with the actual needs of the communist revolution.

Therefore the resolution of the Second Party Congress must point out that our CP must be turned into a party, not an academic society; and that it must be made a mass party capable of launching proletarian revolution, not a revolutionary association of a few utopians; and that our organization and training must be strict, centralized, and disciplined; and that our activities must not be separated from the masses.

A.15 Constitution of the CCP (July 1922)⁷⁶

Chapter One: Membership

1) Members of our party are not differentiated on the basis of nationality or sex. Those who acknowledge our party's manifesto and constitution and are willing to serve our party loyally can become members of our party.

2) On joining the party, the prospective member must have one party member recommend him or her to the district [local] executive committee [difang zhixing weiyuanhui]. After the application is approved by the district executive committee, the district executive committee reports its decision to the area executive committee [qu zhixing weiyuanhui]; the area executive committee then reports to the CEC. After examination and approval by the area executive committee and the CEC, the applicant will become a formal party member. However, a worker can become a formal party member only after the district executive committee approves the application and reports to the area executive committee and the CEC.

3) New members recognized directly by the CEC or those who have already joined foreign communist parties recognized by the Comintern can become members of our party.

Chapter Two: Organization

4) In the countryside, in factories, on railways, in mines, barracks, schools, and other institutions and their surroundings, a cell [zu] group may be formed as long as there are between three and five members. Each cell elects one head; the cells are under the command of the local branch [difang zhibu]; if there are not yet local branches in the places where there are groups, the area executive committee may order the cells in question to come under the command of nearby branches or directly under the area executive committee; in places where there is no area executive committee, the groups are to come under and be supervised directly by the CEC. When in one institution or in two institutions combined, there are more than two cells, the district executive committee appoints various people to act as cadres for the organ[s] in question. Cells are the basic units of the party's organizational system that train party members and within which party members operate. All party members must join these cells.

5) If a locality has more than two party branches, the area executive committee should, with permission from the CEC, send personnel there to convene either a full members' or a delegates' congress. This congress should elect three people to form the district executive committee; it should also elect three alternate committee members—when committee members have to leave their posts for any reason, they are to be replaced temporarily by alternate members. In localities without area executive committees, the CEC is to send personnel down to organize the district executive committees, and they will be directly responsible to the Party Center. Once an area executive committee is set up, it is to take over the responsibilities and powers of that particular district executive committee.

6) If an area has more than two district executive committees and when the CEC thinks it is necessary to organize the area executive committee, it will send personnel to the area in question to call a delegates' meeting to elect five people to form the area executive committee as well as three alternate members; if committee members have to leave their posts for any reason, they are to be temporarily replaced by alternate members. When the CEC deems it necessary, it will entrust a district executive committee to take over temporarily the responsibilities and powers of the area executive committee. The jurisdiction of the area is determined by the CEC and is subject to constant change.

7) The CEC is to be composed of five members elected by the National Congress; three alternate members are also elected by the Congress; when members leave their posts, they must be replaced temporarily by alternate members.

8) The CEC's term of office is one year; for area and district executive committees it is six months. There is no set limit on the tenure of heads of cells, but they must be subject to reelection. District executive committees may appoint and dismiss cadres in party cells as they see fit.

9) The CEC implements all the resolutions passed by the Congress, deliberates and decides on our party's policies and all the methods of implementation; area and district executive committees implement the resolutions passed by superior organs and, within their jurisdiction and authority, deliberate and decide on all the methods of execution. Every executive committee is to elect a committee chair to take overall charge of party affairs and decide on all methods of implementation; other committee members assist the committee chair in managing political, labor, youth, and women's movements.

10) The resolutions passed by the National Congress or the CEC and special problems that arise unexpectedly are to be handled by special commissions made up of several party members who are appointed by area and district executive committees; when such special commissions convene meetings, the chair of such meetings must be a member of an area or district executive committee.

Chapter Three: Meetings

11) All cells must meet once a week as convened by the cell head. All branches convene a full meeting of party members or of cell heads once a month. Each district executive committee should convene a meeting of party branches once a month; every six months the district executive committee calls a full meeting of the party members in the district or a meeting of cell heads. In each area, the executive committee is to convene every six months, on a fixed date, a delegates' congress. The National Congress is to be convened by the CEC on a fixed date once a year.

12) When the CEC deems it necessary, it may convene an unscheduled [linshi] National Congress; when over half the areas request it, the CEC must also convene an unscheduled congress.

13) The number of delegates to the National Congress or an unscheduled congress is to be determined by the CEC on an ad hoc basis.

14) Should a problem arise, a superior executive committee may order a subordinate executive committee to convene various kinds of unscheduled meetings.

15) The CEC must always send personnel to all places to convene various forms of unscheduled meetings. They are to be chaired by the special commissioners sent by the CEC.

16) The meetings of the central and local executive committees may be called by the committee chair at any time.

Chapter Four: Discipline

17) The National Congress is the highest organ of our party; when the National Congress is not in session, the CEC is the highest organ.

18) The resolutions of the National Congress and the CEC must be obeyed unconditionally by every member of our party.

19) Lower-level organs must implement fully the orders of higher organs. Should they refuse to do so, the higher-level organ must dismantle or reorganize them.

20) When over half the party members in a district protest the orders of the executive committee [of the district], they must report to the superior executive committee for judgment; when the district executive committee protests the orders of the area executive committee, it must report to the CEC for arbitration; when there are protests against the CEC, they must be reported to the National Congress or an unscheduled congress for judgment. However, prior to the outcome of the judgment, orders of superior organs must be executed.

21) Area or district executive committees and every cell must implement and propagandize all the policies made by the CEC; they are not allowed to make policies on their own. Whenever a major political problem occurs that concerns the whole country, area or district executive committees are not allowed to issue individual opinions before the CEC makes a statement. When any of the statements made by the area or district executive committees conflict with our party's manifesto, constitution, or the resolutions and policies made by the CEC, the CEC must order the reorganization of these committees.

22) Party members are not allowed to join any political party without special permission from the CEC. Those who have already joined other political parties must formally withdraw from them on being inducted into our party, unless special authorization is given.

23) No party member is allowed to serve as a government official in the bourgeois state without special permission from the CEC.

24) All party meetings are to be decided by the majority; the minority must unconditionally obey the majority.

25) If any party member commits any one of the following [mistakes], the district executive committee must expel him or her from the party:

- a) uses words or commits deeds that violate our party's political programs, constitution, or resolutions passed by the National Congress or all executive committees;
- b) fails to attend two consecutive meetings without any reason;
- c) fails to pay party dues for three months without any reason;
- d) fails to serve the party for four consecutive weeks;
- e) fails to reform at the end of a period of probation;
- f) discloses party secrets.

After the district executive committee expels any party member, it must report the reasons to the CEC and the area executive committee.

Chapter Five: Finances

26) The revenues of our party come from the following sources:

- a) Party dues: party members whose monthly income is below 50 yuan pay one yuan; those whose monthly income is over 50 yuan pay one percent of their income in dues each month; those who have no monthly income or those workers whose monthly income is below 20 yuan pay 20 cents a month. Party dues are waived for unemployed workers and imprisoned party members.

b) Inner-party levies.

c) Support sources from outside of the party.

27) All revenues and expenditures of our party are to be disposed of by the CEC.

Chapter Six: Appendix

28) The power to revise this Constitution belongs to the National Congress, and the right to interpret it belongs to the CEC.

31) This Constitution has been adopted by our party's Second National Congress (16–23 July 1922) and is effective from the day it is released by the CEC.

A.16 Resolution Concerning the “Labor Union Movement and the CP” (July 1922)⁷⁷

The Chinese labor movement is still in its infancy and cannot shake off the restraints imposed by the old guilds and artisans' organizations. At the same time, the struggles of the working class are no more than individual movements [to improve] the specific conditions of a certain craft or a particular factory; they are not universal movements. The workers' organizations are neither strong nor secure; there are few organized workers. It is the fundamental task of the CCP to study this situation carefully; to concentrate, expand, and command this movement legitimately.

In line with the current labor situation in China, the experiences of our past activities and the lessons from the labor movement in Europe in the recent past, we should use the following principles as our fundamental policies for the labor movement.

1) The struggle by the working class and poor working people to liberate themselves from robbery and exploitation by the bourgeoisie must be carried out together with the struggle for the interests of the most progressive element and the most capable fighters among the poor working people—the proletariat. Therefore, in its labor movement, the CCP must concentrate its energies on the movement to organize industrial workers, such as railway workers, sailors, and manufacturing and textile workers.

2) Why was the labor union founded? The labor union is an institution that protects and fights for the immediate interests of the workers. As the laborer is the creator of all goods, the laborer should enjoy the goods produced. This truth is the starting point of the real labor union.

3) The labor union should realize that the capitalists and the workers have nothing in common. Their conflict of interest is irreconcilable, so the labor union should not only avoid mediating between the interests of the capitalists and those of the workers, but intensify such struggles. One struggle should follow another, and between struggles the labor union organization will become stronger and more secure, so as to prepare for yet another struggle. It is necessary to save most of the membership dues of the union as strike funds, but at the same time workers must avoid a fight in a disadvantageous situation.

4) The labor union should do its best to engage in the movement to improve workers' conditions; it should do everything that can lead to reforms under capitalism. At the same time, we must make the labor union advance quickly toward the ultimate goal of the labor movement, which is a movement to overthrow the capitalist system based on waged slaves and thoroughly change society according to communist principles.

5) When the labor union engages in the movement to improve economic conditions for laborers, it must move on to a movement for labor legislation. We should also make the labor union understand: adoption of labor legislation and improving working conditions both depend on a strong organization of the labor union. If we want to make labor legislation and improvement in working conditions truly materialize under capitalism, we need laborers in sufficiently great strength to pressure the government and factory owners.

6) Sometimes our comrades suggest that the labor union not get involved in political movements—this is a tendency of the anarchist labor unions and constitutes a very big mistake. This will weaken the labor union movement and keep it forever in an illegal position. Labor unions must fight for the independence of our nation and the political rights and freedom of our citizens (including the movement for universal suffrage and abolition of the criminal law against strikes). They must also occupy important positions in the democratic united front; only these actions will support the workers through to the final victory. But, at the same time, the meaning of these struggles provides the proletariat with its real revolutionary propaganda. They should not be used for the political objectives of the opportunists. Thus, we should prevent nonproletarian workers from leading labor unions. They must be led by the proletariat.

7) Of course, labor unions may struggle against individual foremen or employers, but the unions must treat and resist the employers as a class; they can also resist the contract system, as well as the system under which foremen oppress workers at will. Labor unions will expand only when all kinds of movements assume universal significance and become real class-based actions.

8) There are two most important tasks the labor union must do everything possible to fulfill: the first concerns collective contracts; the second is equal pay for equal work. Individual contracts are the employers' tool for exploitation. Using this tool, the employers can hire and fire workers at will, thus manipulating the price of labor. The labor union must do its best to fight for the following condition: the employer is not allowed to negotiate and conclude with individual workers any of the provisions concerning hiring and firing and other benefits and obligations. Only the labor union may represent workers in signing contracts with employers. It is also one of the most clever and cruel means of the capitalists to divide workers into separate categories—based on race, age, and physical strength—and determine their pay according to these categories. The capitalists can use this method not only to rob more greedily those weak and young laborers, but also to split the working class into several groups with different interests, so that they may hate and compete with each other. Under these circumstances, the labor union must try to fight for equal pay for equal work. No matter whether the worker is a foreigner or Chinese, male or female, a strong young man, a boy, or an old man, they must receive the same pay as long as they do the same kind of work. No one is to deny them similar pay on grounds of biological and social differences. At the same time, however, we should not confuse ourselves. So-called equal pay for equal work does not mean to cut higher wages to meet lower wages, but to raise lower wages to the same level as the higher wages. These are the two basic tasks for the labor union. The success of the first will increase the workers' trust in the labor union and attract large numbers of them to join the movement; the success of the latter will prevent and eliminate mutual conflicts among workers so as to realize class unity and harmony.

9) The character of the labor union should not be identical with that of the guild. No employers are allowed into the labor union, but all workers who earn a wage must join the union, regardless of their sex, age, religious belief, region, ethnic origin, nationality, political view, or skill. Thus, labor unions should not have such procedures as membership dues that are too high and exhaustive preinduction investigations to limit the enrollment of workers. Only this will enable the labor union to become a union of the masses of the same class.

10) The main activities of the labor union are the struggles against the capitalists and the government; mutual help and emotional ties are only secondary objectives, because the labor union is a fighting unit, not an institution of group help.

11) The structure of the labor union is such that it will enable the union to become a very tightly united organization very soon, with centralized power and disciplined individual industrial sector unions. The sector unions of industrial workers should not be subdivided internally into "autonomous" groups along the lines of different professions, because they will become fragmented groups that prevent the union from waging struggles.

13) The best basic organization of the labor union is the factory committee. Workers in every factory in each industry organize a factory committee as their basic unit, and then organize a sector union. However, the factory committee is exclusively a workers' organization; it must never be composed of a mixture of factory employers and workers' representatives. At the same time, the factory committee should not be independent of the labor union.

14) But labor unions are only part of the structure of the sector union and do not count as ideal labor unions. The real labor unions should possess class harmony and disciplined training apart from being part of the structure of the sector union and having revolutionary goals. They must unite the whole working class and never allow any incidents of conflict between the special interests of one factory or among the workers and the interests of the sector union to occur. They should also mediate between the interests of one sector union and those of the working class of the whole country.

15) There should be a unified organization of all the revolutionary labor unions in the world to fight against world capitalism. This unified organization of the world revolutionary labor unions is the Profintern. The CCP must organize labor unions to rally under the flag of the Profintern in accordance with the above principles. At the same time, the Chinese working class must avoid conflict of interest with the working class of the world. For example, increasing Chinese workers' wages will prevent foreign capitalists from hiring cheap Chinese labor to substitute for expensive foreign labor.

16) The difference between the CP and the labor union is that the CP is an organization of the proletarian elements with class consciousness from all classes; it is the vanguard of the proletariat and has a fixed party program; it is a proletarian political party whose aim is the overthrow of capitalism. The labor union is an organization of all workers (regardless of their political views); in the labor union, workers receive education on "how to struggle in the spirit of socialism and communism" and march toward the same objectives as the CP; but it is a moderate organization of all classes. Just as in a war the army has a vanguard, which is followed by the main strength of the army. The CP may be said to constitute the brain and the workers the body. Therefore, in any kind of labor movement, the CP must be the "vanguard" and the "brain." It must pay attention to all the activities of the labor union and should honestly and bravely lead the labor union movement.

17) In order to lead the labor unions and become the vanguard of the proletariat, the CP should have strong and effective groups in the labor unions, all factory committees, and all labor organizations; there should be few exceptions.

18) When they operate in the labor unions organized by the GMD, nongovernment political parties, or Christian organizations, the Communists must not instigate the workers to leave the established labor unions. Our tactic is to build up our own strength gradually in the labor unions in which they have greater strength, and ultimately to overthrow the leadership position of the GMD, nongovernment parties, or Christian organizations, so that we ourselves will seize the leading position.

19) To fight for the present interests of the workers, we Communists should always cooperate with the GMD, nongovernment parties, or even Christian organizations. But we must also always prove and explain to the workers that only the CP is the vanguard of the workers and their political party.

Additional resolutions:

The preceding resolution concerns the labor union movement of important industrial workers. It is the most important part. Below, several secondary resolutions are listed:

1) Workers' consumer cooperatives are organizations that defend the workers' interests; the CP must pay attention to and operate in these kind of organizations.

2) The CP should also penetrate and work inside the relatively progressive guilds in order to drive employers out of the guilds; we may thus unite with other guilds that are either similar in character or use the raw materials to form a labor union.

3) The CP should also penetrate and work inside those very conservative guilds and the groups, clubs, and schools with which the bourgeoisie have established links to fool the people; we should organize small groups inside them.

A.17 Instructions for the ECCI Representative in South China. H. Maring (August 1922)⁷⁸

Instructions for the Representative of IKKI [ECCI] in South China

I) Whole the activity⁷⁹ of the representative a.s.o must be based on the resolution of the II Kongress of Komintern in the Colonial Question -⁸⁰

II) The Exec. Committee sees the Guomindang party [GMD] as a revolutionary organization, which maintains the character of the revolution of 1912 and which tries to create an independent chinese republic.⁸¹ Therefore the task of the communist elements in China must be the following: (a) the Education of ideologically independent elements, which should form the nucleus of the Chinese kom.Party [CCP] in the Future; (b) this party will grow in agreement with the growing split between bourgeois—petty bourgeois and proletarian elements. Till that time the Communists are obliged to support the party Guomindang and specially this wing of the party which represents the proletarian elements and the manual workers.

III) For the fullfilling of these tasks the communists must organize communist groups of followers in the Guomindang and also Tradeunions—These groups must form an army which carries on the propaganda for the Ideas of the struggle against foreign imperialism and for the creation of a Chinese People's Republic, for the organization of the class struggle against foreign and chinese exploiters.

IV) For the fight against foreign imperialism a special propagandaorganization should be created. This organization must try to develop its work in whole the country on the base of a program of action not only against the open japanese oppression but also against the hypocritical politics of the british and american imperialism and for the alliance with Soviet-Russia, for the association with the revolutionary elements of Japan.⁸² This organization must be established if possible in agreement with Guomindang, but she should be totally independent of this party because Guomindang responsible for the Southern government, has from time to time to avoid a conflict with imperialist elements.

V) The fullfilling of the most principal task of the communists in China, the organization of the Labor masses, in this moment only possible in the form of the creation of tradeunions meets with obstacles by the existing form of organization of the anachronistic G[u]ilds, which are based on localism. The greatest difficulty in the struggle against these gilds is the fact, that they not only exist for mutual help but that they are also organizations for the cult of the ancestors or local divinities. In regard to this religious superstition of the masses the struggle against the gilds in these quality must be avoided. and the attention of the workers must be concentrated on the fact that these organizations are not strong enough for the fullfilling of their economical task and that for this reason tradeunions must be established.

VI) The centralization of the unions should be realized in agreement to the industrial centres, in which already tradeunions exist. The solution of the problem if industrial or professional organizations must be organized depends totally on local conditions.

A.18 The Immediate Tactics of the CCP.

Chen Duxiu (November 1922)⁸³

The world economic situation points out to the proletariat of the whole world three lines of tactics in their common struggle against the world bourgeoisie.

1) In Europe and America the bourgeoisie accomplished its task of overthrowing the feudal aristocracy and establishing its own rule a century and a half ago. In these countries the economic conditions of the proletariat have reached a stage when they can and must overthrow the bourgeoisie and take power into their own hands.

2) In Japan the bourgeoisie has reached a stage in development in which they have thrown off the yoke of foreign imperialism and share political power in their own country with the militarists and nobility. Japanese politics are the politics of semi-feudalism and semi-capitalism. The task of the Japanese proletariat is to force the bourgeoisie into conflict with the feudal class. This is the more necessary now that the bourgeoisie has concentrated its forces and is capable of putting up a fight against the feudal class.

3) In the Eastern economically backward countries, like China and India, the proletariat is subjected to the combined domination of foreign imperialism and native feudalism. Not only has the proletariat remained weak, but the bourgeoisie has failed so far to concentrate its forces against the foreign imperialist and the native feudal class. Frequently, the bourgeoisie reveals a desire to protect their interests by shielding themselves behind the feudal lords and imperialists. In such countries the proletariat besides conducting a struggle for its own class interest must adopt tactics to compel the irresolute and cowardly bourgeoisie to organize their economic forces and to take up the fight against the imperialist and feudal class. The proletariat must by its economic power make the bourgeoisie understand the necessity for establishing a united front with the proletariat to overthrow their common enemy—the native feudal militarists and international imperialists. The victory of the United Front will of course be a victory for the bourgeoisie. But only in the United Front will the young proletariat be able to fight by actual deeds and not by the mere avowal of principles. It can only develop its strength and its own independent class struggle in the complex process of the struggle in the United Front.

The Third and Fourth Congresses of the Comintern basing themselves on the world economic situation, pointed out to the proletariat of the Eastern Countries two lines of tactics required in the immediate struggle viz.: the Democratic United Front and the Anti-imperialist United Front. In its immediate struggles the Chinese proletariat should adopt these two lines of tactics as two inseparably connected lines of tactics and to apply them to the practical questions of the day in order to eliminate the two obstacles that lie in the path of development of the Chinese nation, viz.: native militarism and international imperialism.

The Political Problems

a) Unification and Self-determination.

The state of affairs prevailing in China today is that the militarists relying for support upon the foreign powers, divide and rule China and quarrel among themselves. This state of affairs is a great hindrance to the concentration of the forces of both the bourgeoisie and the workers. We must oppose the policy of the militarists of “divide and rule,” and support the bourgeoisie movement for the unification of the country. We must hasten the unification of the various democratic bourgeois groups, prevent splits among them and also prevent them from cooperating with the militarists. If, before the consolidation of forces of the national unification movement takes place, a local popular rising breaks out against the local militarists and in favor of self-determination, and if a democratic provincial government is established, which is favorable to labor and does not rely upon the imperialists, we must support it in order to counteract militarist influence and imperialist exploitation.

b) Our attitude towards the Guomintang [GMD] Party.

Although the Guomintang Party suffers from many defects and has committed many errors, nevertheless it is the only revolutionary democratic group in China. It is therefore an important element in the democratic United Front. The proletariat must not only cooperate with this Party in the struggle for democracy and unification, but it must also urge it to adopt the slogans of “Anti-Imperialism,” “Support of Working Class Interests” and “Freedom” in order to widen the scope of the struggle. We must carry on propaganda among the workers within the Guomintang Party, speed up the development of their class-consciousness and make them understand that the Guomintang Party is not the party of the proletariat. If the Guomintang Party allied itself with reactionary and dark forces—for example—Chang Tso Lin [Zhang Zuolin], Tuan Chi Jui [Duan Qirui] and Tsao Kun [Cao Kun]—or compromises with the imperialists, we must ruthlessly oppose it. In a word, in any struggle which we may take up or in any combination we may make with other parties, we must always show our true face to the masses. Furthermore, we must maintain our complete independence in any arrangement we may make in a United Front.

c) The anti-imperialist United Front.

The main forces of the anti-imperialist United Front must be recruited from among the workers, peasants and the petty-bourgeois revolutionary Party or its elements. The fight must be directed against all imperialists. At the same time however we may combine with certain parties in a semi-national movement against a particular group of imperialists (the bourgeois opposition to Japan, for example).

d) The question of parliament.

The present parliament has been in existence for ten years. Neither the 8th year M.P.'s nor the 6th year M.P.'s can claim to represent the will of the people. We must demand the election of a new parliament based on universal suffrage and free from the domination of militarist influence. We must also demand the formation of a new government. Even during the existence of the present government, however, we must commence a movement in favor of labor legislation and the recognition of Soviet Russia.

e) Relations with Soviet Russia.

Soviet Russia is the only power in the world which has abandoned the policy of imperialism. We must urge the Chinese government to commence direct negotiations with her and absolutely to prevent the interference of any third power in the questions of the resumption of commercial intercourse, the Chinese-Eastern railway, the navigation of the river Sungari, the Boxer Indemnity and the Mongolian question.

f) The Mongolian Question.

According to the laws governing the development of the State, nationalities representing various stages of economic development, of varying historical development and of various races and languages can at best form only a Federal Republic and the political system of a centralized republic can hardly be applied. This applies particularly to the political situation at present prevailing in China. We must respect the principle of self-determination. We cannot compel people with a different historical and economic development and of different language and race to share our imperialist exploitation and militarist oppression. On these grounds we must not only recognize the independence of Mongolia in principle but we must render them active support in their effort to destroy the special privileges of the nobility and the lamas, and to lay the economic and cultural foundation for the independence of the Mongolian people.

The Labor Movement

The CP is the Party of the working class. It should therefore be based upon the working class and its activity should be concentrated upon the organization of and propaganda among the working class. The Chinese Labor movement now reveals a tendency towards national organization and political struggle as well as economic struggle. Apart from supporting the demands of workers for reduction of hours and labor, increases in wages and labor legislation, the CP must strive to direct the above-mentioned tendencies along the following lines in order to increase the fighting power of the workers.

a) Systematic political propaganda.

The object of this is to induce the working class to advance from the passive, reformist and purely economic movement to an active revolutionary political and economic movement.

b) The factory-councils movement.

The trade-union movement in itself is not sufficient, because by it the influence of the workers is organized mainly outside of the particular industrial enterprise. To organize the influence of the workers within the industrial enterprise, they must organize factory councils for the purpose of eliminating the foreman, abolishing the system of indentured labor and other evils.

c) The organization of national miners and railwaymen's unions.

So far only the organizations of the railway workers, seamen and miners are regarded as powerful factors in the working class movement in China. The seamen have a national organization [General Industrial Federation of Chinese Seamen, founded autumn 1920]. It remains for the railwaymen and the miners to organize in a similar manner. This, after the big strikes, should not be difficult.

d) The organization of a Triple Alliance of Railwaymen, Seamen and Miners.

In a country where the Labor Movement is weak, national federations will not exist for long unless there are some powerful unions which can act as its support. Therefore, before such a National Federation of Labor Unions is organized, efforts should be made to combine the railwaymen, seamen and miners into a Triple Alliance.

e) In order to consolidate and strengthen the working class struggle for power, we must advocate the centralisation of the national labor movement and combat the intrigues of anarcho-syndicalists to break up the labor organizations by their demands for independence and autonomy. At the forthcoming Second National Labor Conference to be held May 1st. 1923, we must submit resolutions on the centralisation of the national labor movement and decide upon the common tasks confronting the working class of the whole country. This conference must also set up a central bureau of the National Federation of Labor Unions whose tasks it should be to plan and direct the tactics necessary for the realisation of a national united working class front. This would avoid the danger of the wave of the Western capitalist offensive surging into China.

The Peasant Problems

The working class movement in the economically backward countries of the East cannot achieve its revolutionary tasks unless it is assisted by the poor peasant masses.

Agriculture is the basis of Chinese national economy. The peasants comprise at least 60% of the population. The most poverty-stricken of the peasants are the landless tenant-farmers who comprise more than half of the peasant population, viz. 120 millions. This class of landless tenant-farmers are oppressed by the upper strata of society and are naturally a friendly army of the working class which the CCP cannot afford to ignore. If it remains isolated from the peasantry, the CCP can never become a great mass party.

The burdens from which the Chinese peasants suffer are the following:

1) Owing to the importation of manufactured goods the cost of living increases more rapidly than the increase of prices of agricultural produce. The formerly self-sufficient peasants are compelled now to sell their land and are reduced to the position of tenants. The former tenant-farmers in their turn are reduced to the position of agricultural laborers, or become bandits or mercenary soldiers, or else go into the cities to work in the factories. The consequences of this are: a) The poor peasants are hostile to the invasion of foreign powers and b) the number of bandits increases and forms an inexhaustible reservoir from which the militarists draw their forces and perpetuate the state of disturbance in the country.

2) Owing to the corruption of the administrative officials, floods and drought cause untold suffering to the peasants.

3) The famine and the civil war cause a constant migration of the peasantry from one place to another. This causes the supply of tenant-farmers and agricultural laborers in various localities to exceed the demand and the resulting competition tends to intensify the exploitation of the tenant-farmers and laborers on the part of the landlords and employers.

4) As a result of the above-mentioned causes the peasants are compelled to borrow money for their sustenance. This leads to the prevalence of usury in the country which mostly affects the tenant-farmers.

To remove the sufferings the following measures are indispensable:

a) Limitations of size of holdings. The amount of land owned by a single person must be limited to a certain number of mows [mu, equivalent to $\frac{1}{6}$ of an acre]. All land exceeding the amount fixed i.e. the land of the big and middle landowners, must be divided among the local tenants.

b) Organization of peasant cooperatives. The custom has long prevailed in the villages for the peasants to collect money to make collective purchases in the cities. This custom must be extended to form cooperatives.

c) The organization of peasant banks. In Chinese villages there are usually clan and religious institutions which collect funds for the purpose of famine relief. These funds and the investments of the rich peasants should be utilized to form peasant banks for the issue of loans to the peasants at a minimum of interest.

d) The limitation of rent. Farmers' councils should be formed in all villages which shall fix the rent for the district for the ensuing year in accordance with the harvest.

e) State supply of land to the peasants. The State, out of funds raised through land taxation, should set aside a sum to be devoted to enabling the surplus rural population to cultivate the hitherto untilled State lands.

f) Irrigation of the important river basins. The State shall grant a sum from the national or local revenues for the purpose of dredging rivers, the most important of which are the Yellow River [Huanghe] and the Hwai River [Huaihe]. This irrigation work will not only benefit the peasants but also improve the transport facilities for industry and commerce.

A.19 Comrade Chen Duxiu's Report to the Third Party Congress on Behalf of the CCP CEC (June 1923)⁸⁴

On behalf of the CEC, I am delivering the work report on the period since the Second Congress. CEC members are too few and cannot collect many materials. Also, because of persecution, many materials have been lost, and perhaps therefore the view is incomplete.

The CEC had only five members, so after the Party Congress the Hangzhou Plenum proposed enlarging the CEC by adding two members. However, Shanghai and Beijing opposed this proposal.⁸⁵ When persecution increased in Shanghai, the Beijing political situation was such that we could still go there for work, and thus the CEC moved to Beijing [end of November 1922]. The organization began to improve. Yet there was still not time to set about implementing our plans before the rampant reactionary clique, after the strike on the Beijing-Hankou railway, forced us to leave Beijing and return to Shanghai.⁸⁶ The plan to improve the organization could not be realized. Because persecution in Shanghai was extremely severe and because we wanted to prepare the Party Congress, the CEC moved to Canton [late April 1923]. Because the political situation was also not stable, we still cannot improve central organization.

The Shanghai and Canton small groups are formed from the local groups of these two cities. Many local small groups in Beijing, Hankou, and Changsha (Hunan) have already linked up to form regional small groups. The Zhengzhou small group collapsed during the Beijing-Hankou railway strike.

Party finances—practically all is received from the Comintern; party membership dues amount to very little. This year expenses received from the Comintern are 15,000 [yuan]. Of this 1,600 has been used for the Congress. These expenses are divided between each small group, but at the same time they are used for CEC work, liaison, and publishing the weekly.⁸⁷ We can only offer a detailed report for the last few months because the remaining materials fell into the hands of the French Concession police in Shanghai, and, moreover, owing to the arrest of one comrade, all usable material was lost.

At present the party has 420 members of whom 44 are abroad, 164 are workers, 37 are women, and a further 10 comrades are still in prison.

Last year we only had 200 party members; this year approximately 200 have joined, of whom 130 are workers.

After the Hangzhou Plenum, with interruptions, we published a paper; this kind of interruption was brought about by the strike. The paper has appeared a total of twenty-eight times, with each edition having an average printing of five to six thousand. But our daily paper encountered criticism in the early period and only now have we reached accord.⁸⁸ Beijing, Hubei, Canton, Shanghai, etc., published weeklies.

With respect to the incident of the Beijing-Hankou railway strike, we published a pamphlet and published declarations about many different situations. Formerly the journal New Youth [Xin qingnian] was published every month but now it has been changed into a quarterly. The monthly *Vanguard*⁸⁹ is published carrying articles of a general nature on China's political and economic conditions and on problems of the international political situation.

At the Second Congress we approved the "Resolution Concerning the Question of Cooperation Between Communist Parties and Democratic Revolutionary Elements" passed by the Congress of the Toilers of the East [held in Moscow in January 1922]. The development of events makes it clear that a united front has defects. After the Second Party Congress when we received the directive of the Comintern on joining the GMD,⁹⁰ we could not very quickly reconvene a Party Congress to discuss this question. Therefore, the CEC and the ECCI representative [Maring] discussed this question together.

Originally, the vast majority were all opposed to joining the GMD, but the ECCI representative persuaded the participants and we decided to advise all party members to join the GMD. From this time, our political position underwent a major change. Formerly, our party's policy was idealistic and contrived, but afterward we began to pay even more attention to the actual situation of Chinese society and participated in the current movement.

As decided by the Second Congress with respect to the "Movement to Strive for People's Rights," "Alliances to Strive for People's Rights" have been set up in Beijing, Canton, Shanghai, Shandong, Jiangxi, etc. In Beijing the majority of people joining this new organization are students; in Shandong and Canton the majority are workers.

Throughout we have opposed the warlords. When organizing the personnel of the Beijing-Hankou railway, we only wanted to struggle against the "Communications Clique" [jiaotong xi], which is why at that time we did not oppose Wu Peifu. But from the time of the strike, we did vigorously oppose Wu Peifu. However, it was not necessary for the CEC to have had relations with Wu Peifu.

We worked with the slogan "Down With Imperialism and Warlords." The slogan of "Down With the Warlords" already had an influence on the vast majority of Chinese society, but the slogan "Down With Imperialism" still has not had a very great influence. Party members should take more notice of the slogan "Down With Imperialism."

Now I would like to discuss union and propaganda work. With respect to Shanghai, its industry is the most developed, the most advanced, but workers' organizations are very backward. It needs a great effort to develop the movement. Many workers' organizations are empty, bearing just a name. We have connections with a small metallurgy workers' group. The GMD has connections with the sailors and tobacco workers. We must pay more attention to Shanghai.

Among the railway workers in the north, we had the best organization on the Beijing-Hankou line, but it collapsed at the time of the strike. The organization on the Beijing-Tianjin-Pukou line is only an empty shell; in reality it does not even exist. The organization on the Beijing-Fengtian line is secret. On the Tianjin-Pukou line, the workers are divided into many local associations. Until now, it has been very difficult to unite workers from different departments on the Beijing-Fengtian line.

The federations of Hunan, Hubei, and Guangdong have relations with us. The unions of the Hubei iron-smelting, tobacco, and textile industrial departments as well as the rickshaw organization all have connections with us. The Han-Shen labor union has good prospects and is China's largest labor union and can become a model. The strength of the Pingxiang miners' union was lost at the time of the February strike, but the organization was still preserved.

Almost all of the over 30,000 people of the Hunan union are under our control. The Pingxiang miners have also joined this federation. The Canton-Hankou railway organization also participated in this federation. The other organizations were set up by handicraft workers. The majority of labor organizations in Guangdong are handicraft industry workers' federations. The construction workers' organization is also under our control.

We only have thirteen female party members (should be thirty-seven).⁹¹ The women's movement in China is still not very developed. We have a bit of influence with the Canton and Hubei "Women's Rights Federation." This kind of federation has also been set up in Beijing and Shanghai.

Now I would like to raise some critical ideas about the work of the last year. First, we neglected educational work for party members; many difficulties encountered can be attributed to this. Many intellectuals cherishing a revolutionary spirit entered the party but do not understand our principles. Workers exhibit a tendency of being divorced from intellectuals, frequently lacking the desire for knowledge.

Propaganda work has been conducted with insufficient urgency. We pay very little attention to the peasant and youth movements, and we have not conducted work among the soldiers. We must carry out work among women; the number of female party members is far too small. With respect to propaganda work with the labor unions, we have not advocated any slogans. At present, for the workers we can only advocate the slogan of setting up a China General Labor Federation. Moreover, we cannot advocate the slogan of the dictatorship of the proletariat. At the same time, we must propagate support in their midst for the democratic revolution.

In our party there exist serious tendencies of individualism. Party members frequently do not have complete faith in the party. Even if the party has a few faults, still it is not necessary to leave the party. We must correct our mistakes. In addition, relations between comrades in the party are not very close; they are very suspicious of each other.

Now I would like to discuss the mistakes of the CEC. In reality, internally the CEC is not organized; the five committee members often do not agree, and in this way work encounters losses.

The knowledge of the CEC is also insufficient; this was the cause of the defeat of the strike. Our political position is unclear. Everyone acknowledges that China needs to carry out a democratic revolution, but our views differ on how we should serve the democratic revolution. Some comrades still oppose joining the GMD. One reason is that our political viewpoint is not sufficiently clear.

Often we changed the location of the central authorities, and this brought about very great losses for work.

Now I would like to raise some critical ideas about individual CEC members. Chen Duxiu, because his view of the current political situation was unclear, made many mistakes. In addition, he is very easily stirred up.

Comrade Zhang Guotao is undoubtedly faithful to the party, but his thought is extremely narrow and thus he commits a great many mistakes. He organized a small group within the party organization, and this was a great mistake.

Comrade Deng [probably Deng Pei] during the Tangshan and Shuikou miners' strike made a very serious mistake and, moreover, in Canton created a great many difficulties. With respect to the regions, we can say that the Shanghai comrades have done too little party work. Beijing comrades, because they do not understand party organization, created a great many problems. Hubei comrades did not promptly guard against conflicts, and the workers' strength could not be increased. Only the Hunan comrades have done a very good job.

Canton comrades created a serious problem in handling Chen Jiongming, a mistake that has only just now been corrected.⁹²

A.20 Discussion on the Relation Between the CPC and Kuomintang [GMD]. H. Maring (June 1923)⁹³

I) Wanting to understand the mind of the Chinese comrades I put the question to Tschue Tsze Bo [Qu Qiubai]: please tell me in which way I must develop the viewpoint of the theses of Comintern and my interpretation of these theses in the conference? Must I give an analysis of the Chinese conditions and make a comparison with other oriental countries? "His answer was: Not in this way, it is necessary to be very concrete, to see the small facts which are dominating the mind of these comrades who are inclined to make the relation with the GMD as loose as possible.”

I cannot follow totally this advice though I will not start with a deep theoretical analysis and though I will give as much attention as possible to the smaller arguments.

II) First of all I must oppose strongly the idea that for example comr. Chen [Duxiu] or I should want to dissolve our party. This is not said in the conference but such ideas are nevertheless developed. I am here as representative of IKKI [ECCI]. I understand something of the discipline towards IKKI. Not for a single moment I was inclined to finish with the CCP. For which reason I work here in China? I think that it is only foolish to believe in my intention to cut out the life of the party.

On the other side worshipping GMD—absolutely false.

III) Second I must warn seriously against the division of the comrades in left and right. This has been done at the end of Chang Ko Tao's [Zhang Guotao] speech and though it is very easy to state this comrade is left and that one is right I have to state the fact that in the young organization very few comrades can explain why they regard the one left the other right.

IV) Something is wrong in the proceedings of whole this discussion after the speech of Tschen Tu Siu [Chen Duxiu]. The these of IKKI have to be the base of the discussion. IKKI is the general staff of the international movement. IKKI gives its instructions as orders which have to be followed by the party. The discussions of Chang Ko Tao and Tsai [Cai Hesen] prove that they try to find possibilities of partywork forgetting these instructions too much.

The interpretation of Chang Ko Tao where he states that IKKI ordered those who are in GMD to stay there is absolutely wrong. When we remember that in August of last year already IKKI gave the order to the members of the party—not only for the south—to enter GMD—the order of January this year which says “it will be expedient for the members of the CP of China to remain in the GMD” confirms the order of August.⁹⁴ IKKI means that its orders are followed in China by the members of the party. IKKI cannot count with possibilities of this kind that members of the old Central Committee, who decided to accept the order of August last year are doing their utmost to make general orders of IKKI useless for the members of the party in general, like IKKI cannot count with opinions of such comrades who in the same time that they help in the establishment of a new GMD organization in Beijing propose that in the North where GMD has no branches our members should not try to develop branches. IKKI supposes that even in the CP of China there is something like discipline and cannot make its resolutions for China in such a way that some or other ingenious inventor manufactures arguments to make passive resistance and sabotage on the decisions of IKKI possible.

V) In the speeches of Tsai and Chang Ko T. carefully is left out to speak about the second part of the IKKI Theses where it is said that the central task in China is the nationalist revolution, that therefore the activities of the GMD and the young CP must be coordinated. Whereas IKKI states “that the working class is not yet differentiated as a completely independent social force" Ho Sen proposes to establish an independent labour party. I prefer the marxian conclusion of IKKI to the illusionism of Ho Sen.

VI) The task of this conference is only to outline its tactics for the next party year on the base of the IKKI theses. The questions on which we should try to find answers are not: must we enter GMD or not? Must our members fulfill the central task of the CP by joining this GMD or must we concentrate us to establish an independent labourparty for a labourclass which is not differentiated as a completely independent force? No the matter of entering GMD is settled in two decisions of IKKI and I should advice the conference to follow the order which was given like Chang KT said after much discussion in IKKI and with the most important leaders of the international movement.

VII) Before us are very concrete and practical questions: how must we work in GMD. Which kind of help can we give them? By which means we must make sure the acceptance of the same practice by the comrades? How must we divide our few forces over the labourunionwork and the political work? How must we make sure that also the educational work of the leaders of our party is not neglected?

VIII) Before I will give my ideas about this practical questions I must make some other remarks to the speeches of CH. K. T. and Ho Sen. I depend on the translation which I get so I must state beforehand that mistakes in my answer are possible.

Ho Sen who defends the idea of a Labourparty tries to prove that the big bourgeoisie of China has no value for the nationalist revolution. Ho Sen sees yesterday and even today but he does not see tomorrow. His method of thinking is static not dynamic. Though the Chinese bourgeoisie partly finds its origin in the feudal elements, officials and militarists, though they have often close connections with the foreign capitalists in the process of growing this Chinese bourgeoisie gets its own national interests antagonistic towards the foreign capitalists. In the internal politics the demands of the Chambers of Commerce are pure revolutionary demands, they want to finish with the feudal power which is not broken in the first revolution. Abolishment Tuchunate [the system of military governors] and the want for the constitution are proves. They have not developed systematic fight for these demands, they try to arrive to realisation by compromises. But nevertheless their demands are revolutionary, and when it is true what Marx stated long ago: "democracy, the republic is the most favorable form of government for the proletariat to gather the revolutionary forces of the labourmovement," we cannot state that the bourgeoisie of China is valueless for the national revolution. Characteristic for the wrong way of thinking of comr. Ho Sen, who cannot analyse the conditions dialectically, is that he comes with the proposal of the independent workersparty (because only proletariat revolutionary) in China whereas he should know that the development of labour as a political force depends on the development of the bourgeoisie.

IX) Wonderful is the explanation of Chang KT that we can make now only an antijapanese movement but not anglosaxon. It is not difficult for us to understand that the nationalist movement demonstrates itself mostly as an antijapanese movement. Chinese Bourgeoisie is competing much more with the products of Japanese than other industry. The methods of Japanese imperialism are more open and more hurting nationalist feeling. But that the nationalist movement in China can only be antijapanese till the anglosaxons are defeated is new for me. When Chinese industry enters the field of production where they find Anglosaxons as their antagonists they will take stand against them as they take stand against Japan. We have to state the fact that the demand to increase the customtariff goes against all foreign capitalists and that the French demand to pay the boxers indemnity in goldfrances, the treatment of the houseboy in Schanghai by british police awake the same kind of antiimperialistfeelings against Britain and France as exists against the Japanese.

The fact that the nationalist propaganda has been poor and onesided, that the nationalist propaganda forgets too much the crimes of anglosaxon imperialism does not mean that with a good propaganda a clear understanding of imperialism cannot be spreaded and cannot result in a general antiimperialistic movement.

X) Both of them Hosen and Chang K T will base the tactic of our party on illusions and dreams.

The Great importance of Lenin is his close touch with the reality in Russia, his commonsense in application of his revolutionary tactics. Radek about this point Lenin and the opposition in the Brestlitovs[k]negotiations.

Marx about the task of the revolutionists.

XI) The exageration of our results in labourwork is ridiculous. How is it with the workers with whom we came in touch?

I am sorry to say that I came not much in touch with them. I have only investigated our methods of work and the ideas of comrades who have much touch. I state the fact that these informations of comrades Mau [Mao Zedong], Wang [Wang Hebo], Teng Pe [Deng Pei], and Wang Yung Tchang [Wang Yongzhang]⁹⁵ are all the same in this point: the workers are interested in the question of improving their conditions, their understanding of politic and classstruggle poor.

Wang who has a keen eye finds among the Pukow [Pukou] workers monarchist tendencies, the worker in the interior still means that politics are not on the world for him. The same Wang states that the Hongkongworkers are the most advanced in China—their political feeling is nationalist.

Mau explained to me: dominating interest for questions of daily life, not much political interest.

The same impressions I got from the informations of Teng Pe and Wang Yung Tchang. (Shan[dong])—

Even about the results in Hupeh we should not mislead ourselves. How we organized the railwayunion? What were these comrades appointed by the Communication department who could quietly organize. Why we went to workers under the flag of the "Laboursecretariate" and not of the Communist party?

What are the results of the work in Shanghai and Tientsin, where so many thousands industrial workers live?

We may say that we got the experience that we can farther develop unionwork but we should not make the mistake of mixing the idea of a workersparty and workersunion.

When ChangKT dreams of the power of labour he likes to work with millions. Comrade Mau told me that Hunan has 30 millions population and 30 till 40 thousand modern workers. He is at the end of his latin with labourorganization and was so pessimistic that he saw the only salvation of China in the intervention by Russia.

How scattered these 1.4 million workers are, how many of them are women and children in the textile and tobaccoindustry? How many of them where the foreign powers control the industry which means that nationalist feeling will develop itself in the workers?

The political interest of these modern workers will be before all interest in the nationalist movement.

XII) We only some months with a small weekly paper [The Guide Weekly] are trying to develop revolutionary character of the nationalist movement. When we seriously take up the task we must succeed. I am not like Mau so pessimistic that the Chinese nationalist movement can only succeed after the worldrevolution. Anyhow we have not to make speculations what will come first but in any case we have to act in the same way.

XIII) Development of Labourunions possible. Soon the time will come that the Laboursecreatariate will be substituted by real federation of unions. In these unions we continue our work to develop revolutionary spirit and take stand against all reformist tendencies the same from where they come.

We are also in the labourwork in a difficult position. After the first aggressive moves defeats have come in many strikes. YMCA is bringing systematically reformist tendencies in labour.

We will fight against this proving to the workers that only by revolutionary struggle they can develop their power.

This revolutionary struggle will in this period mainly have revolutionary nationalist character.

XIV) When with the theses in hands there can be no doubt that we have to join GMD and that we have to make our central task the nationalist movement on the other side that we have to develop labourunions and the revolutionary spirit which is useful for the execution of our central task the question comes how work in GMD?

The answer has been given in the theses of ChenTS [Chen Duxiu]. Taking stand against the pure military activities of GMD against the cooperation with imperialist powers and their feudal agents we push to revolutionary propaganda and revolutionary activities. We push GMD to take leading of the nationalist movement. The comrades want to be sure that they will succeed and some very careful men will wait with our help till GMD is good. These comrades are in this way cutting of the possibility of fullfilling our headtask. Never revolutionists can adopt such a practice and never they can in their decisions depend on speculation.

XV) We heard that there is fear that we bringing the workers in GMD kill their revolutionary spirit. When communists are going in GMD they go there because they mean that the interests of the working class are best of all promoted by this tactic. Our spiritual power is strong has been said by KOTao [Zhang Guotao]. For this reason I don't fear the contact of Chinese communists inside GMD with other tendencies (when commu[nists] can go there why workers, tradeunionmen should not be inside GMD). I believe in our spiritual power, I believe that we can only win by this tactic. When we will create a strong left wing in GMD we must be consequent and not so careful that we will prevent GMD to become nationwide revolutionary party.

XVI) The discussions proving how poor is the marxian knowledge in our own group we publish our own propagandamaterial to enlarge the marxian knowledge. Our task is in this way threefold: the spiritual force of the members of our party we enlarge by educational work, the labourunions we develop by our strong efforts in the most important labourcentres of China and last but not least by giving our strong support for the development of the revolutionary nationalist movement, by developing the GMD as a revolutionary nationalist party we mobilize the force in China which will contribute powerfully in the international struggle against worldimperialism.

We give in this work our special attention to the mobilisation of the peasants. Doing this work we maintain our name as a communist party. We are not so opportunistic to think about changes of name. Our name can do for the task we have. The comrades who are so anxious to liquidate the communist party as such in order to make a "massparty of workers" or workers and peasants in their dreams stated that more than one party can combine their efforts in the nationalist movement. We think the same and for this reason the communist party of China, the pushing power in the nat.rev.movement, will live and grow.

XV) Necessary is a good majority for Chen's theses. Their character is absolutely in agreement with the these of IKKI, the comm. Party as a good centralized organization with a strong spirit or discipline has the duty to show to the International that its spiritualpower can develop a strong nationalist movement with a strong nationalist party.

A.21 Letter from Zhang Guotao to G. Voitinsky and Musin (16 November 1923)⁹⁶

Beijing Nov. 16th, 1923.

Dear com. Voitinsky and Mussin,

Your both personal favors reached to me one after the other. I am very thankful of you both friendly reminding me how I should work in our party. At the same time I am very sorry that I did not write you on the Chinese situation frequently and fully. So it is quite possible that my friends in Moscow may misunderstand me.

In answering you all the questions which were put down by your both letters, of course by my personal views, in a completed way, it seems too difficult for me, as my language is so poor. But I shall do my best in a brief way.

I) Our relation with the Koumintang [GMD]

When the question of our relation with GMD arrived to the last party conference, Many of our comrades did not make their ideas very clear. in order to show the differences of opinions between me and the comrades who stood opposite to me, we may compare the ideas between Maring and me.

Com. Maring's opinion was as following:—

The labor movement in China is too weak and it practically means nothing. The CCP was organized in an artificial way and was born too early. At present only the nationalist movement can be developed in China. GMD represents the nationalist movement but it must be reorganized. Now we have the opportunity to reorganize GMD and also there is such possibility. Comintern regards that the central task of CCP in this time is nationalist movement and Soviet Russia should support GMD. So the Chinese communists must concentrate their efforts to reorganize GMD and work inside of GMD and develop GMD. All the political propaganda work of the CCP shall be done inside of GMD except the marxian educational propaganda work. Labor movement should be carried on inside of GMD and workers all over China must be brought into GMD. Only after the class consciousness of the workers inside of GMD should be developed, a left-wing of GMD will grow out. Only at that time a real CCP can be formed. This is the only process of the Chinese revolutionary movement.

Yes, we agreed that the Chinese Labor movement and C.C.P. is too young and too weak, only the nationalist movement can be developed in China at present and the central task of CCP in this time is the nationalist movement. But, is GMD representing the nationalist movement? is there possibility to reorganize GMD? and is this the only process of the Chinese revolutionary movement? Those are the points which we were in doubt.

When we were going to discuss this question, the comrades who stood opposite me cried: "Be honest to the nationalist movement and "Don't be afraid of GMD, labor movement will not loss itself inside of GMD." Instead of proving the correctness of their ideas by objective analysis, much such subjective terms were expressed by them. Even such simple mistakes, as "there is no labor movement in China and the so-called labor movement are really nationalist movement" and "to talk about class struggle means to destroy the unity of the nationalist movement," were made by some leading comrades. From this mistakes you shall see how this tactics was misinterpreted.

The main points of my remarks made in the last party conference were as following:—

1) The Chinese nationalist movement which is confined by its complex political and economical situation is something not the same as that in other colonies, such as in India and in Egypt. Up till now it is hardy to say that we have a pure nationalist movement. We have only a nationalist movement set against Japanese imperialists and which at the same time more or less utilized by the American imperialists. Instead of a nationalist movement against America and British Empire, there is a tendency, created by them, to pro-them. GMD which always only engaged in making government and carrying on military action compelled to compromise with this or that foreign imperialist and domestic militarist and therefore has ceased to be a nationalist party.

2) The Chinese bourgeoisie (That is, industrial capitalists bankers, and merchants) still very much depend upon the foreign capitalists in every direction, especially economically. Even there are some contradictions rising between the foreign imperialists and domestic bourgeoisie, but the domestic bourgeoisie is still far off as a conscious force set against the foreign oppression. (Except against Japanese oppression)

3) The force of the working class even is very young and weak but it has shown in their struggle that it already something. This force cannot be totally neglected. This is a labor movement and cannot be explained as a nationalist movement.

4) We cannot expect that a nationalist movement which means a movement against all the strong powers in the world will come very easy. It needs some years. And a real nationalist party will not come out so easy as what you think. At the same time labor force is already something and it will be one of the strong factors of the coming nationalist movement.

5) GMD is now not representing the nationalist movement and must be reorganized. The question is that we need a force to compell GMD starting to reorganize itself. As long as we have no force to compel GMD, I see the possibility of reorganization of GMD is too uncertain.

6) Therefore in the present time we, communist, shall at first continue to propagate the nationalist ideas in general, and especially do our large part to organize the workers and peasants and bring them into the nationalist movement. Then in next step we shall use our forces to reorganize GMD or in any other form to set us in the combined nationalist movement.

7) At the same time we shall remain in GMD, organize branches for it and try to reorganize it. It means we work inside of GMD for the purpose to creat the possibility of reorganizing GMD or in general it means to find the new life of nationalist movement. This work do not mean the predominant one but as same important as work mentioned above (in paragraph 6). The idea that is to reorganize GMD right now and if not successful then leave GMD even within a short time cannot be agreed by us. We should remain in GMD for some years, because we must get something from GMD.

8) As the reorganization of GMD has not been achieved and it still concentrate its efforts for military action and to creat government, we, communists, in one side, must remain as an unit to propagate independently our own political ideas with regard to the present Chinese situation and in the other side, the trade union movement must not pass from our hands to the GMD's hands.

9) We must not forget that to organize workers and to develop their consciousness is our special task. At the same time the process of the Chinese revolutionary movement is still not clear to us and it may be from the very beginning that the labor force will be the left wing of the combined nationalist movement. Therefore, in this time only in such labor centers where the communists has a strong hold we ourselves shall organize the GMD branches, but in such labor centers where the communists are still very weak and at the same time GMD has no any influence there, we shall not let GMD to organize branches and shall also not let their influence flows in. Only in Guanzhou and Hong Kong our work in the labor field is compelled to be carried on inside of GMD.

There were some more points which I want to point out for you.

1) At that time our comrades too much expect for the unity of nationalist movement. But GMD not only is not a real nationalist party but it is still not an organized party. It is too early to talk about unity of nationalist movement. Now we can only talk about creating some basis of the nationalist movement and thus opening a new life of nationalist movement and then combine the different factors into one combined nationalist movement.

2) The facts tell us that the coming of a real Chinese nationalist party needs some years. Many preliminary propaganda works must be done first. The Chinese people, even the revolutionists, up till now, don't feel the necessity to organize a party and revolutionary work means to them so narrow that it is only military action. Dr. Sun Yat Sen, himself, always strongly holds his old idea that the revolutionary process is first seize the political power by military force and then come to the period of education and propaganda. He and his followers also thinks first they must be in power and then organize a party.

If GMD will be a hopeful party, its leaders must first give up totally the ideas of organizing government and military action and sincerely accept the ideas of organizing a party first. When the GMD leaders have not give up their old ideas and their old ways of action, it would be no wise for Soviet Russia to support their struggling. Because GMD will never be successful in its struggle against the northern army and Chen Chien Ming [Chen Jiongming], Sun Yat Sen may soon be thrown away by his own generals and the Canton government may soon be broken into pieces. To support the Canton government means not only useless but also means to delay the nationalist movement going to the right way of process. Only after GMD was defeated and already gave up its old ideas and got accept the new ways, support can be given.

3) After the last party conference, attempts to reorganize GMD were maken by the new central committe of CCP but unfortunately it was not successful. After this so the new central committe of CCP said "It is hopeless to reorganize GMD from the top and we must reorganize it from the bottom." And it seems to me that now the EC [Executive Committee] of CCP concentrates its ideas to organize a young nationalist league. A personal letter of Com. Chen Too Su [Chen Duxiu] reached to me recently and stated that he feels now the political theses (that is, the theses of our relation with GMD) adopted by the last party conference is somehow unpracticable. It proved quite clear that the plan of com Chen Too Su and Maring met difficulties and cannot carry out into life at present. And the difficulties were not set by the opponents of our party but by the actual situation.

4) When the Declaration of CCP for proposing a national congress [National Assembly] reached to Shanghai, at that time I was in Shanghai, a city communist conference of Shanghai was called to discuss on this declaration.⁹⁷ Some remarks was made by me as following:—"A national congress as planned in this declaration cannot be organized immediately. In one side we must propagate the idea of such a national congress and constantly demand it but, at the other side, we must hurry up to organize workers and peasants and go to the local nationalist organizations so that we can fulfil the plan given by this declaration." Though a few comrades spoke that the national congress must carry into life immediately and regard my ideas mean "sabotage" (The word "sabotage" was much used in the last party conference). But after a short discussion my ideas were accepted by that city conference. It shows clear that when we come to try to start some political movement then every Chinese comrade will understand how it is important to organize the workers and peasants. It is important as to organize or reorganize "a nationalist party," and we cannot wait that the real nationalist party comes out first and then to start to organize the workers and peasants.

5. Some one may say how young and weak is the CCP and how the CCP is incapable to organize the workers and peasants. Yes, we know quite well how CCP is. But as the nationalist mass party still lives in our heads, so we now can only push the poor CCP to bear the both tasks, that is to form a nationalist party and to organize the workers and peasants.

But now the situation is some changible and we have some new facts to discuss this question. The above lines only show how was this question in the last conference of the CCP There is such news which was appeared since last week that GMD will call a national party congress in Jan 15th 1924.⁹⁸ Therefore now we must concentrate our attention to the coming GMD Congress. In my last letter I preferred to write an article about this question for you but I shall postpone to write that article and turned to discuss this coming GMD Congress with you.

The news tells that every province should send six representatives to the GMD congress held at Canton in Jan 15th 1924 and three representatives of each province should be appointed by Dr. Sun Yat-Sen and three will be elected by the provincial branches.

In the city communist conference of Beijing held at last Monday I made a report on the coming GMD congress. I prefer to write you the main points of my report which will show my ideas towards the coming Congress. The main points of my report was as following:—

A national GMD Congress which we have demanded since a year ago will come after two months. Though we have still not received any informations and instructions about this event from EC of CCP we must hurry up to discuss it and to prepare it.

Whether the congress can be held in time or not it depends on the war situation in Canton. But in Beijing now no one can tell how the war situation in Canton is and how it will be.

Whether this congress will be successful or not, I cannot tell exactly. But as the news tells that only 6 representatives sent from each province, then the representatives may be mostly the representatives of GMD generals and then very few representatives representing the ideas of the common GMD members. Thus the Congress will bring poor results.

First, we must demand the increasing of representatives especially such province like Kwantung [Guangdong] must largely increasing its representatives. We must propose that the prominent members of GMD, the revolutionists who are friends of GMD but are not members of it and the representatives of different nationalist and revolutionary organizations should be invited to the Congress. So the result will mean increasing of mass influences in this congress.

Second, we must demand the GMD members of different places hold their meetings to discuss the coming Congress. All the GMD presses should be mobilized to discuss and propagate about the coming Congress. And especially our presses should start to discuss this question right now.

Third, the EC of CCP should invite some progressive elements in GMD and non-GMD revolutionists to draft together a program for the coming congress and prefer it to the congress. The coming congress will show how our relation with GMD ought to be. If our program will be accepted by the congress, then it is very good and if not, this group of revolutionists who draft the same program with us shall stand with us as the left wing inside of GMD.

In this congress at least we must try to change the idea of seizing a province by military force first and then to fight for provinces and then to develop the GMD and turn into the idea first to organize a strong centralized party and then to carry on revolution. This is our main demand in that congress.

My report was accepted by this city conference, and decided to report it to the EC of the CCP and at the same time I was elected to draft the outlines of the said program as the basis for discussing in the next local party conference and then to send to EC of CCP for final decision.

Here I shall only tell one more fact about this question. In Shanghai some of GMD members developed a sentiment against our remaining in GMD since last month. Com. Li Sui-chang [Li Dazhao] went to Shanghai for this sake. It seems to me different opinions of GMD members with regard to our entering to GMD is developing and become gradually acute. But I did not get any information recently, so I cannot tell exactly.

II) The present situation of our party

In the concluding session of last canton conference of CCP when Maring greeted the success of last conference, he expressed that, at one side, the conference has moved away the "obstacles" in solving the party organization question and, at other side, that he hope we, the comrades who do not satisfy the results of that conference, will not be "non-cooperation" and "sabotage." Fortunately the "obstacles" not only did not go to "non-cooperation" and "sabotage," but they are still as active as before. If those "obstacles" had really been moved away from CCP by Maring, I don't know how maring will greet the success of that conference.

As soon as the conference was closed, the mistakes of that conference were shown out. The atmosphere of opposing the theses of our relation with GMD was developed in the branches of CCP and the opponents may be in majority. Moreover, such big branches like Changsha, Hankow [Hankou] and Beijing were trying to demand a party conference soon called once more to settle this question of our relation with GMD. At that time we not only did not utilize these opportunity to set against last conference and the new EC of CCP but also by our help such atmosphere was put down because we know quite well that our poor party was hardly to bear such blows.

In last party conference when the question of our relation with koumintang was hotly discussed some comrades did not proceed purely along the objective observations of the actual Chinese situation and, moreover, instead of avoiding the difficulties in that hot discussion, even utilized the troubles of our party organization question inside or outside of the conference to attack on me. I don't know now that how I has been talked in Moscow. I shall answer openly: "yes, we are young, it is quite nature that we all together have maken many mistakes, even very simple mistakes, but some mistakes did not and shall never make."

You both remind me that I must stand for the integrity of the young and still weak CCP and Com Mussin even expressed that he believes that I shall not try to create any new difficulties and dissensions in the party. Surely I have been and am being stand for the unity of our poor party. Communism which I regard as my life and the young Chinese communist movement in which from the very beginning I took part will never be harmed by my own hands.

In general speaking now our party has no trouble coming from last conference. Even some small troubles often come out in this or that branch of CCP, it is only because our party is not well organized and the members are too young and individualistic. Our party work make no progress recently largely because we meet the actual difficulties such as lack of means. Some decisions did not carry out by the new EC but it never means that the comrades prevented their carrying out. I shall now prefer to write a few lines about party work by my own views.

Since our conference decided the tactics with regard to GMD, it seems to me that the party organs now make no intensive propaganda or demand on GMD question. Even the declaration for a national congress published by our party, but no propaganda was maken on this proposal. Our party presses cannot published in time.

One of the best branches is the branch in Changsha which influenced by the war situation, together with the trade unions in Changsha are now in a position hardly to be active. The headquarter of that branch in Changsha was suppressed by general

Tao-Hen-Ti [Zhao Hengti, the military governor of Hunan]. The Supporting Diplomacy Society in Hankow [Hankou] which was a nationalist organization against Japan and recently set itself begin to attack British imperialists and upon which we based more or less to carry on nationalist movement in Hankow was also suppressed by the Tuchun of Hupei [Hubei]. The trade union movement in some places shows itself progress. As I did not get the whole information now I cannot tell exactly But at the same time there is also some crisis shown. There are some labor leaders in Shanghai who are more or less opposing to us plan to call national labor congress, national railway workers' congress and the workers conference of Beijing-Hankow line. Of course, there are some politicians stand to support the plans of these labor leaders. We have also the plan to call those conferences. Whether we can cooperate with them in a smooth way or not, it is still unknown. Politicians of Communication clique [Jiaotongxi] and Marshall Chang-Tso-Lin [Zhang Zuolin] and others are trying to utilize the workers for their struggle against Chili [Zhili] clique. Some workers' leaders seek for support from this or that politician. Chang-Tso-Lin's 10,000 dollars for the Beijing-Hankow Railway union were much spreaded among the workers. Too much hope for Chang Tso Lin's victory has been expressed by the railway workers. That a worker communist in the Beijing-Hankow Railway union in Hankow ran away with 2,000 dollars causes the loss of the communist confidence among the workers and the workers thus went to some other labor leaders who are more or less opposing to us. If those leaders would, in one side, get close relation with some politicians or Chang Tso Lin and, in other side, get confidence from the workers, In future it may be the main cause to split labor movement in central and northern China. Before these leaders have no any connection with any politicians, it is that we sending comrades to Mukden [i.e. to Zhang Zuolin's headquarters, Shenyang] opened their attempts. We have done the mistake of sending comrades to Mukden so now we may suffer the losses.

In conclusion, we must not neglect the good side of CCP While we saw the comrades who attended the last conference took an active part in discussing the political questions in a practical way. It show the growth of our party. I was very glad for this fact and mentioned this fact a few times in that conference. The CCP, the only one we have, organized by a group of young sincere revolutionists who want to act along the marxist line will have its future. I hope Comintern and Profintern will give us more support, especially for the trade union movement, so that the Chinese movement can be progressive more rapidly.

A few words shall be written on my personal conditions now. I am now working in Beijing. My task is to editor the Labor [Workers'] Weekly [Laodong zhoukan] in Beijing which distributed 2500 copies every week. At the same time I am in charge of the political committee of the Beijing branch CCP and work for the Committee for Organization of National Federation of Chinese Railway Workers. I also constantly write some articles of our party presses and GMD presses. But now I am not a pure worker for the party, so I must spend some time to work for myself. I myself spent one part of the money which given by the eastern department of Comintern for buying the Chinese publications, but, of course, I must return this money within short time and send more publications to you. The publications which sent to you every two weeks one time, I think, have been received by you.

Hoping that you will send some publications to me and write me something about moscow and that you will answer promptly and give full criticism on what I write above.

Yours fraternally
K.T.Chang

A.22 Manifesto of the Third National Congress of the CCP (June 1923)⁹⁹

The Chinese people are doubly oppressed both by foreign powers and by warlords, and the nation's existence as well as the freedom of its people are in an extremely precarious state. Not only the workers, peasants, and students, but also the peaceful and moderate merchants feel oppressed.

The farcical confusion of the present Beijing regime; the increasing oppression and destruction of trade unions and students' federations by the northern warlords' regime; the unruliness of soldiers and bandits in Shandong and Henan; the threats by foreign powers to retract, on various pretexts, benefits granted by the Washington Conference; the atrocities committed by the Japanese sailors at Shashi and Changsha; the powers' forced cotton exports from China; the Guangdong fighting engineered by Wu Peifu and Qi Xieyuan; disorders in Sichuan fostered by Wu Peifu and Xiao Yaonan; civil war looming between the Zhili and Fengtian factions; and imbroglios among the various cliques within the Zhili faction: all these show how internal and external troubles have again beset the people. There is no salvation unless the people muster up their own strength in a national movement for self-determination. [All] this also demonstrates that the national revolutionary movement led by our party with the slogans "down with the warlords" and "down with international imperialism" is on the right path.

The GMD should be the central force of the national revolution and should assume its leadership. Unfortunately, however, the GMD often suffers from two erroneous notions. First, it relies on foreign powers for help in the Chinese national revolution. Such requests for help from the enemy not only cause the [GMD] to lose the leadership of the national revolution but also make the people depend on foreign power, thus destroying their confidence and spirit of national independence. Second, [the GMD] concentrates all its efforts on military action, neglecting propaganda work among the people. Consequently, the GMD loses its political leadership because a national revolutionary party can never succeed by relying solely on military action without winning nationwide popular sympathy.

We still hope that all the revolutionary elements in our society will rally to the GMD, speeding the completion of the national revolutionary movement. At the same time, [we also] hope that the GMD will resolutely discard its two old notions of reliance on foreign powers and concentration on military action, and that it will pay attention to political propaganda among the people—never missing an opportunity for [such] propaganda in order to create a true central force for the national welfare and a true leadership for the national revolution.

Considering economic and political conditions at home and abroad, and the sufferings and needs of [those] classes of Chinese society (workers, peasants, industrialists, and merchants) which urgently need a national revolution, the CCP never forgets for one moment to support the interests of the workers and peasants. It is our special task to conduct propaganda and organizational work among the workers and peasants. Still more central is our task to lead the workers and peasants into joining the national revolution. Our mission is to liberate the oppressed Chinese nation by a national revolution, and to advance to the world revolution, liberating the oppressed peoples and oppressed classes of the whole world.

Long live the Chinese national revolution!

Long live the liberation of the oppressed peoples of the world!

Long live the liberation of the oppressed classes of the world!

A.23. Resolution on the Nationalist Movement and the Question of the GMD (June 1923)¹⁰⁰

(1) In colonial and semicolonial countries oppressed by international imperialism, it is possible to carry out the national revolution only by striking forcefully at the imperialists. This is the task such countries must accomplish in the world revolution.

(2) The current rulers of China are feudal warlords, not the bourgeoisie. The warlord government calls itself independent, but in reality it takes orders from the international imperialist powers. They do well as their managers running the finance, communications, and industry that are in the hands of the international imperialists. The Chinese bourgeoisie controls just an extremely small part of the daily production. The imperialists make use of their political power in China to obstruct the free development of Chinese industry. Therefore, semicolonial China must make the democratic national movement its central task in order to remove internal and external oppression.

(3) In accordance with China's social situation, there should be a powerful centralized party to act as the supreme headquarters of the democratic nationalist movement. China currently has a party. Only the GMD is a relatively democratic revolutionary party. At this time, because of the conditions of each class in society, it is very difficult to create a bigger and more revolutionary party. Even if one could be created, it would only cause disunity and fragmentation of democratic revolutionary power.

(4) Because of the backwardness of industry, the Chinese working class is still in its infancy. The consciousness of the majority of the laboring masses is stuck in the patriarchal society. The tendency toward being apolitical is extremely strong. Only a minority of industrial workers have already realized the need for a democratic movement. Those who can really understand communism and CP organization represent an even smaller minority. Consequently, the workers' movement cannot yet powerfully rise up to create an independent social force that is needed for China's current revolution.

(5) Since the working class has not become powerful, naturally a strong CP, a great mass party, cannot be developed to meet the demands of the current revolution. Therefore, the ECCI passed a resolution that the CCP must cooperate with the Chinese GMD. CP members must join the GMD. The CCP CEC also feels this need and decided to enforce this resolution. The resolution has also been adopted by this Congress.¹⁰¹

(6) In joining the GMD, we must maintain our own organization and strive to absorb the truly class-conscious, revolutionary elements from the workers' organizations and from the left wing of the GMD in order gradually to expand our organization, tighten our discipline, and build among the masses a strong foundation for the CP.

(7) In the GMD we should pay attention to the following: (a) In political propaganda, we must uphold our true identity of noncompromise with any imperialist or warlord. (b) We must prevent the GMD from concentrating all its force on military activities while neglecting propaganda among the people; we must also prevent the GMD tendency toward compromise in the political movement and toward reformism in the labor movement. (c) Members of the CP and the SYL must unite and work in unison by words and deeds. (d) We must force the GMD toward Soviet Russia; always alert the GMD to the danger of being fooled by the arrogant and greedy foreign powers.

(8) We must strive to extend the GMD organization throughout the whole of China and to rally all Chinese revolutionary elements to the GMD to meet the requirements of the present Chinese national revolution. At the same time, our special work is to strive to promote an independent organization for the National Labor Federation and conduct both economic and political struggle. We must strive to lead the laboring masses from a struggle for daily livelihood to a political one. The current political struggle is naturally a nationalist movement—one to eliminate foreign influences and warlords. Thus, a large-scale national propaganda campaign should be launched among the laboring masses so as to expand the national revolution and the GMD. At the same time, it is also necessary to bring into our organization those revolutionary elements who are fully aware of the necessity of the national revolution and who have, furthermore, class consciousness. Widespread propaganda on the “necessity of supporting the interests of the laboring class in the national revolution” should be carried out among the masses.

A.24 The First Revised Constitution of the CCP (June 1923)¹⁰²

Chapter One: Party Membership

1. Members of our party are not differentiated on the basis of nationality or sex. Those who acknowledge our party’s program and constitution and are willing to serve our party loyally can become members of our party.

2. To be granted probationary membership of the party, one must be sponsored by two people who have held party membership for over half a year, [the application] must be passed by a meeting of the cell [xiaozu], examined by the district committee [difang weiyuanhui], and approved by the area committee [qu weiyuanhui]. The probation period is three months for laborers and six months for nonlaborers; this period may be extended or shortened at the discretion of the district committee. A probationary member may only participate in cell meetings and enjoys the right to speak and to vote. Other duties are identical to those of a regular party member.

3. Party members accepted by the CEC must also go through a probationary period after their district committees have been notified. Those who hold membership in CPs recognized by the Comintern may become regular members of our party after having been checked by the Party Center [zhongyang].

4. When a party member voluntarily applies for withdrawal from the party, his or her application must be approved by the area [committee], the party membership card and other important documents must be returned, sponsors must guarantee that he or she will strictly keep all party secrets, and, in the event of violation of this commitment, the area executive committee will take appropriate measures to deal with him or her.

Chapter Two: Organization

5. In the countryside, in factories, railways, mines, barracks, schools, and other organizations and their surroundings, a party cell may be formed as long as there are between five and ten members. A cell head should be appointed by general acclaim. The cell will come under the district branch [or local difang zhibu]. Where there are less than five members, they should also have an organization, appoint a secretary by general acclaim, and be placed under the nearest area [committee] or be placed directly under the CEC. (If there is a district branch where there is no cell, it should be placed directly under the area executive committee; if there is no area executive committee, it should be placed directly under the Party Center.)

6. If there are ten members in one locality and if approval is granted by the CEC, the area executive committee may send a person there to convene a full members' or delegates' congress. This congress is to elect three persons to form the district executive committee; it is also to elect three alternate members—when committee members have to leave their posts for any reason, they are to be replaced temporarily by alternate members. In localities where there is no area executive committee, the CEC is to send personnel down to organize a district executive committee. It will come under the Party Center. On the formation of the area executive committee, the area executive committee will take over responsibility and powers of the district executive committee.

7. If an area has more than two district executive committees and when the CEC deems it necessary to organize an area executive committee, it will send personnel to the area in question to convene a delegates' congress. The congress is to elect five people to form the area executive committee as well as three alternate members; if committee members have to leave their post for any reason, they are to be temporarily replaced by alternate members. When the CEC deems it necessary, it may entrust a district executive committee to take over temporarily the responsibilities and powers of the area executive committee. The jurisdiction of an area is determined by the CEC and is subject to constant change.

8. The CEC is to be composed of nine persons elected by the National Congress; five alternate members are also elected by the Congress; when members leave their posts, they must be replaced temporarily by alternate members.

9. The term of office for CEC members is one year; for area and district committee members it is six months. There is no set limit on the tenure of heads of cells, but they must be subject to reelection.

10. The CEC implements all resolutions passed by the Congress and deliberates and decides on our party's policies and all the methods of implementation; area and district executive committees implement resolutions passed by superior organs and, within their jurisdiction and authority, deliberate and decide on all methods of execution. Every committee is to elect a committee chair to take overall charge of party affairs; other committee members shall be responsible for separate duties but shall work together.

11. The resolutions passed by the National Congress or the CEC and special problems that arise unexpectedly are to be handled by special commissions made up of several party members who are appointed by area and district executive committees; when such special commissions convene meetings, the chair of such meetings must be a member of an area or district executive committee.

Chapter Three: Meetings

12. Each cell must meet at least once a week as convened by the cell head. All districts [difang] must convene a full members' meeting at least once a month (in exceptional circumstances the full members' meeting may be changed to one of cell heads, but the full members' meeting must be held at least once every two months). In each area, the executive committee should call a delegates' congress once every three months; every five members shall have one vote. The National Congress is to be convened by the CEC on a fixed date once a year. The CEC shall meet in full session every four months.

13. When the CEC deems it necessary, it may convene an unscheduled [linshi] National Congress. It must also call an unscheduled National Congress when one-third of the area representatives or one-third of party members make such a request.

14. Regarding the number of delegates to the National Congress or to an unscheduled congress, each district may send one representative; if it has over forty members it may send two delegates, three if it has over sixty members, and one more delegate for each additional forty members. Each district has one vote for every ten members. Where a district [organization] has not yet been [formally] set up, it may send one representative if the CEC deems it necessary, but its right to vote is a matter that will be determined by the Congress.

15. Should a problem arise, a superior executive committee may order a subordinate executive committee to convene various kinds of ad hoc meetings.

16. The CEC must always send personnel to all places to convene various forms of ad hoc meetings. They are to be chaired by the special commissioners sent by the CEC.

17. The meetings of the central, area, and district executive committees may be called by the committee chair at any time.

Chapter Four: Discipline

[[The chapter on discipline is identical to that in the Constitution adopted by the Second Party Congress. Articles 18 to 26 here correspond to Articles 17 to 25 in the previous Constitution. See above Doc. A.15.]]

Chapter Five: Funding

27. The revenues of our party come from the following sources:

a) Party dues. Party members whose monthly salary [yuexin] is under 30 yuan pay 20 cents per month; those whose monthly salary is between 30 and 60 yuan pay one yuan; those whose monthly salary is between 60 and 100 yuan pay 5 percent of their salary; and those whose monthly salary is above 100 yuan pay 10 percent. Party dues are waived for unemployed workers and imprisoned party members.

b) Contributions from within the party. These shall be determined by the district (executive) committees taking into consideration the state of local finances and the economic strength of party members.

c) Support sources from outside the party.

28. All revenues and expenditures of our party are to be disposed of by the CEC.

Chapter Six: Appendix

29. The power to revise this Constitution belongs to the National Congress, and the right to interpret it belongs to the CEC.

30. This Constitution has been adopted by the Third Party Congress (10–20 July [should be June] 1923) and is effective from the day it is issued by the CEC.

A.25 Organizational Code of the CCP CEC (June 1923)¹⁰³

1) The CEC is elected by the annual Party Congress. It is responsible to the Congress for all its actions; is the highest leading organ of our party between two congresses; supervises the activities of all areas and districts; distributes publications published in the name of our party; and dispatches and directs personnel to work with youths, women, labor, peasants, etc.

2) The CEC comprises nine people. In the event that one member is absent, the vacancy should be filled by an alternate member. At the first meeting of the CEC after the Congress, work should be divided and five persons should be elected to form the Central Bureau. The other four persons should be assigned to various localities to assist and work with the local committee members and make weekly reports concerning local conditions to the Central Bureau.

3) The Central Bureau exercises its powers in the name of the CEC, which elects its committee chair, secretary, and treasurer, whose duties are as follows:

The committee chair presides over all meetings of the Central Bureau and the CEC; in the absence of the chair, members of the Central Bureau should elect one of their number to carry out the powers of the chair.

The secretary is responsible for documents in and outside of the party, correspondence, and minutes of meetings; the secretary is also in charge of the party archives. All party correspondence must be signed by the chair and the secretary.

The treasurer, under the supervision of the CEC, shall take charge of the party's financial affairs and administration, as well as be responsible for the financial affairs and administration of the various areas, districts, and all party organs.

4) Regular meetings of the CEC shall be held once every four months, the Central Bureau meets every week. The Central Bureau itself can call for the convening of an extraordinary meeting or do so at the request of four CEC members. The request must state the subjects to be discussed and the reasons.

5) All meetings of the Executive Committee shall be called by the chair and the secretary and an agenda shall be attached.

6) All resolutions of the CEC and the Central Bureau must be passed by a majority, but resolutions of unscheduled National Party Congresses must be passed by a two-thirds majority.

7) The CEC shall issue notifications regarding the convening of congresses at least two months in advance, attach a draft agenda, and request local organs to submit all proposals within a month after being notified. All local proposals shall be circulated.

8) Reports by the CEC must be mailed to the localities one month in advance of meetings.

9) The financial report of the CEC must be audited by an auditing committee appointed by the Congress (CEC members are not eligible for appointment).

10) In the event that one-third of our party's areas representing one-third of our party's membership request the convening of an unscheduled party congress, the Executive Committee must do so within one month after receipt of the request. The request must state the reason for convening the congress.

A.26 Letter from Members of the CCP CEC to Sun Yat-sen (25 June 1923)¹⁰⁴

Letter from Comrades Chen Duxiu, Li Dazhao, Cai Hesun, Tan Pingshan, and Mao Zedong to Sun Yat-sen:

The political crisis in the north is in a phase of increasing confusion. Public opinion shows increasing activity; this gives our party a golden opportunity for development; we must not lose it.¹⁰⁵ We as members of the party ask for your decision on the following two questions. (1) The organization of a strong executive in Shanghai or Canton to develop the actions of party members in a uniform way and to unfold propaganda on a large scale. For this, special attention is to be paid to Beijing, Hubei, Hunan, Shanghai, and Canton. If these centers are not well organized, all the work will be superficial and dispersed. (2) The current crisis in Beijing is not the result of developments in the last few days. Cao Kun's attempt to gain power had already started before Li Yuanhong became president in Beijing. The Anfu clique (Duan Qirui) cannot come to an agreement with the Zhili party. Wu Peifu and Feng Yuxiang's relations with Cao Kun are of the same quality as Li Yuanhong and Zhang Zuolin's relations with Duan. Even if there are changes in the groupings, it remains a struggle between the leaders of the Beiyang militarists Cao and Duan. This struggle has nothing to do with the well-being of the Republic. It is clear that the Zhili party is the enemy of our party, but we cannot subordinate ourselves to Duan and Li Yuanhong. Further, we cannot follow the same course as the feudalistic warlords to conquer political power and territory with military strength. That would give people the impression that we are no different from the militarists. To build a new China with old methods and old forces not only is incompatible with logic, but cannot be realized in practice. The old force has means that are ten times stronger than ours. We can only use new means, take new directions, and create a new force. With respect to the people, we must unite merchants, students, peasants, and workers and lead them under the banner of the party. The new force that will arise from the people themselves will defend the Republic with new means and with a new comradely spirit. In the beginning our strength will be weak, but it will develop very strongly. The Great Powers make plans every day to exploit us and look for the strongman who will be their agent. To beg for their recognition with empty words in order to become powerful ourselves is not only to the detriment of our movement but also a degradation of the revolutionary spirit. We cannot take these measures. Parliament is seen to be cheap by the whole people. Cao and Wu feed the parliament in the north. If we try to bring members of parliament to Canton, how can the people see us as being any better than the way they judge Wu and Cao Kun?

The crime of the generals in the southern provinces who enlarge their armies and oppress the people is no smaller than the crime of the militarists in the north. Even if we were to burn these elements, one would not find a trace of democratic-revolutionary inclination in the ashes. Even if we could unite these generals in the south, the struggle would remain one between south and north and by no means one between feudalism and democracy. Can we let hundreds of soldiers be killed for this and place a heavy burden on the people? There is also the danger that we shall slow down the nationalist revolution because of our localism in this corner of China. The current main task of our party is to bring the war in Canton to a close so that we can be equal to our task in the dangerous political situation in which our country finds itself. We must no longer work locally and neglect work in the whole nation. We ask you to leave Canton and go to Shanghai, the center of public opinion, and to convene a National Assembly there (as you developed in your theory of the "Five Powers Constitution" and not simply a mass demonstration). In this way a central force will be created for the solution of national problems as well as a central force for the national revolution. If we do this we will not lose our leading position in the revolutionary nationalist movement. This is a major and important thing that only you can do, just as the constitution movement was led by you two years ago. We see the necessity for the speedy deliverance of China and the development of our party. In writing this letter to you we hope that you will adopt our proposal. We await your reply.

A.27 Report of the Central Bureau (November 1923)¹⁰⁶

1. Politics: The Beijing coup [the removal of Li Yuanhong as president of the Republic] took place soon after the Congress. The Central Bureau immediately published its statement concerning the situation (6,000 Chinese characters, 300 English words),¹⁰⁷ which proposed the convocation of a National Assembly. Only Hong Kong's English-language newspapers reacted negatively; otherwise, there was no impact on domestic media. At the same time, [the Central Bureau] invited, by mail, Sun Yat-sen to go to Shanghai to convene the National Assembly, but it was to no avail [see Doc. A.26].

2. Propaganda: Because the publishing house of the Central Bureau was moved, only one issue of New Youth [Xin qingnian] was published, although there should have been two issues. There should have been five issues of Vanguard [Qianfeng] but only one came out. The Guide Weekly [Xiangdao zhoubao] should have reached issue 49, but only forty-six issues have been completed and there were no pamphlets. Among the three periodicals, The Guide Weekly is moderately influential in society; thus the anti-imperialist atmosphere gradually grew stronger after the Congress.

3. Relations with the GMD: The Congress Resolution [Doc. A.23] has not been fully implemented. [The reasons are]: (a) There is some doubt among comrades about the resolution; (b) The GMD itself is not handling things fast and resolutely; (c) There are mutual suspicions between comrades and members of the GMD, and there are differences in political beliefs; and (d) Our party has economic difficulties. For these four reasons, the original plan to establish important branches respectively in north and central China as quickly as possible has not been realized. Currently, only Beijing already has an organization; efforts are under way in Tianjin, Harbin, and Hunan; consultations with the GMD are taking place in Hubei and Nanjing; in Shandong and Sichuan, because there are already party organizations within the GMD, our comrades are trusted when they join [the GMD]. The Anhui GMD has two factions, neither enjoying society's support, and therefore capable personnel are needed to go there and organize another. Currently, there is one faction within the GMD that plans to go ahead with the reforms and has decided to convene the Congress on 15 January in Canton.¹⁰⁸ This plan is opposed by another faction, and probably there will be important changes in the future.

4. Labor movement: The labor movement, directly led by the Central Bureau, is confined to workers on the railways and based on the report of the railway committee; we can now report the following:

a) Zhengzhou-Taiyuan railway: The situation on the Zhengzhou-Taiyuan [railway] is the best, because there are nine comrades of the C.P. [sic, in original] and more than twenty comrades of the SYL. All of them are very good comrades, courageous and diligent, and they are working on the potential of the labor union and the executive committee meets regularly.

b) Beijing-Fengtian railway: The situation on the Beijing-Fengtian railway is also very good. Labor unions in Tangshan, Shanhaiguan, Tianjin, and Fengtai still function secretly. Of these four places, the situation in Tangshan and Shanhaiguan is especially good.

c) Beijing-Hankou railway: The situation in Jiang'an and Zhengzhou on the Beijing-Hankou railway is relatively good, with small groups existing secretly in both places. Someone from Jiang'an is put in charge of Xinyang. The situation in [Chang] Xindian is not very good, but [we have found] some labor friends there, and they come to Beijing frequently to talk [to us]. We have repeatedly instructed them to organize small groups, but they are very frightened. Although they organized about ten people two or three weeks ago, now they have disappeared. Nevertheless, most people still have faith in the labor union but they are too afraid to stick out their necks. Today another labor friend from Xindian arrived, and he has agreed to our instruction to go back there and to organize small groups. From now on, [at least] Xindian will have a headquarters.

d) Tianjin-Pukou railway: Pukou at the south of the Tianjin-Pukou railway already has a small group of some thirty people, and they meet frequently. There has been contact with people from the northern end, but for the time being nobody dares to come forward [to organize]. There are a few very good activists there, but they dare not do much because the scab, Cui, keeps a close watch on them.

e) Jiaozhou-Jinan railway: A union with 1,670 members has been organized on this railway. We have developed contacts with them and send them 200 copies of each issue of the union publication.

f) Beijing-Suiyuan railway: The union of the vehicle maintenance department on this railway is okay, and it communicates frequently with us by mail.

g) Daokou-Qinghua railway: The situation there is relatively bad because soon after the workers got the union organized, the February 7 [1923] Incident occurred, making our labor friends there especially fearful. But we have a comrade there, conducting substantial activities and propaganda work.

h) Longhai railway: Lin Zhiying and Wei are still in control of the union on this route. Comrade Wang [Hebo?] has not written for a while, and [we are] not too clear about the situation there.

5. Peasant movement: The new peasant movements are in two places. One is in Huizhou, Guangdong Province, and the other is in Hengshan, Hunan Province. In Huizhou, there are organizations with over 10,000 people in each one of them, and Hengshan too has mass movements numbering some 10,000 people. In these two places, the peasant movements were led by comrades from the SYL, and they have all failed. The reasons for their failure are: (a) Our comrades have yet to develop a solid base in the countryside. [Their] economic agitation drew opposition from the majority of the middle peasants, who collaborated with warlords and bureaucrats, suppressing peasants forcefully. (b) Politics is also a factor, because Huizhou is controlled by the counterrevolutionary army of Chen [Jiongming], and Hengshan is controlled by the counterrevolutionary army of Zhao [Hengti].

6. Party affairs: Since the Congress, party membership has increased by only one hundred. There are a few places where the party is growing. One is in Jinan, where a district committee was established. Another place is Harbin, where a group [cell? zu] was set up. The work is effective in only two places. Hubei is the most lax, which is owing to both government suppression and the comrades' lack of active efforts. Growth can be expected in Nanjing, Hangzhou, Sichuan, Jiangxi, and Fujian.

A.28 Reports of the Area Executive Committees to the CEC (November 1923)¹⁰⁹

1. Beijing Area

a) National movement: There have been no quick results. Originally, this was because of the doubts among our comrades about the policy and subsequently because of the disputes with the democratic fraternal associations. In addition, within the GMD some people use the fraternal association to create obstacles. Now the plan is to send capable comrades to join the fraternal association in question, and the obstacles can thus be made to disappear. Comrades will have doubts about us, and this is also related to the fact that our comrades were entrusted to run periodicals in Beijing and Shanghai. But now this has been explained [to them]. Before, when Comrade Wang [Zhongyi] and Comrade An [Ticheng]¹¹⁰ were in Beijing, the spirit was high within [the organization]. Now although Fan [Hongjie] and Gao [Junyu] work fairly hard,¹¹¹ there are many obstacles because of internal disagreements. Now it is necessary to send additional new comrades to do the work. In Tianjin, there are a number of comrades who are taking care of speeches and the GMD.

b) Labor movement: The labor movement does not have sufficient personnel and financial power. Now the most difficult thing is to cope with unemployed workers and imprisoned comrades and their family members.

c) Student movement: Since Wei Qingyun was bought off by Wang Zhengting he has created rumors to damage the reputation of Comrades Fan and Gao at the Student Council and used this to break up the student alliance. I [Li Dazhao] should dispatch capable people as soon as possible to handle this matter. . . .

3. Shanghai Area

After the Congress, we concentrated our work on revamping the internal organization in Shanghai. This was because previously organization was so loose [that it seemed] as if there was none at all. Now some order has been reinstated within the organization, and more than half of all the party dues can be collected. Shanghai is the biggest city in China but our work has yet to produce any results. As far as the national movement is concerned, because most of our comrades come from other provinces, have no profession, and are very isolated from the local society, it is not easy to carry it out. As far as the labor movement is concerned, although Shanghai tops the country in terms of the number of workers, the labor movement is not developed. The reasons are: (a) because of convenient transportation, labor supply is larger than labor demand and there is a fierce competition for jobs within the same profession, and hence workers dare not fight with employers; (b) the number of female workers, who work in the silk, yarn, and cigarette factories, is more than half of the city's workers and this, too, is a reason why it is not easy to develop Shanghai's labor movement; (c) workers come from many different places, so regionalism is also a factor that hinders workers' unity; and (d) the Green and Red Gangs, which were there before, not only create intangible obstacles to workers' unity but also, on their own initiative, lead police and civil detectives to spy on workers' activities. The club we run for the machine operators has quietly disintegrated because the members have lives and interests that are too different, and they live too far apart from each other. How can such diverse elements as these be unified? [For this reason] organizations for machine operators in Shanghai have collapsed several times before. The postal workers' movement was pretty good last time, but now the oppression has forced it to stop. Now [we are] setting about organizing movements in Wusong and Gaochangmiao. A workers' school has been set up in Wusong, and they have already held a preparatory union meeting; in Gaochangmiao, a workers' night school is also being planned. We have already made contacts about setting up a shop clerks' organization, so it can be established in one or two months.

There is some improvement in party affairs in Nanjing, and it is being planned to set up a district committee in Pukou. There are too few comrades in Hangzhou to have a district committee.

The railway workers on the Shanghai-Nanjing and Shanghai and Hangzhou lines all have Moral Endeavor Societies, but their members are skilled workers and small bureaucrats or foremen, etc., which is an obstacle to the labor movement.

4. Hunan Area

a) Politics: [[A lengthy account is given of the fighting by military governor Zhao Hengti to gain control over the whole province. The people of Changsha bore the financial brunt of the struggles—three to four months of housing tax and fourteen years of land tax was collected. River traffic was disrupted, causing business to suffer with factories laying off workers.]]

b) Party affairs: In the past four months, the number of comrades who joined the party is as follows: in Changsha, fourteen people; in Anyuan, twenty or so; and in Shuikoushan, ten or so. In terms of education, Changsha is the best; people there are interested in discussions on political and other issues. Anyuan is next, and Shuikoushan is behind. The people in Zhangde are too naive, and currently there is nothing that can be done. The people in Hengyang are also too naive.

c) Labor movement: Because Changsha's factories have all closed down and workers are impoverished and most of them are scattered around, the textile, mint, lead, and other professional clubs have all stopped doing anything. The only thing to do is to reorganize the SYL. As far as other handicraft unions are concerned, we could only maintain the status quo. For four months, the situation in Anyuan has been pretty good. Workers can govern themselves under the supervision of the labor union, and the local military police has lost its functions. Also the labor union is not as isolated from society as it was before. Cooperatives are also gradually beginning to do well. Although the workers' extension school has yet to find an appropriate person to head it, workers occupy the leadership positions. There is also a special class specializing in ideology and politics. There are seven schools for the children of workers, but the two schools in Zhu and Li are difficult to run because of the war. The thing to worry about at Anyuan is that the three companies there (Han, Ye, and Ping) all depend on the Japanese for their capital, and since the earthquake, this source has been cut off. Anyuan's unpaid wages have accumulated for over two months now, and whether there is going to be a work stoppage is not known. But the mines in Anyuan can be independent of each other: if Han and Ye close down, it is possible that Ping can remain open. But now it is not clear how to do this. It is possible to maintain the status quo of Shuikoushan's union. A cooperative has been set up but because of the traffic breakdown, it has not opened yet. Hengyang's Baiguo organized a peasant association with two or three thousand members, but because of traffic breakdowns both on the road and on the river, [we] cannot dispatch capable people to supervise it. The Jinjiazhuang mine, 45 li [about 15 miles] from Changsha, has several thousand workers. [We] already sent people to investigate and develop contacts. Once the war stops, [we] can proceed with it. . . .

7. Guangdong District

a) National movement: Since our delegate arrived in Guangdong in October,¹¹² the reorganization of the GMD has been progressing. As soon as our delegate got to Guangdong, he summoned the Executive Committee members and Central Bureau members stationed in Guangdong to discuss ways of GMD reorganization and vigorously to persuade Sun Yat-sen to convene the reorganization meeting. Sun Yat-sen convened this meeting [25 October], and five comrades attended it. The result of the meeting was that the majority did not oppose reorganization and hence the provisional executive committee of the GMD was formally set up on 28 October. Sun Yat-sen specially appointed nine committee members (one was our comrade [Tan Pingshan]) and five alternative members (one was our comrade [Li Dazhao]). On that day the first meeting was held, and the following were proposed for discussion: (1) the issue of district organizations within metropolitan Canton (now there are twelve districts, and our comrades have influence in four of them), (2) the issue of convening the national congress (scheduled for next January with six people from each province and one delegate from [each] overseas Chinese branch), (3) preparing for the publication of the GMD's weekly (already published), (4) the drafting of the party's Constitution (the draft version written by Liao Zhongkai appeared in the weekly), and (5) the issue of funds. In addition, an executive branch of the provisional committee was set up in Shanghai, and Wang Jingwei, Zhang Ji, Dai Jitao, Hu Hanmin, and Ye Chucang were elected to be members. Liao Zhongkai was dispatched to Shanghai to set a deadline for the founding meeting.¹¹³ The future task of the national movement in Guangdong is to regain sovereignty over the customs office, and now the GMD and the Canton government are so inclined. If there really is some development, this will be the first step toward conflict between the GMD and the imperialists.

b) Labor movement: Guangdong's labor movement has been gradually regressing to its original state. For three years almost all economic activities have been tried, and slogans such as “Wage increases” and “Reduce working hours” are hardly appropriate any more. Currently, the only thing left to do is with the internal organization, but the organizational forms of the labor unions when they were founded were too loose or too archaic, and also members do not want unions any more. The majority of them cannot lead their members, and their anarchic conditions are no different from the time before the unions were set up. The unions of those smaller and less important professions have disintegrated on their own or exist in name only. Only the Construction Union, Oil Industry Union, Machine Industry Union, and the Canton-Hankou Railway Machine, and Materials Workers’ Association are relatively organized.

c) Student movement: [[It has been extremely difficult to gain influence among the student organizations in Canton. Further, despite getting the students to pledge support for various activities, it was difficult to get them actively involved in concrete support activities.]]

A.29 Resolution Concerning Implementation of the Plans for the Nationalist Movement (November 1923)¹¹⁴

The nationalist movement is the focus of our present work. This is because, at the present time, the labor, peasant, student, and women’s movements are all a part of the nationalist movement. Thus, in accordance with the resolution of the Congress [Doc. A.23], we have made the following plan for the nationalist movement:

1) The nationalist movement will concentrate on enlarging the membership of the GMD and rectifying its political tendencies since the nationalist movement needs a strong party to guide it.

a) Enlarging the organization: (i) In places where the GMD has a branch, our comrades join it, such as in Guangdong, Shanghai, and Sichuan. (ii) In places where the GMD has no branch, such as in Harbin, Fengtian, Beijing, Tianjin, Nanjing, Anhui, Hubei, Hunan, Zhejiang, and Fujian, our comrades should help them to set up branches. (iii) The newly set up branches should follow the program and constitution of the GMD’s Central Bureau and distribute party identification cards. As for branch names, the branch may make its own decision.

b) We should rectify the GMD’s political tendencies and, in accordance with the principle of nationalism as embodied in the Three Principles of the People, get them to oppose imperialism and conduct propaganda against it. In the nationalist movement, the movement to oppose imperialism is more important than the antiwarlord movement. Whenever there is conflict between the warlords and the imperialists, we should support the warlords.

c) Our relations with the GMD: (i) Our comrades have their own secret organizations within the GMD party branches. Our comrades must follow our party's directions under all circumstances. (ii) We should try to occupy a central position in the GMD, but where this is not possible, we should not force the issue. (iii) In GMD branches where our comrades already occupy a central position, if the budget comes from the GMD, we should merely report expenditures to the GMD; if the budget comes from our own party, then we should only report to our own party.

2) The GMD is most certainly the central force in the nationalist movement. Its strength is built on the support of different people's organizations. We must establish or join the progressive organizations in the name of the GMD:

a) The peasantry. The peasantry is the strongest force in the nationalist movement. Thus, the GMD should use the nation's peasantry as its base and set up subbranches in the rural areas of every province. The movement's strategy will be to begin by educating the peasants, using the slogan "For the benefit of all peasants," and working on irrigation projects, protection against robbers, boycotting foreign goods, and resisting heavy taxes. At the present stage, we should begin with a struggle to improve the economic situation of the tenant farmers even if it causes resentment on the part of the middle peasants.

b) Workers. Labor unions deserve the same attention as we pay to party organization. We should nurse the workers' class consciousness.

c) Merchants. We should find out those, in the business association of the localities and big cities, who are against the bureaucratic elements.

d) Shop assistants. It is urgent that we set up shop-assistant associations in big cities such as Shanghai, Hankou, and Tianjin.

e) Government employees. As with the shop-assistant associations, associations of the lower-ranking government employees have a great influence in the cities.

f) Students. Students provide a key link between the different organizations. Students in junior high school have played an important role in the peasant movement.

A.30 Resolution Concerning Implementation of the Policies for the Labor Movement (November 1923)¹¹⁵

Since the February 7 Strike, most of the workers' organizations in north China have been destroyed. The workers are scared, and morale is low; some of them have been corrupted. In Shanghai, the industrial center of China, for various reasons the labor movement is still at a low ebb. In the south—Guangdong—most of the workers are actually artisans. Propaganda and organization among the sailors is in a bad way: members do not trust union leaders; there is confusion with finances, and conflicts among members are increasing. In light of this, we think that it would be unwise to go ahead with the National Labor Union. First, we should focus on rectifying and strengthening the industrial workers such as the railway workers, sailors, and miners. When workers in these organizations have formed national organizations, they can form an alliance of the three groups of industrial workers. Only then will it be possible to form the National Labor Union. We must pay all our attention to making the alliance of these three groups of industrial workers the focus, and overcome laxness.

The current plan for organizing and strengthening these three groups of industrial workers is as follows:

1) Railways. The present railway committee will send comrades to the various railway lines or, as an alternative, the lines will select their own representatives to take charge of local meetings and to plan open or secret workers' organizations on these lines. Before the meetings, comrades in Shanghai, Hangzhou, Shandong, and Canton should speed up their efforts among the workers.

2) Sailors. (a) Comrades in Shanghai and among the Chinese students in France should carry out liaison and propaganda among the Ningbo sailors. (b) Comrades in Shanghai, Hankou, and Tianjin should make efforts to organize crews working along the coastal provinces of Liaoning, Hebei, and Shandong and on the Yangtze river. (c) Comrades in Canton will make use of the strength to reform the National Union of Seamen and set up a GMD sailors' branch in Hong Kong to begin propaganda work and to reform the organizations there. An important part of the work in the sailors' movement is to circulate documents among Shanghai, Hong Kong, and Singapore.

3) Miners. The miners' movement covers Fengtian, Zhili, Shandong, Henan, and Hunan (including Hubei and Jiangxi). The miners in Hunan have already been organized. With respect to Tangshan in Zhili, our comrades in Beijing and Tangshan should select some comrades to take charge of the organizational work. The comrades in Shandong should pay equal attention to the miners' movement in Fangzi, Boshan, Yixian, etc., and the railway workers' movement on the Beijing-Pukou and Jiaozhou-Jinan lines. We should set up party branches in Fengtian and restore the party branch in Zhangde, Hunan, to give us a point of departure for our work.

Notes to Commentary A

1. For an account of Li's influence see M. Meisner, Li Ta-chao and the Origins of Chinese Marxism, and for Chen's see L. Feigon, Chen Duxiu: Founder of the Chinese Communist Party. Beginning with the reevaluation of history that began in the PRC in the late 1970s, Li Da's importance in the founding of the party has been recognized by Chinese communist historians, as have his important theoretical contributions during the early phase. Indeed, he published and edited the party's first official organ, The Communist. See for example, Li Qiju et al., "Gongchandang yuekan yu Li Da tongzhi" and "Jiandang qianhou de Li Da tongzhi." For an assessment of his early ideas on the party and its role see H.J. van de Ven, The Founding of the Chinese Communist Party and the Search for a New Political Order, 1920-1927, pp. 62-65. On his contribution to the dissemination of Marxist ideas see V. Burov, "Li Da and the Dissemination of Marxist Ideas in China," pp. 102-13.

9. The Congress was attended by Li Da, Li Hanjun, Zhang Guotao (who acted as chair), Liu Renjing, Mao Zedong, He Shuheng, Dong Biwu, Chen Tanqiu, Wang Jinmei, Deng Enming, Zhou Fuhai, Chen Gongbo, and Bao Huiseng. With the exception of the last session, which was held on a boat at South Lake, Jiaying, for security reasons, Maring (Sneevliet) attended on behalf of the Comintern and Nikolsky on behalf of the Comintern's Far Eastern Secretariat. It is important to note that neither of the two key figures in the communist movement, Chen Duxiu and Li Dazhao, attended the Congress.

12. In December 1920, Chen had left for Canton to take up the post of commissioner of education in Guangdong Province. The fact that Chen left Shanghai at such a vital time may indicate that he did not see the development of the party as his main priority at this time. According to Maring, it was the "representatives of the International" who called for Chen's return. This is contradicted by Zhang Guotao, who claimed that it was a decision made by the provisional Party Center. For Maring's view see below, "Report of Comrade H. Maring to the Executive," Doc. A.8; for Zhang's view see Chang Kuo-t'ao, The Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, 1921-1927, p. 154.

13. Maring was an apt choice because he had worked for a number of years in the Dutch East Indies. There he had pioneered the cooperation between the communist movement and the loosely based party, Sarekat Islam. See Saich, The Origins of the First United Front in China, vol. 1, pp. 6-11.

14. Dalin had been in Canton during the months of April to June to help with arrangements for the Congress of the SYL. During this period he engaged in discussions about the feasibility of a united front with the GMD.

15. The Congress was attended by 12 delegates: Chen Duxiu, Zhang Guotao, Li Da, Xiang Ying, Cai Hesen, Deng Zhongxia, Gao Junyu, Shi Cuntong, Li Zhenying, Yang Mingzhai, Wang Jinmei, and Chen Wangdao. They represented some 195 party members. The Congress was also attended by a number of other party members including Deng Pei, Xiang Jingyu, Zhang Tailei, Deng Enming, and Lin Yunan. Wang Jianying, (ed.), Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 8.

16. Chen Duxiu, Zhang Guotao, Cai Hesen, Gao Junyu, and Deng Zhongxia were elected to full membership of the CEC with Li Hanjun, Li Dazhao, and Xiang Jingyu as alternates.

Chen was chair of the Central Bureau, Zhang the head of organization, Cai Hesen head of propaganda, and Xiang Jingyu head of the Women's Department.

17. Protokoll des Vierten Kongress der Kommunistischen Internationale, p. 141.

18. Exact attendance at the Congress is unclear from documentary evidence, and the memoirs are contradictory. Most reliably it seems that some 30 delegates represented 420 members. A list of representatives contained among materials concerning the CCP Sixth Congress (1928) named the following: Chen Duxiu, Cai Hesen, Qu Qiubai, Zhang Guotao, Mao Zedong, Wang Jun, Luo Zhanglong, He Mengxiong, Liu Renjing, Wang Zhongyi, Wang Yongchang, Xu Meikun, Tan Pingshan, Feng Jupao, Liu Ersong, Chen Tian, Zhang Dehui, Lin Yunan, Liu Tianguo, Chen Weiren, Zhang Tailei, and Li Dazhao. See Guangdong Museum of Revolutionary History (ed.), Zhonggong "sanda" ziliao, p. 98. In addition, the following probably attended: Xiang Jingyu, Xiang Ying, Zhu Shaolian, Zhang Lianguang, Wang Hebo, Chen Tanqiu, Deng Pei, Sun Yunpeng, Yun Daiying, Shi Wenbin, and Yu Shude.

19. In late November 1922, the Central Bureau of the party moved to Beijing to take advantage of Wu Peifu's patronage. Wu was seen by the Narkomindel as a "democrat" and a progressive force that could be worked with in the national movement. He had supported the labor movement and allowed the dissemination of communist propaganda in return for its support against opponents such as Zhang Zuolin. However, on 1 February 1923, troops broke up the meeting to establish a union for the Beijing-Hankou Railway. The resulting strike was brutally put down by soldiers under Wu Peifu's command.

20. For these reports see Saich, The Origins of the First United Front in China, vol. 2, pp. 603–19, 631–57, and 674–91.

21. For Cai's views see "Notes on Delegates' Comments at the Third Party Congress on the Question of Cooperation with the Kuomintang [Guomindang]," Sneevliet Archives, International Institute of Social History, Amsterdam, nos. 275 and 276, in Saich, The Origins of the First United Front in China, vol. 2, pp. 577–85.

22. However, the fact that the crucial vote was carried by only 21 to 16 shows the persistence of deep opposition.

23. It is interesting to note that Zhang Guotao in his memoirs ignores the "Resolution" and only refers to the "Manifesto." This enables him to comment that while the CCP accepted the leading position of the GMD and expressed the hope that all revolutionary elements would rally around it, none of Maring's "high-sounding phrases" were adopted. Chang Kuot'ao, The Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, p. 312.

24. The new full CEC members (with the number of votes received in parentheses) were as follows: Chen Duxiu (40), Cai Hesen (37), Li Dazhao (37), Wang Hebo (34), Mao Zedong (34), Zhu Shaolian (32), Tan Pingshan (30), Xiang Ying (27), and Luo Zhanglong (25). The alternate members were Deng Pei, Zhang Lianguang, Xu Meikun, Li Hanjun, and Deng Zhongxia. The Central Bureau was composed of Chen Duxiu, Mao Zedong, Cai Hesen, Tan Pingshan, and Luo Zhanglong. However, when the Central Bureau moved to Shanghai in late July 1923, Tan remained in Canton, and in September Wang Hebo took his place. Chen Duxiu was elected chair, Mao Zedong secretary, and Luo Zhanglong accountant. See Letter from Maring to the ECCI, Profintern, and the Vladivostok Bureau, 25 June 1923, Sneevliet Archives, no. 298, in Saich, The Origins of the First United Front in China, vol. 2, pp. 640–44.

25. To keep up the pressure, the CCP also issued a public statement to the same effect drafted by Chen Duxiu. "Zhongguo gongchandang duiyu shiju de zhuzhang" (Statement of the CCP on the Current Situation)—usually referred to as the Second Statement of the CCP the Current Situation), in Xianqu (The Pioneer), no. 24, 1 August 1923. Xianqu was the fortnightly journal of the SYL. It began publication on 15 January 1922 and ceased publication on 15 August 1923. A copy of the printed English version can be found in the Sneevliet Archives, no. 281.

26. Letter from Maring to J. Davtian and A. Joffe, 13 July 1923, in Saich, The Origins of the First United Front in China, vol. 2, pp. 674–81.

27. The meeting was attended by four of the five members of the Central Bureau (Chen Duxiu, Cai Hesen, Wang Hebo, and Luo Zhanglong), one representative from the Beijing Committee (Li Dazhao) and the Hubei Committee (Xiang Ying), one representative of the SYL, and one "special visitor." See "Diyici zhongyang zhixing weiyuanhui kaihui jiyao," in Dangbao (The Party Paper), 13 November 1923, pp. 1-2.

28. "Zhongguo gongchandang xuanyan," in Yida qianhou, vol. 1, pp. 1-5, translated back into Chinese from an English-language version that was kept in the archives in the Soviet Union of the CCP delegation to the Comintern. The fact that this version is in English suggests that one of the Comintern delegates, most probably Maring, sent it to Moscow.

29. The Congress of the Toilers of the Far East held in Moscow (21 January-2 February 1922). The Congress was conceived to counter the Washington Conference convened by the major powers to try to find a modus vivendi in the Far East.

30. There were two Zhangs in the delegation to the Congress, Zhang Tailei and Zhang Guotao. It is more likely that Zhang Tailei wrote this note as he was not only responsible for organizing Chinese participation, together with Maring, in this Congress, but was also the English translator at the Congress.

31. "Zhongguo gongchandang diyici daibiao dahui," in Yida qianhou, vol. 1, pp. 20-23. This report on the Congress lay in the archives of the Comintern until a copy of it was returned to China in 1957 along with a number of other documents. The status of the document as official or unofficial is unclear, as is its authorship. Dong Biwu, one of the participants at the Congress, attested to its authenticity on at least three occasions. The report appears to have been written by one of the participants at the Congress shortly after it was concluded.

The documents of the First Party Congress were never formally published. According to Dong Biwu, Maring took the copies of the documents away with him and sent them to the Comintern. (Dong Biwu, "Dong Biwu tan Zhongguo gongchandang diyici quanguo daibiao dahui he Hubei gongchanzhuyi xiaozu," pp. 366-67.) If this is correct, it would explain the presence of the documents in the Comintern Archives.

The Russian text from which the Chinese was translated can be found in E.F. Kovalev, "Novye materialy opervom s'ezde kommunisticheskoi partii Kitaia," Narody Azii i Afriki: Istoria, ekonomika, kul'tura, no. 6 (1972), 150-58.

32. Six "small groups" had been set up in China. In order of founding they were in Shanghai, Beijing, Hubei (Wuhan), Hunan, Canton, and Shandong (Jinan). "Small groups" had also been set up in Paris and Tokyo. It is unclear which groups are meant here. The reference could be to the six groups formed in China, or it may refer to the six mentioned in the text. In the latter case Shanghai would be excluded from the list, perhaps indicating that it saw itself as the Party Center rather than as a group. In addition to these groups, a quite independent group calling itself communist existed in Sichuan.

33. Although this account mentions twelve representatives, it is certain that thirteen people attended the Congress from Chinese organizations. The person around whom the confusion revolves is Bao Huiseng. While it is certain that he attended, his status is unclear. The line-up at the Congress was as follows:

Locality or Organization	Name
Shanghai	Li Da, Li Hanjun
Beijing	Zhang Guotao, Liu Renjing
Wuhan	Dong Biwu, Chen Tanqiu
Hunan	Mao Zedong, He Shuheng
Canton	Chen Gongbo
Shandong	Wang Jinmei, Deng Enming
Tokyo	Zhou Fuhai
Unattached	Bao Huiseng
Comintern	Maring
Far Eastern Secretariat, at Irkutsk	Nikolsky

34. The text actually uses Maring's real name—Sneevliet—rather than the name he adopted for Comintern work.

35. The Far Eastern Secretariat of the Comintern in Irkutsk was established following a January 1921 decision of the ECCI and began functioning in late February or early March.

36. This was Li Hanjun's home. It was the night of 30 July 1921.

37. The final session was convened on a boat on South Lake, Jiaxing, Zhejiang Province. For details about the convening of this session see Wang Huiwu, "Yida zai Nanhu kaihui de qingkuang," pp. 56–57. Wang, the wife of Li Hanjun, made the arrangements for the final session.

38. Chen Duxiu, Zhang Guotao, and Li Da. Chen was elected secretary, Zhang head of the Organization Department, and Li head of the Propaganda Department.

39. This document is taken from the original English-language version in Ch'en Kung-po [Chen Gongbo], The Communist Movement in China: An Essay Written in 1924 by Ch'en Kung-po, pp. 102–3, published by Octagon Books, a division of Hippocrene Books, Inc. I would like to thank them for permission to reprint it here. This essay was Chen's M.A. thesis at Columbia University and was edited for publication by Professor C.M. Wilbur. The program appears as appendix one. A Russian-language version of this document was returned to the CCP archives by the Soviets in 1957 together with copies of the documents included here as A.2 and A.4. A translation of the Russian version of the program can be found in Yida qianhou, vol. 1, pp. 6–8. Interestingly, in both the English and Russian versions, clause 11 is missing.

40. This is taken from the original English version published as appendix two of Chen Gongbo's thesis, Ch'en Kung-po, The Communist Movement in China, published by Octagon Books, a division of Hippocrene Books, Inc. I would like to thank them for permission to reprint it here. A translation of a Russian version of the same document that was returned to China in 1957 can be found in Yida qianhou, pp. 12–14. The two versions are effectively identical.

41. "Beijing gongchanzhuyi xiaozu de baogao," in Yida qianhou, vol. 3, pp. 1–9. The report was presented by Zhang Guotao to the First Party Congress in his capacity as the senior Beijing delegate. The first two days of the Congress were taken up by listening to reports by the local small groups. This report is translated back into Chinese from Russian. It was returned to China from the Archives of the Chinese Delegation to the Comintern held in Moscow.

42. Baihua refers to the common form of speech. Previously, literature had been written in the classical style, thus making it inaccessible to the ordinary people. A strong component of the radical movement that developed during the second decade of the twentieth century was the conscious adoption of popular patterns of speech in written works.

43. As a result of the Paris Peace Conference, convened in January 1919, the decision was made at Versailles in April to give the former German concession in Shandong to Japan rather than return it to China. Anger at this decision sparked the May Fourth Incident when patriotic Chinese demonstrated in Beijing to protest the situation. The Incident gave its name to the broader social movement of the years 1915–19. For the fullest account of the Movement and its context see Chow Tse-tsung, The May Fourth Movement: Intellectual Revolution in Modern China.

44. "Guangzhou gongchandang de baogao," in Yida qianhou, vol. 3, pp. 10–14. This report was delivered to the First Party Congress by Chen Gongbo. The report was translated back into Chinese from Russian. A copy of the report was returned to China from the Archives of the Chinese Delegation to the Comintern that are kept in Moscow.

45. This is puzzling as the paper edited by Chen was Qunbao (The Masses). Perhaps the name has been changed in the process of translation from Chinese to Russian and back again to Chinese.

46. This is probably Laodongzhe (The Worker), which began publication on 3 October 1920 and continued publication until 2 January 1921. It is unclear which journal is referred to below under this name.

47. Huang himself was one of the leading anarchists in Canton.

48. The transliterations in the Chinese text are Bie Si-lin and Mi Nuo-er. The Soviet historian Professor Shevelyov identifies these two as Stoyanovich and Perlin. Shevelyov, "On the History of the Formation of the Communist Party of China," p. 130. It is not clear whether person "B" referred to above is also Stoyanovich.

49. Chen left Shanghai on 16 December 1920 to take up the post of commissioner of education for Guangdong Province.

50. This presumably refers to the Shanghai-based Gongchandang monthly that began in November 1920 and ceased publication in July 1921. It was edited by the Shanghai communist group.

51. Chen was the governor of Guangdong and had invited Chen Duxiu to become the province's education commissioner.

53. According to the "Program," either when membership exceeded 500 or when five local executive committees had been set up, the CEC would be organized. See above, "The First Program of the CCP," Doc. A.3.

54. "Bericht des Genossen H. Maring für die Executive." The original copy of this document in German is in the van Ravesteyn Archives, at the International Institute of Social History, Amsterdam. This is the report Sneevliet delivered to the ECCI in Moscow on 11 July 1922. It sums up his work during his first year for the Comintern in China. The extracts translated here only concern his trip to visit Sun Yat-sen's headquarters in South China. In the first part, the report deals with work in Shanghai from June until December 1921. The full report also deals with his work related to Korea, Japan, Java, Indochina, and the Philippines. A full English translation can be found in Saich, The Origins of the First United Front in China, vol. 1, pp. 305–25.

55. This was the Hong Kong Sailors' Strike, which lasted from 12 January to 5 May 1922. The strike ended in a significant victory for the seamen, who won a 15 to 30 percent wage increase.

56. This refers to the strike at the Hua Shi Spinning Company that began on 13 January 1922. Although an agreement was reached on 16 January, it did not prevent the provincial governor from ordering the execution of the two leaders, Huang Ai and Pang Renquan.

57. Maring is clearly referring to the GMD and not the CCP.

58. The pejorative meaning of the term dujun used by Maring was warlord. Its literal meaning was military governor.

59. This was not true. The strike was led by Su Zhaozheng and Li Weimin who, at the time, were not members of any political party.

60. Sun Yat-sen, The International Development of China.

61. This was in 1913 during the "second revolution." The dismissal, by Yuan Shikai, of the GMD governors of Jiangxi and Guangdong provinces caused a military uprising against Yuan. The uprising had collapsed by September, and most of its supporters were driven into hiding. In November 1913, following his election to the presidency, Yuan ordered the GMD to be dissolved.

62. On 1 September 1917, Sun Yat-sen was elected grand marshal of the military government in Canton. Sun resigned from the government in April 1918.

63. Sun Yat-sen was driven out by Chen Jiongming in June 1922. He remained on a gunboat in Canton waters until leaving for Shanghai on 9 August.

64. Maring was appointed representative for the Comintern and Profintern in Canton.

67. The Beiyang militarists derived their name from the new imperial army trained by Yuan Shikai from 1895. The army formed the basis of the Beiyang clique. Five early officers, apart from Yuan, became president or premier of the Republic.

The text is virtually identical with that published in Ch'en Kung-po, The Communist Movement in China, pp. 119–21. Minor discrepancies can be accounted for in the process of translation. The main difference is the translation of the term minzhu. Chen uses "nationalist" for this term, whereas in this document "democratic" is preferred. However, the two do seem to have been used interchangeably at the time, and the resolution implies that the democratic elements who are referred to are primarily those of the GMD.

71. "Revolutionary" is used here although the Chinese term gexin literally means "innovative."

78. This is the instruction which Maring took back to China and which formed the basis of discussions at Hangzhou about communist entry into the GMD. According to Maring, the instruction was written by Radek on the basis of Maring's statements about China. See letter from H. Maring to G. Zinoviev, N. Bukharin, and K. Radek, 20 June 1923, Sneevliet Archives, no. 231.

This version is handwritten in English by Maring and is held in the Sneevliet Archives, no. 224. Misspellings have been retained from the original.

A slightly different version of this document was published in Moscow in 1969. Importantly, this version does not include points five and six. See Komintern i vostok: bor'ba za Leninskuiu strategiiu i taktika v natsionalno osvoboditel'nom dvizhenii, pp. 252 and 302. This version is probably the official version written by Radek.

Commentary B

Cooperation and Conflict with the Nationalists: The United Front in Action, 1924–July 1927

The Comintern directives of January and May 1923 and the relevant decisions adopted at the CCP's Third Congress sketched the strategy and tactics to be followed in cooperating with the GMD during the national revolution. The main targets of the revolution were imperialism and its Chinese supporters. While fighting these enemies, the CCP was to strengthen its position within the GMD and more broadly within the nationalist movement through CCP control of the peasant and labor movements. To use Stalin's metaphor, the GMD-right would be squeezed like a lemon and flung aside. All acknowledged that a time would come when the interests of the bourgeoisie at the head of the nationalist movement would clash with those of the proletariat. At this point, the representatives of the proletariat were to cease the temporary cooperation and take over leadership. Deciding when this time had come proved difficult, and it was Chiang Kai-shek who acted first, putting down the CCP-led workers' movement in Shanghai in April 1927.

Initially, the United Front had proved very successful for the small group of Communists. Between January 1924 and May 1926, communist influence in the GMD grew steadily. Communist influence in the urban areas received a boost from the nationalist demonstrations of the May 30 Movement (1925). The protection of the nationalist armies in the south helped the CCP to develop its influence among the peasantry. CCP membership rose from just under 1,000 in January 1925 to almost 58,000 by April 1927.

The CCP's success was one major reason for its undoing. Some GMD leaders came to see it as a significant threat to their leadership of the revolution. The increasing revolutionary activity in the countryside unsettled those GMD leaders who did not favor a complete breakup of the traditional power structure. In fact, the CCP was caught between the consequences of conflicting objectives. On the one hand, it was trying to promote the national revolution in cooperation with the GMD while on the other it was also pursuing a social revolution that brought it into conflict with powerful elements within the GMD. As the CCP tried to restructure the GMD in order to attain its own goals, opposition within the GMD to CCP membership strengthened. This conflict with the CCP and a reassessment of cooperation were accompanied by a growing rift between the left and right wings of the GMD and the concentration of military power in the hands of

The CCP was also divided on the policy of cooperation with the GMD. The situation looked quite different to Chen Duxiu, Voitinsky, and the Party Center working illegally among the proletariat in Shanghai than it did to Borodin and the Communists working openly in Canton under GMD protection and developing the peasant movement. Borodin spoke of this conflict in Moscow in 1930 during his self-defense against accusations of counterrevolutionary behavior. He remarked that there had been “two lines in the Chinese revolution,” one in Shanghai and one in Canton.¹ Friction between these two rival centers undermined the party’s capacity to act coherently when threatened by opponents in the GMD. While Chen Duxiu, on a number of occasions, called for the withdrawal of CCP members from the GMD and the creation of an open GMD-CCP alliance, the Canton party organization called for the takeover of the GMD leadership. The situation was complicated by the Comintern’s repeated insistence that the CCP remain within the GMD while, at the same time, strengthening its independent position among the mass movements.

Communist influence within the GMD was helped by the aid Soviet Russia was willing to donate and by the reorganization of the GMD into a Leninist-style party. Borodin had been sent to monitor this work. Unlike Maring, he was not merely a Comintern representative but was sent by the Soviet government and also represented the Russian Communist Party (Bolshevik).² Arriving in Canton early in October 1923, Borodin immediately set to work. His first task was to bring about the reorganization of the GMD, and in this endeavor he found Sun Yat-sen’s willing support. Borodin acted as adviser to the Provisional CEC set up in late October by Sun Yat-sen to draw up plans for party reorganization and to prepare for the national GMD congress. It was Borodin who provided the draft of the GMD Constitution.³

GMD reorganization reached its fruition at its First National Congress (January 1924). The Congress shifted the GMD to the left with a Manifesto that stressed the themes of anti-imperialism and antiwarlordism and appealed for far-reaching political, economic, and social reforms. The Communists were reasonably represented in the GMD’s leading bodies. Three were elected to the twenty-four-person CEC and seven to the sixteen alternates.⁴ Communists headed two of the GMD’s eight central bureaus—organization (Tan Pingshan) and peasantry (Lin Boqu).

Despite this progress, the CCP was aware that the “rightist majority” in the GMD was opposed to its members being in the GMD. As a result, the first enlarged meeting of the CCP’s CEC (14–16 May 1924) decided on an important shift in the tactic of working within the GMD.⁵ Previously, the GMD had been treated as a homogeneous organization. Now, it was divided into a friendly left wing and a hostile right wing (Doc. B.1). CCP members were defined as the backbone of the left, thus making the clash, in reality, one between the CCP and the GMD-right. However, caution was urged in dealing with the right. Open struggle was to be avoided but criticism within the GMD and in the CCP press was to be used to push the GMD back onto the road of the anti-imperialist struggle. All means were to be used to strengthen the GMD-left. Shortly after entering the GMD, the CCP had formed secret organizations to maintain discipline. This is confirmed by the report to the meeting of the Anyang party organization. The report cautioned, however, that "comrades" in leading positions in the GMD were to avoid creating the suspicion of monopolizing power and of manipulation.⁶ The new policy position dividing the GMD into a left and a right wing was disseminated throughout the party in the latter part of July 1924 (Doc. B.2). This secret circular stressed the need to strengthen the left of the GMD at the expense of the right and even hinted at the creation of a new GMD. The CCP sought constantly for signs of the development of a GMD-left that it could support.

The meeting also addressed the question of how to revitalize the labor movement. The resolution on the labor movement reaffirmed concentration of work on the triumvirate of railway workers, miners, and sailors and called for the creation of large organizations based on ten-person organizational units (Doc. B.3). The party was to pay particular attention to these small groups as they would determine the character of the whole union. Interestingly, since the proletariat was defined as the basis of the CCP, the party was not to help the GMD to penetrate the industrial proletariat organizationally. However, the GMD could be helped to organize unions for shop assistants and handicraft workers. The report of the Shanghai party organization shows the difficulties the party was encountering in practice when trying to organize the proletariat in China's main industrial center (Doc. B.4).

The expansion of party work led to the proposal that specialized departments for organization, propaganda, and the worker and peasant movement be set up under the Central Bureau. These departments were also to be set up at the area level. In addition, an editorial committee was to be established that would report to the full CEC. It was to be in charge of all newspapers, etc., of the Party Center.⁷

In the latter part of 1924, a major power shift in Beijing appeared to offer a favorable opportunity for the nationalist movement in general and for Sun Yat-sen in particular to exert influence on the national stage. In October 1924 a subordinate of Wu Peifu, Feng Yuxiang, disobeyed orders to march against Zhang Zuolin, the head of the Fengtian clique. Instead, Feng formed an alliance with Zhang and together they seized power in Beijing. This resulted in the fall of Wu and the collapse of the Zhili clique in north China. Sun Yat-sen, invited to the capital to participate in discussions on China's reunification, arrived on 31 December 1924 with the intention to establish a National Assembly composed of delegates from mass organizations, chambers of commerce, and armies opposed to Wu Peifu. This, it will be remembered, was something that the CCP had tried, to no avail, to impress on Sun in June 1923. However, the negotiations did not go well. On 24 November 1924, Duan Qirui took over the government, replacing Cao Kun. Instead of the National Assembly, Duan favored convening a “National Rehabilitation Conference.” Sun opposed this because it would exclude representatives from the mass organizations and would favor the militarists.⁸ On 1 February 1925, the Conference was convened and led to a break between Duan and the GMD.

Despite previous support for a National Assembly, Sun’s trip to Beijing created divisions in the CCP. Chen Duxiu and the Party Center opposed the trip, feeling that Sun should remain in Canton to consolidate the achievements of the revolution. Borodin and the Canton Communists thought that by going to Beijing Sun would expand the movement’s influence.⁹ Borodin’s view prevailed and the CCP began publicly to support the calls for a National Assembly.

(b) The CCP Fourth Party Congress (January 1925) Prepares for a Rising Tide of Revolution

Under these circumstances, CCP delegates to the Fourth Party Congress gathered in Shanghai from 11 to 22 January 1925.¹⁰ The tone of the Congress was optimistic. Both the Manifesto and the Resolution on the CEC Report adopted by the Congress predicted that the divisions among the militarists and the conflicts between the imperialist nations in China would provide the mass movement with an excellent chance for expansion (the Resolution is included here as Doc. B.5). The Congress Manifesto, in particular, stressed the desire of the urban masses to convene the National Assembly.¹¹

The Congress tried to prepare the party for dealing with the new high tide of revolutionary activity which it predicted would occur. In particular, the Congress sought to clarify the relationship of the CCP to the national revolutionary movement, to define more clearly labor and peasant policies, and to adjust the party’s organizational structure.

The Congress reviewed the national revolutionary movement to date and tried to outline the correct policy for the CCP with respect to the GMD (Doc. B.6). Many CCP members were finding it difficult to strike a balance between developing the GMD in the nationalist movement while not ignoring the CCP’s own agenda. This tension persisted until the two parties split in 1927. The resolution reflects Chen Duxiu’s caution about CCP involvement with the GMD. While “leftist” mistakes included continuing to promote the proletarian revolution and opposing entry into the GMD and the nationalist revolution for fear that the CCP would become a “yellow” party, “rightist” mistakes were defined as being more dangerous. The tendency among members to think that concentration on the nationalist movement and the GMD meant ignoring the CCP’s own work was criticized, as was the belief that a policy of compromise between capital and labor should be pursued.

In contrast to the May 1924 division of the GMD into a left and a right (Doc. B.2), a center was now discovered. The left comprised the workers, peasants, and radical intellectuals; the right comprised the military, bureaucrats, politicians, and capitalists; and the center consisted of the revolutionary elements in the “petty bourgeois intellectual class.” This center was deemed important because although numerically weak, its members occupied leading positions in the GMD. The CCP’s task was to expand the GMD-left. However, this was not to lead to the neglect of opposition to imperialism and the economic struggles of the peasantry and the working class.

Communist strength was still seen to be in the labor movement. The movement was said to be entering a new phase that would offer opportunities for expansion (Doc. B.7). Although the labor movement was seen as the key component in the nationalist revolution, the resolution adopted made it clear that preservation of its independence was most important. In fact, the Canton Communists were criticized for allowing the labor movement to lose its independence, a problem that was claimed to have been corrected at the May 1924 enlarged CEC meeting.

The creation of a strong, independent labor organization would ensure CCP dominance of the nationalist movement, as it was, by self-definition, “the leader of the working class.” Thus the CCP’s first task was to organize labor unions and promote class-based propaganda. The use of party branches at the workplace was stressed. They were to ensure that party policy was carried out and to guide work in the labor unions and the small groups in the factories. In the future, all factories, etc., in which there were three or more members would be able to form a party branch.

The development of the peasant movement in areas under GMD control in south China caused the Congress to adopt the party’s most extensive resolution on the peasantry to date (Doc. B.8). However, it still did not provide a concrete plan of action. The special place of the peasantry in the Chinese revolutionary movement was acknowledged, and its participation was seen as vital for success. While expressing support for GMD policy in the south, the resolution criticized the GMD for using the peasantry for its own ends. It claimed that the GMD organized peasant associations in areas where it needed their support but did not force landlords to give way to the peasantry; nor did the GMD sufficiently protect the economic and political rights of the peasantry. The resolution provides a good example of the ambiguity concerning work within the United Front. At one moment it is calling for the use of the GMD’s organization; the next it is chiding the GMD and then calls for independent action. It is not surprising that some comrades were confused about the exact relationship of their work to that of the GMD. The resolution also criticized the policy of the Canton Communists. It claimed that their stress on the role of the GMD had caused the peasantry to doubt its own strength and to fail to understand its own class position. This had caused the peasantry to become disappointed with the CCP.

The Congress also adopted a new Constitution to tighten up organization and to ratify changes adopted at the May 1924 meeting (Doc. B.9). Indeed, the resolution on organization adopted by the Congress defined it as the most important question concerning the party’s “survival and development.” Improvements in organization would enable the party to break out from being merely a collection of “small propaganda groups.” In particular, the resolution stressed the role of the branch as the basic unit of party organization.¹² To recruit more workers and peasants, membership procedures were to be relaxed. In the future, it would not be necessary for prospective members to pass through the SYL, and “class-conscious elements” would be able to join the party directly. The party was to be enlarged at the local level by changing the requirement that five members were necessary to form a cell (xiaozu) to only three being needed to form a branch (zhibu). This emphasis on the branch marked an attempt to change the party from being area-based to being occupation-based. To control party activities in other organizations such as the GMD, the formation of party fractions (dangtuan) was confirmed.

In line with the new Constitution, the Congress elected a new CEC of nine members with five alternates. Chen Duxiu was elected general secretary by the CEC, the post replacing that of chair of the Central Bureau.¹³

The Congress provided a set of resolutions and organizational changes which it hoped would help the party cope with the expected upsurge in the revolutionary movement. Despite the collapse of the talks in Beijing and Sun Yat-sen’s death (12 March 1925), events took an even more radical turn than expected. The May 30 Movement (1925) witnessed a massive upsurge in nationalist sentiment and provided the party with a chance for rapid expansion, particularly in urban Shanghai. However, the movement brought with it new headaches as the Party Center tried to grapple with the new situation and the influx of members.

In February 1925 a strike began against the Japanese-owned textile mills in Shanghai. After simmering for a few months, it exploded on 15 May when a factory guard killed one of the strikers and wounded others. Incidents spread as did injuries and arrests, and on 28 May the CCP together with other organizations called for coordinated demonstrations to take place on 30 May. International Settlement police opened fire on the demonstrators, killing ten and wounding and arresting many others. In an attempt to gain control of the movement, the CCP set up the Shanghai General Labor Union.¹⁴ The movement in Shanghai continued until July when it began to wind down, and by mid-September the General Labor Union had been forcibly closed down and the CCP leadership had gone underground. The movement spread to other cities and caused the Hong Kong–Canton strike that lasted from June 1925 until October 1926. Communist influence spread as a result of the movement, and party membership increased from 994 at the time of the Congress to some 3,000 in October 1925.¹⁵

(c) The CCP CEC in October 1925 Moves to Expand Party Membership

In October 1925, an enlarged CEC meeting convened to consider the implications for the party of the May 30 Movement.¹⁶ The resolution on the current situation adopted by the meeting decided that events had provided an excellent opportunity for expanding the national revolutionary movement and concluded that the working class had clearly proved its leading role (Doc. B.10). The resolution also suggested that young workers be organized into armed groups of ten or 100 with a military committee set up under the CEC.

In light of developments, the party's main task was to expand its ranks and transform itself from a "small group" into a "central mass political party" (Doc. B.11). This transformation was to be completed in the shortest possible time. To help expand membership, procedures for joining the party were to be relaxed further than at the Fourth Party Congress. Complicated membership procedures were to be waived for revolutionary workers, students, and peasants. To encourage more workers and peasants to join the party, their probation period was reduced to one month, while intellectuals had to wait for three months (previously three and six months). The idea of some party members that all new recruits should have an understanding of Marxism was criticized; workers in large-scale industries were said to be natural CP members. As long as they had class consciousness and loyalty to the revolution, they could join the party without having to satisfy other criteria.

This stress on expanding its own membership did not mean, however, that the CCP was to sever relations with the GMD. Expansion of the CCP apparatus was seen as conducive to the policy of allying with the left against the right of the GMD (Doc. B.12). Clearly, many party members were still confused by the policy, and the meeting again tried to clarify the divisions in the GMD. The Fourth Party Congress (January 1925) analysis dividing the GMD into left, center, and right was said to be erroneous both theoretically and strategically. GMD members had interpreted the distinction as meaning that the CCP was the left of the GMD and thus they saw themselves as the center. On the other hand, "genuine rightists" considered themselves to belong to the center. Now the GMD was defined as having only a left and a right with many on the right having become reactionaries.¹⁷ To make the distinction clear to party members, the resolution provided them with a simple guide to policy positions of the three groups. However, the Party Center had not resolved its own confusion—in its proclamation to the peasantry, it referred to landlords and businessmen who colluded with the center and the right of the GMD.

The question of the peasantry was addressed at some length at the meeting (Doc. B.13). The proclamation for the peasantry stated that the fundamental solution to the problems they faced was land confiscation. However, only the land of big landlords, warlords, bureaucrats, and the churches was to be taken. An eight-point program for the peasantry's minimum demands was outlined. It was based on experience in the south and developed the ideas put forward by Chen Duxiu in November 1922 (see Doc. A.18). It called for recognition of peasant associations and the establishment of elected self-governing bodies in the countryside, the setting of maximum rents and minimal grain prices by the associations and self-governing bodies, the provision of interest-free loans to the peasantry, special funding for river control, and the creation of armed peasant self-defense corps. Despite this stress on the peasantry, the main revolutionary force was still the working class.

The proclamation for the peasantry made it clear that to achieve its aims it must ally with the working class.

Tensions between the Canton party apparatus and the Party Center rose to the surface at the meeting. Naturally, Canton was acknowledged as an important place for the nationalist revolution, but the meeting was critical of various aspects of the comrades' work there. The Guangdong area was criticized for not consolidating and expanding the party during the revolutionary upsurge. Party members were said to work individually in labor unions, in peasant associations, and among troops under the control of the GMD (Doc. B.10). As a result, a critical resolution on the Guangdong area's report was adopted by the meeting. The problems with work in Guangdong meant that the masses did not see CCP members as being distinct from the GMD, and the CCP appeared to the people as a "shadow" wearing the mask of the GMD. The most important task for the area organization was to rapidly expand the number of party members. To ensure that the wishes of the Party Center were being carried out, it would send a "capable comrade" to help the area improve its organizational work.¹⁸

Organizationally, the meeting recognized the importance of the peasant movement by splitting the workers and peasants' committee into two. It also decided that a military committee would be formed (Doc. B.11). In fact, the Fourth Party Congress had already decided to establish a labor movement committee, although the precise date of its separation from the joint workers and peasants' department is unclear. Both the old department and the new committee were headed by Zhang Guotao. The peasant committee was not formed until November 1926; Mao Zedong acted as its secretary. The military department was founded at the end of 1925, with Zhang Guotao as its head; it was changed to the military committee in November 1926 under the secretaryship of Zhou Enlai.¹⁹ The increased workload meant that a clearer division of tasks had to be made, and it was suggested that the secretaries of the CEC and of the areas should avoid assuming positions in the other committees and departments.

While the force of the labor movement began to decline in Shanghai during the latter part of 1925, the GMD began to tighten its control over the Canton area. Furthermore, it appeared that the GMD-left was asserting its superiority over the right. In late September/early October 1925, the Second Eastern Expedition was launched against the troops of Chen Jiongmeng, which had been threatening the nationalist government. The expedition was under the military command of Chiang Kai-shek with Zhou Enlai as head of the political department. It was very successful, and by mid-December, with the exception of Hainan, southern Guangdong had been brought under control.

The form of cooperation with the CCP caused considerable unrest among many GMD members. In the initial period after the death of Sun Yat-sen (12 March 1925), the left strengthened its control over the party apparatus, but as time went on, opposition to the Communists grew. In August 1925, Liao Zhongkai, an ardent supporter of communist participation in the GMD and the alliance with Soviet Russia, was assassinated. In late November 1925, a group of GMD members met in the Western Hills outside Beijing and called for the expulsion of Communists from the GMD and the expulsion of Borodin from Canton. In addition, there was the opposition of Dai Jitao, who in August 1925 had published a pamphlet criticizing the admittance of CCP members into the GMD. Dai felt that the Communists were using the GMD to expand their own influence. He wanted the GMD to tighten its organization to resist Communist infiltration. His views were criticized at the October 1925 CCP CEC meeting and in an article by Chen Duxiu published in August. Chen accused Dai of seeing the need only for national struggle but not class struggle and of seeing communist participation as destroying the GMD rather than helping it.²⁰

Despite these problems, the GMD's Second National Congress (4-19 January 1926) marked a significant victory for the GMD-left and the policy of collaboration with the CCP. The Communists occupied seven (possibly eight) of the thirty-six places on the CEC and one-third of the nine positions on its Standing Committee. Furthermore, Communists and the GMD-left made up a majority of delegates to the Congress.

(d) Problems Within the CCP and with the GMD (February-July 1926)

Thus, when a special meeting of the CCP CEC convened in Beijing from 21 to 24 February 1926, left-wing control of the GMD seemed to be a reality.²¹ The meeting adopted a major shift in strategy that favored the policies of the party apparatus in Canton over the urban-based policy favored by the Party Center. This shift was aided by the fact that Chen Duxiu could not attend the meeting because of illness. The resolution adopted on the current political situation noted the increasing isolation of the proletariat after the May 30 Movement (Doc. B.14). The bourgeoisie had been shown in its true colors, and it was clear that the main ally was the peasantry. The peasants' struggle was of vital importance, and only an alliance with the proletariat could bring about the final victory of the nationalist revolution. The most important task for the party in the future was to prepare for the extension of the power of the Canton revolutionary government during the Northern Expedition.²² During the Northern Expedition, work among the peasantry was to be intensified, while the alliance of workers and peasants was to be strengthened to bring national victory.

Shanghai was no longer seen as the revolutionary center, and thus it was suggested that the seat of the CEC be moved to either Beijing or Canton. Only a liaison bureau would remain in Shanghai. Because Canton was not convenient for promoting the revolution on a national scale, Beijing was seen as the best place to move to. This was dependent on the Guomin jun maintaining control in the area.²³

However, confidence in the GMD was soon shaken by the "Zhongshan Incident" of 20 March 1926. Chiang Kai-shek imposed martial law claiming that Communists in command of a gunboat, the Zhongshan, were planning to kidnap him. Whether the plot was real or not, it provided Chiang with the chance to clip the wings of the Communists. He placed some fifty together with the Soviet advisors under house arrest. On his return to Canton, Borodin negotiated their release but at a price. Chiang made a number of proposals to restrict CCP activity in the GMD, and these were accepted with minor revisions at a GMD CEC meeting in May. In the future, apart from curtailing its activities within the GMD, the CCP was to supply a list of all its members in the GMD and abandon its separate organizations in the GMD, and CCP members could no longer serve as bureau head in nationalist organizations. This last point meant that the Communist Tan Pingshan had to give up the powerful post of head of the organization department to Chiang Kai-shek. Further, the GMD CEC decided to restrict communist membership on executive committees to no more than one-third of the seats. Borodin was also forced to support the Northern Expedition to which he had previously been opposed in return for Chiang's promises to curb the GMD-right.²⁴ Chiang, of course, was still dependent on Soviet arms and aid for the Northern Expedition and made it clear that his original actions had not been against the alliance with Soviet Russia as such. The Northern Expedition was officially launched at the beginning of July 1926 even though some units had gone north earlier.

These events caused the Communists further confusion. Publicly, they accepted the new regulations passed by the GMD CEC in May, but privately there were conflicts about the way forward. It appears that the Canton area proposed an immediate counterattack against Chiang and the takeover of the GMD from within; Chen Duxiu, on the other hand, proposed withdrawal. In June, a compromise was suggested: cooperation would continue but as a bloc without rather than a bloc within.²⁵ However, this alternative was blocked by the Comintern.

From 12 to 18 July 1926, the CCP CEC met in Shanghai to discuss the situation and the question of the Northern Expedition.²⁶ In contrast to former comments, the expedition was now defined as a "defensive war" against the penetration of hostile forces in Hunan and Guangdong rather than as a "real revolutionary" action (Doc. B.15). Unlike the February meeting, attention was centered on continuing cooperation with the bourgeoisie rather than the seizure of power. The policy agenda was notably more moderate, and flexibility was encouraged when dealing with mass organizations.

The political resolution adopted argued that the bourgeoisie could not be ignored as a force in society, pointing out that since the May 30 Movement the bourgeoisie had become an important part of the nationalist movement and, especially in Shanghai, had demonstrated a capacity for leadership.²⁷ The tricky relationship with the GMD was yet again laid out for party members. The resolution dealing with relations between the two parties rejected both a policy of "mere cooperation" as in a "bloc without" and the idea that the CCP should take over the GMD from within. Events in Guangdong, the resolution said, had proved the latter to be an incorrect policy (Doc. B.16). In fact, it was suggested that the reason that the GMD-right and even the center were able to attack the Communists was because of mistaken CCP policies toward work in the GMD—a clear criticism of the Guangdong approach. Previous policy was criticized and a call was made for a return to the October 1925 policy position. However, there were differences. The GMD was now seen to consist of four blocs: the reactionary right, the new right comprising the reform movement of the bourgeoisie (including Chiang Kai-shek and Dai Jitao), the left comprising the resistance movement of the middle and small merchants, and the workers and peasants represented by the Communists.

Inevitably, the relaxation of regulations concerning party membership and the flood of new members had created problems. Now the party leadership complained that the quality of party members had decreased, with members lacking theoretical and practical experience and a “definite revolutionary philosophy of life.” As a result, propaganda and organizational work was to be tightened up to try to come to terms with the problems of running a mass party. Organizationally, four major problems were identified (Doc. B.17). First, the importance of organizational work was not recognized in the party; it was considered a technical matter, not a political one. This idea was rejected, and it was pointed out that without organization the mass movement could not be expanded. Second, the work of creating party branches in factories, etc., had still not gotten off the ground properly. Members had to realize that the branch was the core of the party. Third, the work of party bodies in other organizations such as the unions was also said to be very bad. Indeed, it seems that some members confused these organizations with the branches. Fourth, party organs were not sufficiently consolidated. To handle routine administrative work, a Central Secretariat was to be set up with Wang Ruofei as its head.

With respect to work among the masses, the watchwords were moderation and flexibility. In the peasant movement, “left deviation” was criticized; slogans were deemed to have been too extreme and actions too leftist. This had caused a backlash damaging rather than improving the peasants’ situation. The resolution concerning the peasantry adopted at the meeting provided a detailed economic and political program, although a complete political platform had to wait until the Fifth Party Congress.²⁸ The program was more moderate than that adopted in October 1925. Land confiscation was no longer central; the resolution called for only the most reactionary landlords to be attacked. Similarly, while criticism of the church was acceptable, any actual conflict was to be avoided. While the peasants could arm themselves for self-defense, the limits of self-defense were not to be exceeded. To keep the peasants in check, political training was deemed to be more important than military training. A bureaucratic approach to organization was criticized, and flexibility in organization was called for.

The experiences of the peasant movement in Guangdong were important in shaping the resolution, although it is clear that the CEC of the CCP favored a more cautious position. The meeting adopted a long resolution on the report on the peasant movement in Guangdong (Doc. B.18). Despite acknowledging progress, the resolution was critical of the work by the Guangdong comrades. They had not made their own clear proposals, and those they had raised were impractical and too general, thus disappointing the peasant masses. Work was described as superficial. Further, the success of the peasant movement had left the local party in no state to deal with the movement. It was estimated that some 800,000 peasants were members of peasant associations in sixty counties, while there were only 600 party members spread over fewer than twenty counties.

To resolve these problems, the party was to focus its energies on building a foundation within the township peasant associations. To prevent “local tyrants and evil gentry” from controlling the associations, a two-tier membership system was to be adopted. Those who worked the land themselves were counted as formal members, while all others were classified as special members without voting rights. The party apparatus in the countryside was to be expanded through a system of training courses. Some thirty peasants were to be recruited from the ten counties close to Canton, and they would undergo a one-month training program. There were to be six such courses. All participants were to be recruited into the party, thus providing it with 1,800 new rural members. This formed an important part of the concerted drive to raise the political consciousness of the peasantry.

A bureaucratic approach toward work in the labor movement was also criticized. According to the resolution on the labor movement, past practice had failed to adapt organizational forms to the needs of the workers and the situation at hand.²⁹ Excesses in the labor movement were criticized because they could lead to a break with the GMD. The resolution pointed out shortcomings in work in Canton such as the persistence of the guild tradition and the influence of reactionary leaders among some workers.

The meeting restored Shanghai to pride of place in the revolutionary movement, defining it as the “heart of the country’s anti-imperialist movement” (Doc. B.19). In Shanghai, it was stated, a “genuine CP” could be created. The local party committee was instructed to concentrate on local political movements in order to win over the middle and petty bourgeois masses.

In the second half of 1926, while Chiang Kai-shek was engaged in the war effort, the Communists were able to strengthen their position. Within the GMD, the left appeared to be in ascendancy once again, and the movement to bring back the recognized leader of the left, Wang Jingwei, was gaining momentum.³⁰ In October 1926, the city of Wuhan was taken by the GMD with the help of strikes in the city led by the Communists.

The labor and peasant movements underwent an upsurge with the advance of the Northern Expedition. The peasant movement gained rapidly in strength in Guangdong, Jiangxi, Hubei, and Hunan. The power of the peasant movement had placed the Party Center, which was under Comintern pressure, in a dilemma: how to allow the movement to develop without endangering the alliance with the GMD.

(e) Mao Zedong Backs the Peasant Movement;
Chen Duxiu Backs the GMD-Left (November 1926–April 1927)

No such dilemma existed for Mao Zedong. In March 1927 he wrote his report on the Hunan peasant movement, a document that heralded a significant break with party policy (Doc. B.20). In contrast to the Party Center, Mao saw the “excesses” in the peasant movement as being necessary to overcome the counterrevolutionaries and the power of the gentry in the countryside. Mao even went so far as to criticize erroneous decisions taken by the nationalist government in Wuhan. However, Mao’s criticism went beyond the level of tactics to criticize the whole strategy of revolution in China. While CEC policy upheld the Comintern’s view that the revolutionary vanguard remained the proletariat, Mao gave pride of place to the poor peasantry. The proletariat is relegated to a place of virtual insignificance in Mao’s report. This marks a crucial stage in Mao’s approach to the problems of the Chinese revolution. Yet, while he now recognized the need to focus revolutionary activity on the accelerating peasant movement, he had not combined peasant organization with military power (the formula that would ultimately result in success for the communist movement).

Within the CCP, there were still major differences of opinion concerning the question of cooperation with the GMD. At the end of 1926, the Party Center convened two important meetings to exert its authority. On 4–5 November 1926, a meeting of the party’s leadership was convened at which Chen Duxiu delivered a report highly critical of the views of the Canton party and “some foreign Communists.” This was in response to a report by the Canton party (Doc. B.21). He attacked their view that the nationalist revolution had almost succeeded and that the proletarian revolution was about to start (Doc. B.22). He pointed out that two-thirds of China was still under the control of the Fengtian or Zhili warlords. The fact that the tasks of the nationalist revolution were not yet completed meant that it was necessary to remain in the GMD and unite with its left wing. Withdrawal from the GMD would allow the new right to ally with the GMD-left and take over leadership of the revolution. Importantly, Chen put forward what was to become the standard CCP interpretation of Sun Yat-sen’s legacy, namely, his “three fundamental policies of allying with Soviet Russia, allying with the CP, and supporting the workers and peasants.” While Sun was willing to let CP members join the GMD, there is no evidence to suggest that he favored an alliance with the CCP as such.³¹ Now that the CCP had become a “mass party,” Chen was interpreting Sun’s legacy in such a way as not only to call for an alliance between the two parties but to legitimize the call by tracing the idea back to Sun’s own intentions.

The Canton party organization denied that there was a left wing in the GMD leadership; there was only a group of people who could not get along with the center and right of the party. They had no political program and no political base. It referred to this group as a quasi-left, which under certain circumstances, and at certain times, should be supported (Doc. B.21). This meant that the real left among the masses was without leadership. As a result, the CCP was to put itself at the head of the masses in the struggle.

Chen Duxiu returned to the attack in his political report to the special meeting of the Party Center on 13 December 1926 (Doc. B.23).³² He suggested that some members, particularly Borodin and those in Canton, were suffering from a “left sickness.” The disease had a number of symptoms, such as disrespect for the GMD and the attempt to monopolize all work within it for the peasant movement. Indeed, the Canton comrades were said to think that the GMD had died after the 20 March incident (1926). Naturally, if the GMD had died it could not have a left wing. Also, Chen criticized the Beijing and Hubei comrades for misunderstanding the notion of party independence by taking it to mean that all political struggle should be conducted independently.

The “Resolution on the Question of the GMD-Left” adopted at the meeting shows the victory of Chen’s views (Doc. B.24). Denial of a left in the GMD would leave the CCP with only two choices, both of which were deemed to be wrong. Either the CCP could cooperate with the right and join them in oppressing the masses or it could lead the masses, in a direct struggle against the right. If the existence of the left in the GMD were denied, all that would remain was a struggle between the CCP and the GMD. This latter path was the one the Canton comrades were said to be following. The Party Center resolved to oppose their views, to develop the strength of the GMD-left and help it gain leadership positions in party and government, and to help them extend their influence over the urban revolutionary petty bourgeoisie and intellectuals, and the peasantry.

This policy was in line with Comintern views. The “Theses on the Chinese Question” adopted at the Seventh Plenum of the ECCI (November–December 1926) called for continued CCP cooperation with the GMD-left to bring about the success of the nationalist revolution.³³ The GMD-right was not to be allowed to turn the GMD into a bourgeois party. At the same time, the “Theses” called for the CCP to take control of the social revolution. The agrarian revolution was defined as the central component in the revolutionary struggle, and the Communists were to gain “real power” in the rural areas through the peasant associations. According to the “Theses,” the fear that intensification of class struggle in the village would weaken the united anti-imperialist front was unfounded.

This approach may have seemed feasible for those situated in Moscow but the CCP was unable to act on these conflicting demands. The CCP alienated the radical peasant leaders by trying to check the “excesses,” but at the same time it still aroused the hostility and suspicion of the GMD-left. The documents from the December 1926 meeting acknowledged the weakness of the GMD-left, while a January 1927 political report noted that the right was becoming aroused precisely because of communist control of the labor and peasant movements.³⁴

Despite these tensions, in the latter part of 1926 and early 1927, the move to strengthen the left and shore up the cooperation did show positive results. At the GMD CEC meeting in December, the Communists won a victory when it was decided to move the seat of government to Wuhan rather than to Nanchang as Chiang Kai-shek wished (Chiang’s headquarters were in Nanchang). In March 1927 the Third Plenum of the GMD CEC moved to undermine Chiang’s military power by reestablishing the military council and thus subordinating him to its command. Also, it cut his political power by abolishing the post of chair of the CEC (held by Chiang) and establishing a seven-person Presidium of the Political Council. The left took the key positions in elections with Wang Jingwei, who like Chiang was not present, emerging as the key figure. Further, communist collaboration in the national government was called for, and Communists took over as heads of the ministries of labor and agriculture.

Cooperation reached a high point on 5 April 1927 when Chen Duxiu and Wang Jingwei issued their joint statement.³⁵ Shanghai had already been taken by Chiang Kai-shek with the help of communist-led insurrections inside the city. The joint statement confirmed the leading role of the GMD in the nationalist revolution and stated that the CCP had never entertained the idea of overthrowing it. It acknowledged that proletarian revolution was not on the agenda. In words that would come back to haunt the authors, the statement said that “the military leaders in Shanghai have announced their obedience to the GMD central authorities.”³⁶

On 12 April, Chiang began to eliminate the Communists in those areas under his control. He was expelled from the GMD by the GMD-left based in Wuhan, and on 18 April Chiang set up his own government at Nanjing. Despite earlier warning signs, the CCP was completely unprepared for the attacks. The split in the GMD was now a reality. CCP organization in areas under Chiang’s control was broken. In Canton, the repression was similarly brutal: martial law was proclaimed on 15 April, and a purge was begun with orders for the immediate arrest of all CP members in the area.³⁷ By 27 April, some 2,000 suspected Communists had been captured, and many CCP members were executed. The repression also extended to Shantou, Xiamen, and Ningbo, while “leftists” were purged from GMD organizations in other cities in Guangdong, Zhejiang, and Jiangsu.³⁸

(f) The CCP Fifth Party Congress (April–May 1927) Tries (But Fails) to Preserve Its Alliance with the GMD-Left

It was in this atmosphere that delegates came together for the Fifth Party Congress in Hankou (27 April–9 May 1927).³⁹ The party had to deal with the issue of the “betrayal” of Chiang Kai-shek and how to proceed with the revolutionary movement. Far from ordering a break with the GMD, delegates argued about how to push ahead with the peasant movement without upsetting cooperation. Chiang’s “betrayal” was met head on and treated as a positive sign for the revolution. In a long and interesting review of party work since the Fourth Congress, Chen Duxiu said that Chiang’s betrayal had brought the Chinese revolution to a new stage (Doc. B.25). According to Chen, the bourgeoisie had now deserted the revolutionary front, reducing its numbers but improving its quality. The four-class bloc had been reduced to a “united front of workers, peasants, and petty bourgeoisie.” Thus, the future task was to strengthen these three classes and CCP work in the military. The small number of bourgeois elements who remained could be expelled if they displayed “counterrevolutionary tendencies.”

Future party policy was to concentrate on creating a “revolutionary democratic regime” in the areas held by the GMD, although it was acknowledged that this objective was still far off. According to Chen, the party was to discuss preparations for seizing power, and he described it as “no longer an opposition party” but one that was really going to lead the revolution.

Despite such bold words, however, the CCP was still going to have to work through its cooperation with the GMD. This meant that its policy toward the peasantry still erred to the side of caution, and ideas of confiscation of all land were rejected. Chen commented that while policy toward the peasant movement had been “too rightist” in the past, it would be wrong to adopt radical proposals now to confiscate the land of all landlords. This approach was reflected in the “Resolution on the Land Question” (Doc. B.26). While the resolution confirmed the switch in policy from rent reduction campaigns to land confiscation, it noted that the land of small landlords must not be confiscated.⁴⁰ Politically, all authority was to be placed in the village self-governing organizations, which were to be dominated by the oppressed classes. The peasants were to be armed to protect the gains of the revolution.

While much attention was paid to the peasant question, the labor movement was not forgotten. Chen Duxiu stated that the first priority of the Congress was to have a “unified policy and work plan for the labor unions.” Work for the labor movement was spelled out in a separate resolution (Doc. B.27). The last two years were described as representing a revival of the labor movement, and this revival had caused the bourgeoisie to betray the revolution. The resolution proposed an all-out attack on the bourgeoisie through a program of nationalization and workers’ participation in management. Workers’ commitment to this political struggle was to be supported by campaigns to improve their economic and social situation.

The growth of the CCP and its increasingly complex organization had put the CEC under great pressure, and it was unable to cope with the amount of work. According to Chen Duxiu, organizational affairs had been the worst aspect of the party’s work. The party was composed of individual groups, and unless something were done there would be nothing more than provincial parties. To tighten central control, the CC, formerly the CEC, was to be expanded and a Politburo created. To train party members, Chen suggested that a Central Party School be established.

The Congress did not amend the Constitution to accommodate these changes but instructed the Politburo to undertake the task.⁴¹ On 1 June 1927, a Politburo meeting adopted the new party Constitution (Doc. B.28). It was a much fuller document than the previous Constitution; it contained 81 articles in 12 chapters (as compared with 31 and 6 in the January 1925 Constitution). For the first time, democratic centralism was included in a Constitution as the guiding principle of the party. The Constitution spelled out in detail the organizational structure of the party and outlined two new central organs: the Central Supervisory Committee and the Standing Committee of the Politburo. The former organ was to tighten up party discipline, while the latter was to look after the party’s day-to-day business.

The Congress elected a CC of twenty-nine members with ten alternates. The new Politburo had seven members with four alternates. Chen Duxiu, Zhang Guotao, Cai Hesen, Qu Qiubai, and Li Wei-han formed the Standing Committee of the Politburo.⁴² Chen Duxiu remained general secretary.

The redefinition of the revolutionary forces and the moderate land policy did not help pull the party out of its dilemma. Despite the restrictions placed on the peasant movement, "excesses" continued to occur. The CCP ended up pleasing no one; the GMD government in Wuhan blamed the Communists for the excesses, and the peasant leaders blamed them for not supporting their radical actions and leaving them prey to the military force of warlords and GMD troops. Suppression of the Communists continued, and the events of summer 1927 seemed to make a mockery of the CCP leadership's decision to continue the alliance with the GMD. The Communists suffered blow after blow as one group after another of nationalist generals and politicians "betrayed the revolution."

The possibility of breaking with the GMD-left was reduced further by the messages coming from Moscow. Given his struggles with Trotsky, it was impossible for Stalin to acknowledge the folly of continued cooperation with the GMD. In May 1927, the ECCI also interpreted the break with Chiang Kai-shek in a positive light. It reemphasized the need to place the rural revolution at the center of the stage but only within the context of the continued alliance with the GMD.⁴³

The problem of continued cooperation was shown in disasters such as the "Horse Day" (21 May) massacre in Changsha, with the military suppression of communist-led mass organizations. The lengths to which the Communists were willing to go to preserve the alliance were shown by the fact that the joint GMD-CCP investigation into the incident declared that the peasants, under misguided leaders, had broken loose from control and precipitated a reign of terror over the people. The high point in CCP compromise came with the adoption by an enlarged CC meeting on 30 June of an eleven-point resolution on relations between the two parties. The resolution acknowledged that the GMD was the leader of the national revolution. Communists in government roles were to work only as GMD members. To minimize conflict, Communists holding government positions would give up their posts.⁴⁴ Further, mass organizations were instructed to submit to the leadership and control of the GMD authorities.⁴⁵ At a late stage, the party was stumbling toward the formation of a "bloc without" rather than a "bloc within," something that had been suggested by Chen Duxiu on a number of occasions.

Submissive gestures did not resolve the conflicts with the GMD-left in Wuhan. Wang Jingwei's suspicions of the Communists had been aroused further in early June when the Comintern delegate, M.N. Roy, had shown him the contents of a telegram from Stalin. It called for the Communists to reorganize the left and expel "reactionary leaders" and to prepare concrete steps for a revolutionary army, albeit still under nationalist leadership.⁴⁶

An uneasy truce prevailed until mid-July, and then events moved rapidly. Under pressure from the Comintern, Chen Duxiu resigned his position as general secretary.⁴⁷

On 12 July, a new five-person temporary Standing Committee of the Politburo was chosen,⁴⁸ and the following day it issued an open statement critical of the Wuhan government. On 15 July, the Wuhan GMD Political Affairs Committee announced the end of cooperation; on 1 August the CCP's Nanchang Uprising was launched; and on 5 August, Wang Jingwei began a large-scale purge of communist activists. Cooperation was ending in tragedy, and it was clear that the CCP had to develop a new strategy.

While the massacre of many Communists was the most visible legacy of the cooperation with the GMD, it had allowed the CCP to develop its organization on a much wider scale, especially in the south, than would otherwise have been the case. Further, it had been a valuable learning experience for the CCP. With expanded membership, it had begun to pay serious attention to its organizational structure. It gained influence in the southern labor and peasant movements and had trained a body of cadres and a number of military officers. These would all be useful in the future.

B.1 Resolution Concerning the Problem of CP Work in the GMD (May 1924)⁴⁹

Since its first congress, the GMD has gradually matured both ideologically and organizationally, primarily because of the active participation of our party members. However, as a result, it has become more difficult to maintain an element of class struggle in the national revolutionary movement. In the past year or so since the failure of the strike by the workers on the Beijing-Hankou railway [February 1923], China's industrial workers, especially those on the railways and in the mines, have begun to think again about class organization and are going to restore labor unions on a much larger scale than before. Yet, for a long time, a large number of GMD members have clearly shown their affinity with the possessing classes in industry and agriculture. Also, they have avoided the struggle against imperialism and, in the future, their class interests are certainly not going to be the same as those of ordinary laboring people. Their class nature inclines them toward compromise, and it is unlikely that they will be able to struggle to the end for the complete independence of the Chinese nation.

Therefore, on the questions of anti-imperialism, democracy,⁵⁰ reform policies for the peasantry, and concessions for the workers, two factions can be identified within the GMD. Naturally, the CP belongs to Sun Yat-sen's faction and those who are willing to implement the political agenda of the "Manifesto."⁵¹ In light of the present situation, the leftists in the GMD are Sun Yat-sen, his followers, and our comrades. In fact, our comrades are the basic force of this faction. Therefore, the so-called conflict between the leftists and rightists in the GMD is actually one between our party and the GMD-right. Thus, if we now adopt a policy to reconcile the leftists with the rightists in order to consolidate and expand the GMD, it would be a mistake.

This should not be taken to mean that we demand an immediate, mechanical purge of the rightists; nor should we launch personal attacks against or cause conflicts with the rightists. Our demand is for freedom of criticism within the GMD. Then we will be able use our party's papers, those of the GMD, and various meetings to criticize the rightists' policy mistakes concerning the fundamental issue of the nationalist movement (the most important mistake is avoiding the struggle against imperialism).

At the same time, we should use every means to consolidate the left wing both ideologically and organizationally.

To realize these goals, we should understand the following and use them as guidelines in our work:

1) The GMD, in terms of its social background (class elements) and party history, in reality is incapable of strict centralization or of having a distinct organizational form. Since it is made up of elements from every class, it can never represent equally the interests of each part. Only anti-imperialism and democracy can become the common political program of the majority of the ordinary masses. However, precisely because of this common ground (nationalism and democracy—please see The Party Paper [Dangbao], appendix to no. 2, “The Significance of the Three Principles of the People”), it is impossible to unite its party members to the fullest extent and make them always feel that the party is the protector of their special interests. Although this common ground is not limited to the nature of one class only and can influence the majority of the masses in China, it will not be an easy task to assimilate them into the party organization.

Such is the character of the GMD. Therefore, the CP’s responsibility is to make the GMD unceasingly propagandize the principles of opposing imperialists and warlords and demanding democracy as proclaimed in the “Manifesto” [of January 1924]. We must never merely strive for expansion of the GMD’s numbers, treating it as secondary propaganda against imperialists and warlords. Mechanical organization must not be considered as important as propaganda and agitation. The GMD must be shown that the expansion of a political party is only possible in a regular, continuous, and nationwide process of propagandizing and acting against imperialists and warlords. Moreover, there should be no empty words but practical implementation of reform policies for the peasantry and support for workers’ organizations in areas within GMD jurisdiction. If we carry out our work inside the GMD in the way outlined above, it will also be the best method for securing the GMD’s left wing while reducing and destroying the forces of the right. To achieve this objective, we must, in practice, be able to join the GMD propaganda department. We must never miss a chance for anti-imperialist propaganda and must make the GMD into a party that truly represents the National Congress (the Congress that issued the “Manifesto”). No system of organization, however good, can substitute for this kind of propaganda.

Of course, we should assist the GMD to set up good organizations and admit people whose thinking is close to that of the GMD. However, this should not become our own main task inside the GMD. Our propaganda and organizational work should not have equal importance in the south, where the GMD is in the middle of a civil war, and in the north, where the GMD has gained the sympathy [of the people who] are ready to respond to the south’s liberation. Propaganda is more important than organization.

2) Industrial workers in north and central China, especially railway workers and miners, are to be directed to support the left wing of the GMD. Our policy should be to assimilate them into economic, class-based organizations (labor unions) and guide them to help the GMD oppose imperialism. Such assistance must even extend to strikes staged to help the military efforts of the GMD. At the same time, we should oppose the influence of the thought of the GMD rightists on workers. This is similar to our opposition to the petty bourgeoisie and all the parties that oppose the ideology of the working class. On the other hand, we should demand that the GMD support labor unions in its struggle against the ill treatment of workers by foreign and domestic capitalists.

3) To help the GMD win the people's sympathy in central and north China, we should make the GMD abandon its propaganda policy, the only importance of which is opposition to the government in the north. In reality, the result of this policy is to play into the imperialists' hands, and it further exacerbates the grievances of the south and the regionalism of the north. We should make the GMD's propaganda policy emphasize anti-imperialism and the fact that the Beijing government is the tool of the imperialists.

4) We should make the GMD pay special attention to propaganda inside the military, both among our own and the enemy's troops, with particular attention to the troops of Wu Peifu, Zhang Zuolin, and Feng Yuxiang.

5) To expand the front line of the revolution, we should make the GMD pay attention to the investigation and study of the potential problem presented by the allegation in imperialist newspapers that GMD forces have allied with and propagandized on behalf of bandit groups in north and central China.

6) To deepen the national revolutionary movement and support the Guangdong government, we should mobilize the peasants in the south to join the civil war and demand that the GMD abolish extra taxes and forbid large landlords from over-exploiting poor and tenant peasants. In addition, we should arm the peasants on the front-line, those peasants in direct contact with the northern troops. The first proposal can be implemented, while, effectively, the second method will lead peasants to directly join the liberation movement in the south.

B.2 Circular Number 15 of the CEC (21 July 1924)⁵²

To all comrades in all area and district committees and heads of independent organizations:

Our work inside the GMD is both very important and extremely difficult. Our comrades in all localities should continue unceasingly to pay attention and exert efforts!

Since our party's enlarged executive meeting [May 1924], the majority of GMD members have been attacking us either overtly or covertly, in order to purge our radical members and alleviate the pressures exerted on the GMD by the imperialist powers and the warlords. At present, only a very few GMD leaders, such as Sun Yat-sen and Liao Zhongkai, do not intend to break with us. However, they are not willing to offend the rightists in any way. They are planning to call a CEC plenum [of the GMD] this fall to resolve the issue of their relationship with us.⁵³ For the sake of the unity of the revolutionary forces, we will not permit either divisive words or deeds by our side. Instead, we will do our best to endure and continue to cooperate with them. For the sake of the GMD's revolutionary mission, however, we will not endure silently, or refuse to correct, its nonrevolutionary rightist policies. We should do the following:

1) All groups, organizations, and branches of the GMD under our leadership should express their dissatisfaction with the rightists to the GMD CEC. The rightists' major mistakes are:

- a) unwillingness to oppose the imperialist powers;
- b) opposing the Sino-Soviet Treaty and fundamentally opposing the Soviet Union, which they regard as an enemy of the GMD;
- c) preventing workers in the munitions factory from organizing unions and obstructing boycotts by students at Trinity College;
- d) instigating the chambers of commerce in Jiangmen and Foshan to treat workers and peasants with utmost cruelty;
- e) repulsing communist forces.

2) At GMD branch meetings at various levels, our comrades should raise the issue that leftists and rightists have fundamentally different political viewpoints.

3) From now on our comrades should not introduce into the GMD elements who do not express leftist views.

4) We should try to get, or keep, in our hands the "real power to command the groups of workers, peasants, students, and urban residents" to consolidate our forces within the GMD's left wing, while doing our best to prevent the rightist forces from breaking into these groups.

5) All districts should immediately organize "Citizens' Councils on Foreign Relations." These will construct the nucleus of a united front against imperialism while forming a link with the GMD left wing or with a new GMD. Only individuals on their own should join this kind of organization. On joining they must complete "voluntarily joining" forms. No groups may join. At the moment, there is no need to drastically increase the number of new members. But their quality deserves our attention, with the important criterion being dissatisfaction with the policies of the rightists in the GMD. Such councils are to form independent groups in the social movement. They must never be mixed up with the GMD; nor may they come under the command of the GMD. Only in those places where the GMD cannot operate openly, and thus where its branches have been built entirely by us, can the name of the councils be used openly. However, no elements possessing rightist views are to be allowed to stay in this council.

On receiving this circular, all area and district committees and heads of independent organizations should discuss and implement it in detail in accordance with the local situation, and report the results of discussion and implementation in detail to the Central Bureau. This circular is to be kept a top secret from the outside.

Committee Chairman: T.S. Chen [Chen Duxiu]
Secretary: T.T. Mao [Mao Zedong]

B.3 Resolution on the Question of the Union Movement (May 1924)⁵⁴

1) Even now, the Chinese proletariat accounts for a very small percentage of the Chinese people. However, the speed of industrialization in China during the last twenty years has increased noticeably during the European War [World War I] and the first few years after the war. Thus, in a number of large cities and a few industries, the number of workers has increased. However, because of the vastness of our land and lack of transportation, the workers' strength cannot be concentrated. Numerically, there are at least 600,000 workers in the textile, mining, railway, river, and ocean transportation industries alone. These workers are the foundation of our party. Only through allying with these workers can our party be developed into a political force.

2) The economic and political strength of the proletariat in the manufacturing industries has to increase simultaneously with its organizational strength, so the most important mission of the party is to organize labor unions with careful planning among the industrial workers. Therefore, the main task is to pay special attention to railway workers, miners, and sailors.

a) The strength of foreign capital is greatest in the shipbuilding, railway, river, and ocean transportation industries. Organizing these workers is the most practical and powerful means of opposing the forces of foreign capital and imperialism.

b) In the future struggle against imperialism, the forces of the workers in the railway, river, and ocean transportation and coal industries are sure to have crucial and even decisive significance. Organization of these workers will guarantee future victories.

Apart from these political reasons, the proletariat in the manufacturing industries—concentrated around the modern advanced technologies of mass production and having a common interest and suffering equally from the oppression of big capitalists, especially big foreign capitalists—is the best material for the union movement. We should try to work hard among these workers. This kind of work is our party's cause.

3) Forms of organization

a) If possible, our comrades everywhere should endeavor to organize large labor unions, the basic unit of which is the union's small group [gonghui xiaozu]. Such a small group should be organized according to the internal divisions of every factory (there is no set number of members, and when there are too many to have meetings, each group must be divided into a subgroup of ten, but the subgroup should not be mistaken for the basic unit). The congress of small group representatives [quan-chang ge xiaozu daibiao dahui] (every ten workers elect one representative; each small group with less than ten workers also elects one representative) is a superior institution. All factory committees [chang weiyuanhui] are to be elected by the factory's congress of small group representatives. Each enterprise's supreme institution should be the general committee [zonghui] elected by the representatives' plenary congress [daibiao quanti zhi dahui]. Our party should pay special attention to the subordinate small groups, the character of which is sufficient to determine the fighting strength of the entire union. If possible, wherever workers in an enterprise (workshops or railway factories) have not joined, they should be persuaded to attend the small group meetings. This is the best method of propagandizing the organization of labor unions. Even in places under heavy military and police oppression, workers should be taught to call meetings attended by many people. Even if the meeting only lasts a few minutes, that will suffice. Before the factory owners or the government have discovered [the meeting], or have had time to crack down, such meetings should break up. To call such gatherings, many obvious facts of oppression should be used—such as the beating, unreasonable treatment, and dismissal of a worker. Such treatment would be sufficient reason to call a meeting whether the worker was a union member or not. For these gatherings, the executive committee of the small group [xiaozu de ganshihui] should prepare beforehand resolutions that can be explained in a few minutes. If the resolution can be passed by the gathering, then more extensive propaganda about the labor union and agitation may be undertaken. These union small groups should gradually build their bases, be aware of the masses' psychology, and take no great risks that will throw away the achievements to date. When necessary, concessions must be made. However, all kinds of minor opportunities should be used to make progress. In this way, small groups will gradually grow and be mobilized to fight back for the indignities suffered by every worker in the factory. The influence of the small group must not be limited to the workers in the group, but must be extended throughout the entire factory.

b) Where labor unions cannot be organized, mutual assistance groups, clubs, cooperatives, general education schools, or technical schools should be established first. In these institutions, the union's small groups can be organized only when there is the possibility for success. The first victory of the union's small group in every enterprise (mine, workshop, railway factory, and shipping company) will come when it supports the interest of the workers in that enterprise. This will certainly provide the opportunity to expand the organization and attract the majority of workers to the labor union movement.

4) Workers' economic organizations: the labor union is independent, that is, anyone can become a member of the miners, sailors, or railway workers' union as long as they are a miner, sailor, or railway worker—as long as they work in an industrial company. Questions of party membership, citizenship, and group affiliation should not affect admission into the union or one's position in the union (the party and the union should destroy the concepts of regional and group affiliation among the workers). The union's responsibility is to develop class consciousness among workers, expand their vision, and link the question of daily struggle with the workers' most valued self-interests, such as wages, working-hours (hours per day, days per week and month), rest-time per week, humanitarian treatment, etc. Such daily struggle should and will develop into a general nationalist and class struggle.

5) Like other political parties, the GMD wants to seize political power. It certainly wants to influence the union movement of the railway workers and miners in north and central China. Whether the GMD succeeds in this endeavor depends on our party's actions. We need not help the GMD in all ways possible to infiltrate the industrial proletariat organizationally. On the contrary, this would be a very big mistake. This would not only mix impure seeds in the heart of the advanced proletariat—the industrial proletariat is the basis of our party—but also would cause great difficulties for the proletarian class struggle itself. There are many precedents in other countries. This is not all. In light of China's situation, it would reduce workers' power in the national revolutionary movement.

As far as the union movement is concerned, the best help our party can give the GMD is not to help them organize GMD railway unions and miners' unions, or have all the established labor unions collectively join the GMD. This will only trap the labor unions deep inside the GMD, and they will lose their class character. The best help our party can give to the GMD is, first, to organize labor unions exclusively devoted to class struggle and, when it is useful, to direct these unions to support the national revolutionary movement led by the GMD.

Moreover, the GMD has many proletarians among the workers in the assembly factories, the handicraft workers, and the clerks in business and commerce who can form the basis for extensive activities. At present, our party's capabilities are very limited, and [we] have great difficulty carrying out large-scale work among these types of people. Moreover, most of these people are appropriate targets for GMD propaganda. On the one hand, class struggle is not hampered and, on the other, helping the GMD organize unions of shop assistants and handicraft workers is of great significance for consolidation of the national revolutionary movement.

As for the form of these unions, generally speaking, organizations of handicraft workers should be based on individual professions: shop assistants can be organized by area. If and when necessary, various divisions can be organized under the league of shop clerks' unions (tobacco, apparel, footwear, etc.).

6) Our party should conduct work among the sailors' unions—they are one of the most important sectors of the transportation industry. Through the GMD, we should consolidate the sailors' unions into an organized mass union. At the same time, we should develop our party's small groups [dang de xiaozu] among the sailors. The sailors' unions can become proletarian organizations only when the CP's work has achieved considerable success.

7) Organizing textile workers cannot be postponed again. These are the most numerous among the industrial workers and are particularly concentrated in Shanghai. Our party once attempted but failed to organize textile workers. Certainly, many difficult factors have prevented us from developing labor unions [among them]. The most important is that the majority of them are women. However, in the several textile industry strikes, as a rule, there were intense and concerted actions. It can be seen that the basis for our mission already exists.

8) To carry out the union movement's mission, our party should follow these methods:

a) The workers and peasants' department of the CEC should establish a special committee for the union movement to direct all the activities described above and take responsibility for carefully investigating and summarizing the labor situation in the form of statistics.⁵⁵

b) The workers and peasants' department of every district committee is to establish a special committee to take charge of the union movement and implement orders from the central workers and peasants' department. The district committee member in charge of the union movement should establish regular contacts with the party's small groups in all the unions in that locality, provide them with regular publications and leaflets, and give them direction.

c) Because of the vastness of China and the dispersion of railway workers and miners, special personnel must be dispatched to travel to every railway station and mine to familiarize the central organs with all information and at the same time become leaders of the union movement. The committee members in charge of the labor union movement and the Party Center's emissaries should report the results after every month or each mission to the Party Center. When necessary, the Party Center must bring together national or area committee members in charge of the union movement and the Party Center's traveling leaders to discuss the labor movement, to examine past results, and to plan future working methods.

d) In the papers of the central organs, the union movement should have pride of place.

e) Propaganda departments in all localities should always pay attention to the needs of the local labor movement.

f) Our party should do its best to introduce comrades to work in the GMD workers' department. This will enable us to use the GMD workers' department to influence the development of class struggle and build a unified front line of workers.

B.4 Report of the Shanghai Locality (May 1924)⁵⁶

A) Intraparty Situation

[[Membership: fluctuates because so many are migrant workers; for example, not too long ago there were fifty-six members, now only forty-seven. Recruitment has been extremely slow. Among the present forty-seven members, there are thirteen students, eight workers, three businessmen, and twenty-three teachers, editors, or those in other occupations. Lack of real increase in membership is because (a) we are now paying most attention to work within the GMD; (b) recruitment of members must be handled with utmost caution; and (c) our comrades' propaganda has not been energetic.

Cells [xiaozu]: party members are divided among five cells—sixteen members at Shanghai University; ten in Zhabei; six in Ximen; seven in the French Concession; and five in Hongkou. In the last month, only cell one convened three meetings, cell two and three met once, while cells four and five did not meet at all.

Membership dues: every month the locality should receive 130 yuan. Last month only 30 yuan was collected.]]

B) Nationalist Movement

[[A brief overview is presented of activities in the GMD, groups organized, and events participated in.]]

C) Labor Movement

Shanghai has the largest number of workers in the country; the number of workers laboring at modern machines greatly exceeds that in other places. As a matter of course the labor movement in Shanghai should be very significant. In reality, however, there are many labor unions that exist in name only, with the exception of a few guilds covering several types of handicraft workers. In addition, there may be one or two labor unions, but even they espouse so-called compromise between labor and capital.

Why has such a situation come about? Shanghai's industrial and commercial development owed its success to the intrusion of foreign imperialists. Shanghai has simply become an internationally governed common ground and therefore is subject to the most severe oppression by the imperialists. At the same time, Shanghai has more thugs than anywhere else (the Red and Green Gangs controlled by "old men" alone number over 100,000), and they are in close collusion with the detectives from the police stations set up by imperialists. All this forms the greatest obstacle for the labor movement. In comparison with other places (Guangdong, Hunan, etc.), this means that Shanghai's workers are less organized.

Our party (the secretariat and the two localities) has organized what can be considered several labor movements. However, when all is said and done, this does not amount to much. Also, the labor movements we organized did not penetrate deeply among the workers, and contact remained superficial. Therefore, we failed every time we tried. Until now our results are nil. We have to admit that is a very big failure.

The current situation:

1) Postal workers

Two years ago the postal workers organized a union (not our organization) in their demand for higher pay, but it disappeared soon afterward. Last June and July our comrades reinstituted the labor movement there. After three to four months nearly seventy to eighty people had joined the union. However, as soon as our movement achieved a few results, the post office authorities were alerted and imposed a tight surveillance. At the same time, they investigated our comrades involved in the movement. Under such circumstances the movement had to stop. Until now we have not resumed our activities there. Now we have only five or six SY[L] comrades among the postal workers. They can form the starting point for our future activities.

2) Machinery workers

Once we organized a machinery workers' club through the efforts of the [Chinese Labor] Secretariat. That was two years ago. After more than a year's work, between 400 and 500 workers joined the club. However, the organization was very loose and only a few dozen members attended meetings and paid dues. We realize it is really impossible to properly organize such professional groups with divergent interests. Moreover, all its members were from Guangdong. Although there are quite a few people from Guangdong in various industries, they are a minority among all the workers. Because of the problem of their dialect, it is difficult for people from Guangdong to get close to workers from other places. At the same time, we did not have personnel to train them, with the result that we have recruited only four or five party members. However, even these four or five people have failed to attend meetings or pay dues.

What must be done in the near future:

1) Education

We realize that previous labor movements did not succeed in making the workers [class] conscious and, therefore, their knowledge remained superficial. We are now aware that these movements are in fact useless. However, because of the educational level of the majority of Chinese workers, it is impossible to raise their consciousness. To do so we will naturally have to expend a lot more energy on educational efforts. Now let's first work hard on the workers' evening schools (evening schools for ordinary people) set up by the GMD.

Schools already established are:

a) Yangshupu: sixty to seventy students, to be divided into two classes. More students can be added. This school's students are all new, strong, modern industrial workers.

b) Wusong: forty to fifty students. Most of the students in this school are from the Zhonghua Iron Factory. There are several railway workers, a few sugar factory workers, and miscellaneous laborers.

c) Within the Ximen area in Nanshi District (not set up by the GMD): fifty to sixty students, mostly handicraft workers and a few rickshaw pullers.

d) Shanghai University: about 200 students, 20 percent of them child laborers.

To be implemented:

a) Hongkou: there are many workers from Guangdong living there, mostly working in shipyards, dry docks, and the department of public works. There is a great need for workers' evening schools there.

b) Pudong: there are over 20,000 workers in the Japanese Cotton Mill and the British and American Tobacco Factory. We once organized labor unions in these two factories, but both were destroyed after the failure of the strikes.⁵⁷ In addition, there are many stevedores in Pudong who need evening schools for remedial study.

2) Reform of the Federation of Labor Organizations⁵⁸

Although the Shanghai Federation of Labor Organizations comprises several pro forma unions and has little to do with real workers, it has enormous influence on the propaganda for and organization of workers. Furthermore, because of the importance of Shanghai, this Federation also influences the entire country. So we must do our utmost to reform it. The Shanghai locality has decided to organize or restore about ten unions to join the Federation in order to reform it within the next two or three months.

Shanghai occupies the most important position in the country, with at least 400,000 to 500,000 workers. Of these there are between 200,000 and 300,000 new industrial workers. However, that the workers' movement has not achieved much is one thing of which we Shanghai comrades are most ashamed. At the same time, we want to make it clear that our comrades had very little experience in the labor movement. Under the present circumstances, even if every Shanghai comrade were to work very hard, there would still not be enough personnel to fulfill every task. Shanghai suffers from the greatest imperialist oppression; the numbers of workers are so massive that naturally the work (in the labor movement) here is beyond the capabilities of a few inexperienced comrades. We hope that the Party Center will transfer here several experienced comrades from other places, or give special training to ordinary comrades to work in the Shanghai labor movement. At the same time, those of us in Shanghai must also find some comrades to learn to do such work. This is the urgent request of the Shanghai locality. It is a request that has to be made!

B.5 Resolution on the Report of the CEC (January 1925)⁵⁹

The Fourth Congress completely agrees with the CEC's analysis of China's political situation: We are now in a period of increasingly rapid collapse of the nation's warlord-dominated politics, a period of collapse of the old ruling warlords and the inability of the new ruling warlords to consolidate their power. The latest war has just ended.⁶⁰ Although the warlords of the Zhili clique disintegrated from top to bottom, none of the victorious warlord forces that opposed the Zhili clique was able to replace it and rule China. Moreover, conflicts between them are becoming more dangerous daily! The imminent breakout of a second war is very likely.

The result of the last war brought advantages to the Japanese imperialists in China, while delivering a heavy blow to the British and American imperialist forces in Shanghai.⁶¹ This has intensified the conflicts in the Far East between the Japanese, British, and American imperialists. Recently, Britain, America, and Japan have been increasingly active in preparing for war. This kind of intensification of the conflict between Britain, America, and Japan will induce them to make use of wars among Chinese warlords to expand their own forces in China, thus further aggravating the wars among rival warlords.

Amid the turmoil among the domestic warlord forces and the intense conflicts among the imperialist countries in China, the movement of the oppressed people in China has an even greater opportunity for expansion. The movement for a National Assembly has spread all over the country like a surging wave. The Chinese people have already demonstrated their demand for political power and China's independence. This kind of popular movement will be the beginning of an even greater nationalist movement in the future.

At the present time, during the collapse of warlord-dominated politics in China, how this kind of popular movement can guarantee that warlords will not once again consolidate their power and prolong the process of their collapse, how it can prevent the implementation by the international imperialists of their reactionary policies in China—all this depends entirely on the correct policies of our party that leads the oppressed people, on the correct policies of the leftists in the GMD, and on our efforts to carry out extensive propaganda and organizational work among the people.

We know that the nationalist movement in China has now gained an opportunity for a period of expansion, but there are other important reasons giving rise to this opportunity. Since 1923, the international capitalist class has launched waves of attacks against the international proletariat and, in China, since the "February 7 Incident" [1923], imperialists and their agents, the Chinese warlords and the big capitalist class, have begun to adopt an aggressive policy against the revolutionary forces in China. The Chinese nationalist movement, however, instead of declining under the pressure of these attacks, has been flourishing daily. This gradually rising Chinese nationalist movement will have the opportunity for dramatic expansion when the reactionary restraints imposed since the Beijing coup are relaxed a little.

The labor movement is the foundation of the Chinese nationalist movement. In fact, since the "February 7 Incident," the Chinese labor movement has suffered the heaviest oppression, but it has continued to thrive to become the core of the development of the nationalist movement. The development of the labor movement has a positive relationship to the development of the nationalist movement: class struggle promotes the nationalist movement, while the nationalist movement intensifies class struggle. This can be proved by experiences in Guangdong during the past year. It is also being proved to us now. With the nationalist movement currently flourishing, the struggle between the Chinese bourgeoisie and the Chinese working class is intensifying. Traitorous workers are being discovered everywhere in the labor movement and, moreover, "yellow" labor unions are beginning to emerge. This shows that the Chinese bourgeoisie is using stronger methods against the working class. Therefore, it is dangerous unionism to regard union organization as the sum total of the labor movement while neglecting other routine political activities of the party (in fact these party activities are designed to expand the labor movement and to help the working class attain political consciousness; workers' economic organizations can be expanded). This is not to say, however, that our party emphasizes only political activities but not the labor movement. Rather, this is to say that these two activities should both receive attention and be carried out in tandem, because they influence each other and promote the organization and development of the working class.

The Congress is satisfied with the CEC's leadership in directing our party's activities in the nationalist movement, thus enabling our party to keep in close touch with real political life and, at the same time, pointing the way for the Chinese nationalist movement. Although, during a certain period, the CEC was unable to prevent opportunistic tendencies among our party members who were working inside the GMD, the enlarged executive committee meeting [May 1924] immediately corrected this mistake by our comrades and since then has gradually guided our party's policies toward the nationalist movement and, in particular, the GMD, onto the right track.

The old CEC made some organizational mistakes, such as deficiencies in the technical aspects of organization and the delay in implementing the resolutions of the enlarged executive committee meeting.⁶² Although this was caused partly by practical circumstances, the Congress has to regard it as a shortcoming. Therefore, the Fourth Congress advises the new CEC to pay attention to the organization's guidance. All area and district committees especially should adhere to this.

The Congress hopes that the new CEC will establish a closer relationship with the Comintern to enable the CCP to receive more theoretical and policy guidance from the supreme commander of the world revolution.

B.6 Resolution on the National Revolutionary Movement (January 1925)⁶³

1) The relationship between the national revolution and the world revolution

[[The world revolution comprises a social revolutionary movement by the proletariat in the developed capitalist countries and a multiclass national revolutionary movement in colonial and semicolonial countries.]]

2) The character and goals of the proletariat in the national revolutionary movement—world character and class character

[[The proletariat joins the nationalist movement to overthrow all capitalists in all nations and to overthrow the oppression by capitalist imperialists throughout the whole world. The nationalist movement pursued by the feudal and bourgeois classes is based on the interests of a single nation and a single country; it really represents their own class interests. Thus, the proletariat participates in the national revolution not as a follower of the bourgeoisie but in its independent class position and for its independent goals.]]

3. The tendencies of all Chinese social classes in the nationalist movement—the leading position of the proletariat

[[The invasion of China by the capitalist imperialists has caused a progressive deterioration of Chinese agriculture and the handicraft industry. But the domestic class of big compradores profits from importing manufacturing goods and exporting raw materials for the capitalists. These compradores will collude with capitalist imperialists and represent a greater danger than the current warlords. Experience in Guangdong shows not only that they are tools of the imperialists but also that they have no conflict of interest with the landlord class. The bourgeoisie in the new manufacturing industries needs a nationalist revolution precisely because foreign imperialists obstruct the development of its industries. However, at the present time it is unable to participate in it. Because of its interests, the peasantry is the natural ally of the working class. The higher the class the more prone it is to compromise. The most oppressed and easily mobilized proletariat is the most revolutionary class. Guangdong has become the most important area of action for the proletariat because the struggles between peasants and landlords, workers and the big business and compradore classes, and small merchants and warlords have become very obvious.]]

4) The progress of the CCP's policies for the national revolutionary movement and rightist mistakes

At its Second National Congress (1922), the CCP decided that the Chinese proletariat should participate in the national revolutionary movement and support the Chinese GMD [see Doc. A.11]; it agreed on the slogans “democratic united front” and “overthrow imperialists and warlords.” After the Congress, the Comintern representative [Maring] suggested the following to the CCP: you Chinese comrades should individually join the GMD to further realize the democratic revolutionary united front and speed up the Chinese national revolutionary movement. Although at that time the Party Center respected the Comintern's suggestion, the majority of our comrades only supported the democratic revolutionary united front, but were highly suspicious of joining the GMD's organization. In practice, the Comintern's proposal was not implemented.

At the Third National Congress (1923), it was again decided that it was necessary for our party's comrades to join the GMD [see Doc. A.23]. It was also decided to expand the GMD's organization nationwide and to penetrate the laboring masses. At the time, no one in the party opposed joining the GMD and expanding its organization. However, the majority of the comrades did oppose developing the GMD's organization among the laboring masses and proposed instead that workers should participate in the national revolution under the flag of their own political party. Joining the organization of the bourgeois GMD would inevitably create the danger of confusing the thoughts of the proletariat. After the Third National Congress, because of our comrades' vigorous participation, the GMD convened a reorganization congress and made obvious ideological and organizational progress. After the reorganization congress (January 1924), the majority of our comrades joined the GMD. This gave us many real opportunities to work among peasants and workers and in the military, and we were able to engage openly in the anti-imperialist movement. However, involvement in practical work also exposed our party's naïveté. Most comrades neglected the decisions of the Third National Congress that "we regard the nationalist movement as the focus of our efforts and at the same time develop our party's organization and propagate support for the interests of the laboring class in the process of the nationalist movement" and "prevent the GMD's policy of compromise." There were both leftist and rightist mistakes. The leftist mistakes were to propose continuous propaganda about the proletarian revolutionary movement and the dictatorship of the proletariat, oppose joining the GMD, and even oppose participating in the nationalist revolution, regarding it as a compromise with the bourgeoisie and as changing our party's color to yellow. The rightist mistakes were more dangerous and widespread than the leftist ones: (1) Believing that because we regarded the nationalist movement to be the focus of our efforts, we should expend even more energy on the GMD's work and need not carry out our party's work at the same time. This kind of mistake is committed mostly by capable comrades engaged in practical work. (2) Believing that because we were joining the multiclass GMD to implement the nationalist movement we would have to adopt a policy of compromise between labor and capital and give up instigating class struggle. Only a few GMD comrades who joined our party espouse this kind of mistaken view. (3) Believing that we should help the entire GMD and need not encourage the division between the left and the right. Our party's enlarged executive committee meeting (May 1924) pointed out these mistakes and warned of the danger that "we are helping the GMD to infiltrate organizationally the industrial proletariat." Not only might these mistakes and dangers exist at present but also they can occur in the future even if they do not exist now. Therefore, pointing out our erroneous tendencies in the nationalist movement and determining the position and goals of the proletariat in the nationalist movement are the important tasks of this national congress.

Participation in the nationalist movement is for the liberation of the entire nation, as well as for the self-interest of the proletariat, but never for the bourgeoisie's interests. If we forget the proletariat's economic organization and the party's tasks, if we forget the proletariat's economic struggle during the nationalist movement, if we forget the proletariat's preparation for its own class revolution in the nationalist revolution, if we are naively involved in the bourgeois national democratic movement, we will do irreparable harm to the proletariat and reduce the revolutionary character of the nationalist movement. Our comrades should be constantly vigilant about the dangers of such rightist tendencies.

On the other hand, we should also beware of leftist mistakes, such as opposing the proletariat's participation in the nationalist movement. This mistake is obvious. Another mistake is to decide that only the proletariat can carry out the Chinese nationalist revolution and that there is no possibility for participation by other classes; the success of the nationalist revolution is then the proletarian revolution or it is to be followed by the proletarian revolution. First, the Chinese nationalist revolution has two characteristics. It is the continuation or fulfillment of the "Xinhai [1911] Revolution." The substance of the nationalist revolution is opposition to feudal economic relations and feudal warlords' politics (such as the institutions of military governorship in provinces, hiring of troops, division of political power, peasants' submission to bureaucrats and the gentry, and no legal protection for the people). At the same time, the Chinese nationalist movement is also directed against international imperialism because the latter is the principal cause that prevents the Chinese revolution from succeeding. It continues to enslave China politically and economically (by forcing the implementation of unequal treaties, controlling China's foreign trade, effectively administering China's transportation, exploiting Chinese labor, granting special rights to foreigners, stationing troops and warships in China to support its diplomacy, establishing educational and religious institutions, and deceiving the Chinese people via the media). The character of the Chinese nationalist revolution is thus determined by the above two features. Historically speaking, this is a bourgeois democratic revolution and, in political terms, contains the seeds of social revolution. Since one of the characteristics of the Chinese nationalist revolution is anti-world imperialism, its revolutionary movement is connected with the proletarian revolutionary movement of the world—the movement to overthrow world capitalism and build communism. From this point of view, the Chinese national revolutionary movement is part of a great world revolution that has followed the "October [Bolshevik] Revolution." Second, whether the victory of the nationalist revolution is to be followed by the proletarian revolution, or whether one has to go through the bourgeois democratic system must be decided by the proletariat's level of preparedness for its own class revolution during the nationalist revolution, as well as the practical social circumstances. At that time, the world political situation will also have a great influence. Third, if the national revolutionary movement is to achieve a relatively thorough victory, the most revolutionary proletariat must occupy the leading position. This leading class should also be able to seize the forces of all the oppressed social classes and fight the common enemy—the imperialists and their tools (domestic warlords, landlords, and the compradore class)—to avoid being isolated. This is an important question.

5) Our relations with the GMD and other parties and groups

Since the GMD's reorganization congress [January 1924], the split between the left and the right has become a fact. On the issues of the strike in Shamian,⁶⁴ the Chamber of Commerce incident,⁶⁵ and the wars in Jiangsu and Zhejiang, the two factions have had intense conflicts. The left is composed of workers, peasants, and radical elements in the intellectual class; the right is composed of the military, bureaucrats, politicians, and capitalists. In Guangdong they have already cooperated with big businessmen, the compradore class, and the landlord class in oppressing peasants and workers. Not only are they against us and the GMD-left, but they also oppose the center that stands between us and them. They openly charge that the anti-imperialist policies of ours, of the left, and of the center of the GMD are ill-conceived, and they spread rumors about communism to pressure the left and the center. The center in the GMD comprises those revolutionary elements among the petty bourgeois intellectual class. Though unimportant numerically, they occupy leading positions in the GMD. They are always between us and the right and manipulate and profit [from our conflicts]. After our party's enlarged meeting [May 1924], we began to expose the mistakes of the right and defend against their attacks, while simultaneously accusing the center of oscillating. Since then, not only have the rightists maligned us but they have even used the imperialists to harm us and have connived with all our social enemies to oppose us. They admit that the imperialists and warlords are not yet their enemies; only the CCP is their enemy. Because of our criticisms, the leaders of the center very much want to use the right to purge us, but they know themselves that their strength is inferior to that of the rightists. Thus, self-interest causes them to maintain unity with us in order to expand the strength of their own faction. Our experience of recent cooperation with the GMD and our positions and goals as decided by this resolution show that work in the GMD has entered a new era. Thus, the following decisions have been made concerning our working methods:

- 1) The GMD elements include the bourgeoisie, intellectuals, workers, and peasants. This has created the danger that they foster an image of class reconciliation among the masses. Therefore, our work inside the GMD should try to retain the element of class struggle in all movements.

- 2) Of course we recognize that the GMD is an important weapon in the Chinese nationalist movement; but it is only an important weapon and does not represent the entirety of the Chinese nationalist movement. Therefore, in GMD branches at all levels and in all the social groups outside of the GMD, we must propagandize anti-imperialism, opposition to warlord politics, opposition to the tool of the imperialists—the compradore class—and support for the interests of workers, peasants, and all laboring people. We should criticize the rightists in the GMD and the nationalist movement who want to compromise with imperialists, reactionary warlords, the compradore class, and the landlord class, as well as expose every counter-revolutionary act of [the rightists] oppressing peasants, workers, and all laboring people. We should also unmask the vacillating attitude of the GMD-center.

- 3) We should expand the GMD-left ideologically, organizationally, and especially in terms of popular propaganda. As for the leaders of the GMD-center and all the oscillating elements on the left or in the center, we should correct the mistakes of their rightist policies and make them understand that this rightist behavior violates the essence of the revolution. We should also make them break away from the rightists and engage in uncompromising struggle. When the center allies itself with the left in an uncompromising revolution, we should support them, together with peasants. However, at the same time, we should explain to peasants and workers the difference between nationalist struggle and class struggle.

4) Of course we will help the GMD develop its organization in the course of the actual movement; but at the same time we should not forget the conflicts within the GMD: political conflicts about anti-imperialism, and economic conflicts about the peasant and worker classes. It is wrong to obstruct its development and avoid conflicts. We should actively help it to develop and intensify our struggle in this process of development and make the GMD march toward the revolution. Our party should engage in open activities in every place that is under the influence of the GMD regime. Whenever a political issue arises, we must first disseminate our party's proposals among the people. We must expose the GMD's mistake with its policy of political compromise that is especially disadvantageous to the actions of workers and peasants. We should call on workers and peasants to rise up and resist [these mistakes].

5) Of course we should ask the GMD to support the organizations of workers and peasants, as well as their interests. At the same time, however, we should make the GMD understand that the professional organizations of workers and peasants themselves should be independent and not be mixed up with the organizations of political parties. We should make the GMD realize that workers and peasants can more vigorously help the GMD's revolutionary movement when they have strong organizations. Participation in the revolutionary movement by the entire force of workers and peasants is much more important than the individual workers and peasants joining the GMD organization. From now on our party members and the nonpartisan industrial workers under our direction should join the GMD only when work necessitates it.

6) GMD branches at various levels that are completely under our comrades' control should work hard to propagandize among the party members and masses to make sure that they all will have leftist views—this represents a real unification of all leftists. It is not sufficient to rely only on emotional ties or branch leaders who are leftists.

In every practical campaign, as long as they have a political program for activities in the nationalist movement, we should give considerable cooperation to other political parties of the petty bourgeoisie. At the same time, however, we must expose their reactionary or reformist behavior and recruit the radical elements among them.

B.7 Resolution on the Labor Movement (January 1925)⁶⁶

1) The history of the Chinese labor movement and its current tendencies

[[In semicolonial China, the working class not only fights for its own class interest but also participates in the national revolutionary movement. It must gain the leading position in the movement but never forget its own independent tasks in the labor movement. From its very beginning, the Chinese labor movement has been under the CCP's direction. The movement is in its third stage since the 7 February 1923 strike. Stage one: 7 February 1923 to February 1924, the first railway workers' congress. Oppression of the labor movement in the north and reliance on the nationalist movement in the south. Stage two: February 1924 until the October 1924 Beijing coup. The movement in the north still suffered from oppression, but in the south there was considerable progress. In this period the labor movement truly shifted from the defensive to the offensive. Stage three: since October 1924. It is now becoming increasingly possible to organize labor unions openly even in places beyond the control of the GMD. However, this will alert the imperialists and they will step up their attempts to destroy the unions.]]

2) The relationship between the labor movement and the nationalist movement

In line with the history and recent trends in the labor movement outlined above, the most important mission of the Chinese working class at present is not only to emphasize, theoretically, its own independent labor movement but also to participate in the nationalist revolution in order to gain the leading position. In practice, moreover, this is to adapt to the fact that it is easier to develop the labor movement as the nationalist movement unfolds. At the same time, however, because the labor movement tends to be used by the nationalists, we should fight for the independence and progress of the labor movement and fully revolutionize the nationalist movement.

The labor movement carried out during the national revolutionary movement often tends to confuse ideas about classes and cause all kinds of defects. Before the CP's enlarged CEC meeting last May, the labor movement was almost submerged into the nationalist movement. In some places, for example in Guangdong, leadership of the labor movement had been given over entirely to the GMD, and it lost its independence. The results were that the independent work of our own party was damaged, and it was discovered that a small number of workers (those who joined the GMD) had thus become bureaucratized. At the same time, during the early period of the labor movement, the CP originally organized labor unions using just a few special workers. When contacts with the GMD began, based on discussions with a few special workers, we simply allowed the labor movement to follow the GMD's policies, while the masses of real workers could not help but be suspicious of CP members. Therefore, during the national revolutionary period, and especially during the period of cooperation with the GMD, the CP should pay special attention to the following points in handling the labor movement.

A) The CCP is the only leader of the Chinese working class. To enable the working class to gain the leading position in the nationalist revolution, special attention must be paid to the labor movement. The working class must have strong independent organizations based on class and composed of the masses. Then, it will become an independent political force in the nationalist movement. Then, its leading position in the nationalist movement can be secure. Efforts must be made to ensure that all industrial workers are organized, under the leadership of the Communist Party, in independent organizations of a pure class character. We should also do our best to develop our party's organization and penetrate the masses.

B) In order to develop the leftist forces of the laboring masses in the GMD, in certain areas and as necessary, we should lead the laboring masses in major industries to join the GMD to revolutionize it further. However, in areas where the GMD has not reached the workers or when it is not necessary, there is no need to hurry to organize party branches for the GMD. The danger for the working class in the nationalist movement does not lie in workers' joining the GMD but in the absence of the CP's forces inside the masses of real workers and the absence of an independent labor movement. Therefore, the first priority should be to organize solid labor unions and class propaganda in these areas. However, when we encounter the GMD's efforts to organize [unions], on the one hand, we should intensify our work among the laboring masses to establish our strength and, on the other hand, send grass-roots workers to join GMD branches in case the GMD links up with a small number of the upper strata of workers and deceives the mass of workers.

C) As for workers' organizations already established in the GMD's name, we should also do our best to work from the inside to gain leadership power, recruit class-conscious elements, and organize our party's branches. We must also organize small groups (or union small groups) in factories to win the masses' trust and prepare to reorganize thoroughly such [GMD] unions. Especially when economic conflicts between workers and factory owners arise, we should use such conflicts to raise the workers' class consciousness, show the true character of the GMD, and change the GMD into a party inclined toward the political party of our own class—the CP.

D) With respect to the labor movement during the period of the national revolutionary movement, especially as there is now the possibility for unions to operate openly, we should watch carefully our relations with the GMD, as it is easy to find all kinds of reactionaries even in very ordinary labor unions: spies for warlords and bureaucrats, foremen, and others—the GMD-right is now plotting to recruit these anticommunist elements. In places controlled by the GMD regime, reactionaries are often used by the warlords and bureaucrats in the GMD to implement policies to deceive the masses and control the unions. Frantically, they purge the communist elements and thus tend to split the unions (they use ideas or organizations based on regionalism or societies). Our tactics should be: (i) Actively to seek union legalization, especially to encourage the masses to fight for it spontaneously. We should not make the masses feel that the restoration of unions is merely a favor granted by the GMD or the “progressive” warlords. In those places under reactionary rule, propaganda for legal unions should be pursued with equal vigor. In general, the initial political rights of the working class—demands for the right to mass gatherings, association, and freedom of speech—are the slogans that we think should be raised urgently. (ii) To propose the unification of labor unions—we will never establish communist labor unions where there are already unions established by the masses of other groups. Instead, we should join and work inside these unions to fight for all kinds of practical interests of the masses so that we may win the trust of the masses while exposing the true nature of the reactionaries. (iii) In the course of the labor movement, when we give direction to the actions of the masses, we should pay attention to raising slogans [demands] that are appropriate to the organizational strength, needs, and emotions of the masses in those places, so as to induce the masses to engage in practical and deeper struggles. Overambitious slogans not only fail to arouse proper spontaneous struggle by the masses but also tend to be attacked by the reactionaries. The subsequent defeat will be blamed on us. (iv) Naturally, the working class may support the bourgeois national revolutionary movement. However, it does not matter whether the capitalist is a foreigner or a Chinese, a private individual or the state, a progressive or a reactionary; the relationship between them and workers is the same as far as economic struggle is concerned—the confrontation between labor and capital. Therefore, when the labor movement encounters such nationalist officials, warlords, and capitalists, we should direct workers to struggle against them without yielding any concessions. They can only make concessions to gain the workers' support. Workers should never be influenced by them into destroying their own offensive in the class struggle. Moreover, we should use the nationalists' connections with workers to attack the capitalists step by step. Implementation of this kind of class struggle is sure to bring down all kinds of reactionaries who are against the labor unions, especially the forces of the GMD-right because, in these circumstances, they will surely expose their true nature, a nature that is incapable of representing the interests of the masses of workers. . . .

4) The CP's political education and organization in the labor movement

The CCP should take the leading position in the labor movement but, as a rule, our work tends to concern purely technical aspects such as the solely administrative work of the union secretary. Now we should begin immediately the party's practical work: political education and the party's organization among the mass of workers. Political education through propaganda has now become very important. We must explain the Chinese political situation and the significance of changes in the current situation to workers (along the lines of political newspapers run by our party's agencies and the resolutions by party branches in all areas). We should explain in detail what the GMD and the nationalist revolution mean, the character of the right, center, and left of the GMD, and their relationship to the working class. We should highlight the mutual relations between class struggle and nationalist struggle, as well as the class nature of the labor movement. In every economic struggle we should point out its relationship to political struggle; we should explain that the working class must have its own class political party—the CP. We should propagandize the CCP Constitution and its strategies and use concrete facts to demonstrate that only the CP supports the interests of the working class. We should explain, in simple terms, the international character of the working-class and labor movement, as well as the relationship between the Chinese working class and the world social revolution. A regular agency and plans must be devised for this kind of propaganda. As for the party's organization, it has become an extremely urgent task to recruit party members from among the workers because we can never unite with the masses if we do not have organization among the mass of workers as our backbone. Therefore, we should organize immediately CP branches in factories and on the railways and so on. These branches are to be responsible for the guidance of work in labor unions or for organizing small groups in factories, for political education among ordinary people, and for the training of party members who are workers. There should be both sufficient propaganda for the tasks outlined above in the labor movement, and then it will truly be the CP's labor movement. The danger of unions thus losing control of the labor movement can be averted.

5) The organizational question in the labor movement

Since the February 7 Incident the labor movement has shown signs of revival. Although our party's enlarged CEC meeting last May pointed out imperfections in previous methods of organizing labor unions and decided to work through factory small groups [Doc. B.3], the results have been meager. The situation now offers a greater chance for the labor movement to operate legally; we should increase our efforts with the factory small groups. This will enable us to really penetrate the masses and guarantee us our triumph over the reactionaries who oppose labor unions, thus laying the foundation of our labor movement.

In reactionary circumstances mutual-aid groups, clubs, and other gray organizations may, of course, be formed among workers to carry out the labor movement. However, whenever possible, every area should try to organize unions using the form of factory small groups. Although now there is the possibility for labor unions to become legal, all unions must still be organized on the basis of factory small groups. Only this kind of union will be able to establish deep relations and secure foundations among the masses. They would differ from the previous ones that completely disintegrated as soon as they encountered reactionary waves.

The small group may be organized in a factory or workshop as long as there are more than three persons. Once it expands, several small groups may be organized along the lines of the working divisions within the factory. There is no set limit on the number of small group members (the only limit is that they must come from the same place of work). If the number of people [in the group] is too large to have meetings, they can be grouped in tens. Each small group has a secretariat of three people elected by the representatives from the ten-person subgroups [shirentuan] (where there are fewer members, one group leader is sufficient). The congress of small-group representatives is the supreme institution in each factory and elects several people (the exact number is to be determined by circumstances) to form the factory committee. Then representatives from each factory elect several people to form the general union in a company or an area. Where they are not allowed to operate legally, however, small groups are to operate in absolute secrecy. Moreover, this type of organization is most suitable for operation inside the labor unions controlled by reactionaries.

The small group is the basic unit because workers in the same factory workshop tend to share the same interests. The ten-person subgroup can never replace the small group, nor is it the basic unit of organization, because the basic unit of a factory is the workshop (for example, the spun yarn, fluffer, packing, and weighing workshops in a textile factory; the lathe, grinding, casting, furnace, and forging workshops in an iron mill, etc.—all of them are the basic units in factories). If we overlook their significance, we will tend to treat the ten-person subgroup as the basic organization or the small group as the ten-person subgroup.

As a secret organization amid severe oppression, the small group is the original force driving the development of our labor movement. Its functions are as follows: (i) The small group is an organization hidden in a workshop not only to escape repression by the factory owner but also one that the owner will not be able to eliminate even if he discovers it; only by firing every worker in the factory can he eradicate the organization completely. (ii) Prior to the organization of the factory committee, the small group is the nucleus in a workshop and the nucleus of the factory. It is in charge of organizing the factory committee and extensively propagandizing and agitating for union organization. It should use facts about the factory's oppression of workers to arouse them throughout the factory to rebellion and thus unite the masses and expand the organization. (iii) In the case of unexpected conflicts in the factory or other incidents, when there is no factory committee, the small group should actively involve itself in them and lead the entire factory's workers to fight. Where a small group comes under the jurisdiction of a factory committee, however, it must obey its orders. (iv) In the factory, the small group can win victory and develop organizationally only by guiding some or all workers to fight. This can also bring most of the workers into the union movement. (v) When there are two or more small groups in a factory, they must proceed to organize the factory committee.

The small group is not only a unit that trains workers but also a place to nurture the fighting strength of the working class. Its training methods are: (i) Call a meeting once a week or every other week. (ii) Announce the form of the meeting and the means of convening the meeting so that every small group member can attend the meeting in the factory. It can also call on other workers to attend the meeting or an improvised meeting during a conflict. (iii) Use incidents in its own factory as materials for discussion, and teach workers methods of operation and resistance. (iv) During meetings, each member of the small group should make a report, which is to be criticized or discussed as a means of training group members to become perfect members. (v) Teach basic knowledge about labor (pay attention to the meaning of class and methods of class struggle; ideally, use immediate events as examples and avoid abstract theories). (vi) A critical report on current affairs is to be made at each group meeting in order to indoctrinate political knowledge and arouse the interest of the workers in current politics.

6) Concrete plans for the labor movement

After the Fourth Congress, our party's important work inside the labor movement is as follows:

i) The labor movement of industrial workers

In economically backward China, the largest industries, apart from the railways, mines, ocean transportation, and textiles, are in their infancy. These industrial workers are the foundation of our party and must receive our special attention.

The union movement on the railways has been in a state of depression since the defeat of "February 7." Under these circumstances, only a general railway union was established but, in practice, it has no real mass basis. The responsibilities of the general railway union in the future are: (a) to dispatch personnel to all lines to organize the lower levels; (b) to use all opportunities to revive the original unions on all lines that have been closed down; (c) to immediately organize unions on the Shanghai-Hangzhou, Shanghai-Nanjing, East China, and South Manchuria lines where unions were never organized before; (d) to work hard to develop our party's organization on all railway lines to become the center of the unions on all lines; (v) to regularly send personnel to travel to and inspect all lines, as well as to direct work there, in order to establish closer relations between the general union and all lines.

The miners' movement was developed in Shandong after the enlarged meeting, but because of the wrong working methods used by the comrades there, there was not much progress; for example, the movement was not launched in several major mining areas such as Tangshan, Hubei, Fengtian, Shanxi, and Hunan. Of course, there were limitations imposed by finances and personnel, but our party should not abandon at will several hundreds of thousands of industrial workers. This work should be implemented after the Fourth Congress.

The sailors' movement has not penetrated deep into the masses of sailors, although we can say that a beginning has been made in Hong Kong and Shanghai. Our previous policy of relying entirely on the GMD to consolidate the sailors' union has not been successful. Now we should become involved directly. Our methods of action are: (a) to set up our party's organization inside the sailors' union in order to reform the union from above; (b) to establish labor small groups and our party's organization in aid associations, dormitories, and clubs under the sailors' union; (c) to ally with groups like the sailors' clubs that have not joined the sailors' union and its aid associations; (d) to send personnel to work on oceangoing ships. When the above tasks are implemented to a certain degree, an alliance must be formed to reorganize the sailors' union now and turn it into a fighting union in industry.

Textile workers also occupy an important position in industry. They cannot be neglected for the sake of numbers alone. Recently our party has gradually emphasized the organization of these workers and begun work in all areas. When the organizational efforts have reached a certain point, an alliance must be formed to organize a national union for industry.

ii) Our work in all industrial areas

Shanghai, Hankou, and Tianjin are the areas where new industries are most developed. If we are able to organize and bring the workers in these areas completely under our command, our party's base in the labor movement will be more secure. In future, special attention must be paid to the labor movement in these areas. Next, we should also take note of Qingdao, Wuxi, Nantong, and Dalian.

iii) Labor movement of handicraft workers in major cities

In industrially backward China, handicraft workers comprise the majority of the nation's workers. Especially the handicraft workers in major cities are closely linked to the labor movement. Therefore, in the future, we should devote considerable resources to organizing and propagandizing among the handicraft workers in big cities.

iv) Female labor and young workers

Although China lags behind in new industries, the tendency toward the increasing employment of women among workers here is almost identical with the situation in Europe. However, Chinese women are still trapped inside a religious and traditional society; there are really great obstacles to the development of the [women's] labor movement. We have to cooperate with the women's department to solve these difficulties.

Young workers also occupy an important position in the labor movement and, moreover, are the bravest and most revolutionary. In the previous labor movement in China, young workers occupied almost all the central positions. In the future, we should not only pay special attention to young workers but help the [S]YL to carry out the labor movement for young workers within the labor movement under the command of our party.

v) Cooperatives

The cooperative (producer, consumer, and financial) is the most important task in the labor movement. It is a means of uniting workers around economic interests and guiding them in carrying out economic struggles. Our comrades should expend more effort to launch this movement in every major industrial area and region where there are handicraft workers. The work of our cooperatives is based on the view of class struggle and should avoid contamination from the reformist views of the petty bourgeoisie. This deserves our attention.

In order to implement the above tasks in the labor movement, our party should use the following methods:

1) A labor movement committee should be established within the central workers' and peasants' department to direct the above movements and be responsible for investigating the labor situation and making summaries.⁶⁷

2) All the workers and peasants' departments in the localities should set up a labor movement committee to take charge of the movement and to carry out orders from the central workers and peasants' department. The district committee member in charge of the labor movement should establish regular communication with CP branches in all the unions of that district, not only regularly giving them published materials and leaflets to guide them, but also taking part in meetings of the branches or small groups and carrying out practical training.

3) China's territory is vast. To know the real situation throughout the whole country, the Party Center will dispatch special traveling inspectors at any time to direct the labor movement. The local workers and peasants' departments must report each month's or mission's results to the Party Center. When necessary, the Party Center should convene national or local meetings, attended by labor movement committee members from various levels, to discuss the movement, examine past results, and plan the methods for future implementation.

4) The labor movement is to occupy the primary position in the papers of the Party Center's organs.

5) The central workers and peasants' department and local workers and peasants' departments should edit all kinds of pamphlets that are easily understandable.

6) All local propaganda departments should pay attention to the needs of the local labor movement.

7) We should try hard to go and work inside the GMD's labor department so that a unified labor movement may be built by changing the GMD's labor unions into unions for class struggle.

B.8 Resolution on the Peasant Movement (January 1925)⁶⁸

1) The peasant question occupies an important place in the world revolution led by the proletariat, and especially in the national revolutionary movement in the East. One of Lenin's great successes was that he found an ally for the proletariat in the peasantry. This is the crucial difference between Leninists and all the opportunistic Mensheviks because the latter neglect the "slumbering" peasants, whom they consider incapable of becoming a crucial element in the revolution.

In economically backward China, although the basis of the rural economy collapsed after a long period of foreign aggression by international (capitalist) imperialists, the peasant class is still an important element in Chinese society and accounts for 80 percent of the country's population. Therefore, the peasant question is particularly important in China, and especially in a China in the era of nationalist revolution. If the CCP and the working class want to lead the Chinese revolution to success, they will have to do their best to systematically inspire and organize peasants everywhere to become involved in economic and political struggles. Without these efforts, we cannot hope that the Chinese revolution will succeed or take the leading position in the nationalist movement.

2) Since international (capitalist) imperialists use force to make China import and consume foreign manufactured goods, the rate of bankruptcy and unemployment for the peasantry has increased drastically. The Boxer Movement of 1900 that shook the country was the first, large-scale resistance by the peasantry against international (capitalist) imperialism. After the Xinhai [1911] Revolution, the warlords' civil wars, supported by foreign imperialists, never stopped. The despotic tax collection and plundering by corrupt bureaucrats and perverse officials, together with the exploitation by landlords and the evil gentry, have made the peasants' life even harder. As [peasant] unemployment has become more widespread, banditry has emerged evcrywhere. Banditry is a peasant resistance movement in disguise. Thus, the Chinese peasants have long been driven to the road of rebellion by (capitalist) imperialism, warlord politics, heavy rents, unjust taxes, high interest rates, etc. It is the responsibility of the CCP to guide the peasants' latent natural rebellion toward spontaneously organized economic and political struggles.

3) At present, the propaganda that peasants should organize themselves should aim to solve practical problems. The following decisions on the peasant question were adopted at the last enlarged meeting:⁶⁹

Our party's propaganda among the peasantry should focus attention on the issue of the local governments' levying of land taxes. We must demand that the tax level be determined and authorized by a meeting of rural residents (meeting of peasants). At the same time, early collection of money and grain⁷⁰ must be opposed. Extortionate demands and all other illegitimate collections must be rejected.

Similarly, we should instigate the majority of peasants who are small property owners to resist local tyrants and the evil gentry . . . most of these are surviving bureaucrats of the previous Qing dynasty and are the real power in the villages. To solve all the local economic administrative problems, we should propagandize among the peasants the suggestion for the election of an agency that represents the peasantry (village self-governing council).

Among tenant peasants and peasants who till their own land as well as lease others' land, we should call for resistance to unjust taxes. On the issues of tenant peasants and opposition to the evil gentry, proposals may be raised to form tenant peasant associations and farmhand associations.

The organization of village militias (this should be changed to peasant self-defense corps) should be propagandized among peasants and tenant peasants so as to arm peasants against the scourge of banditry.

Within GMD territories, in addition to the above propaganda work, we should also ask the government to conduct irrigation work and establish a credit bank for peasants—to eliminate the hardship imposed by high interest rates.

Of course, the above methods are extremely appropriate for the future, but consideration must be given to each method with respect to time and place. For example, when it is possible to organize tenant peasants, semi-self-tilling peasants, and farmhands together to oppose big landlords, we should use the means of a joint organization of peasant associations. In each war between the warlords, we should use the pains peasants suffer from the armed conflicts to implement the above propaganda and organizational tasks. In addition, in places where there are Catholic and other Christian forces, we should especially instigate peasants to oppose the Church's seizure of land and estates and the Church's collusion with local hoodlums in ill-treating honest peasants. This slogan should be treated as the fuse to light anti-imperialism among peasants.

4) In the past year, peasants have been inducted into the national liberation movement in the GMD territories in the south. This is the result of the GMD's policies. Because of objective conditions, from now on it will become increasingly possible to lead peasants in struggles against warlords and landlords not only in the south, but also in the north. We have been working with the GMD since its reorganization, and now we should take responsibility for the GMD's peasant policies. We should oppose the wrong policies of the GMD leaders in the south:

a) They only want to use peasants while, in practice, they do not protect peasants' economic and political interests. They want peasants to back the GMD. This policy will never receive support from the peasants.

b) The GMD wants to win the peasants' support in the areas of their military operations. They organize peasant associations and ask peasants to make sacrifices for the national liberation movement. However, they do not put pressure on big landlords to make concessions to the peasants; nor do they protect peasants' political rights. Even when soldiers and local despots mistreat peasants and endanger peasants' lives, the GMD leaders are incapable of helping them. For example, peasant associations have often been destroyed and repressed by the landlord class in collusion with the right, warlords, and bureaucrats. In the recent election for the mayor of Canton, over 200,000 suburban peasants, who pay for the cost of the city's administration, were excluded from voting.

Yet in the past year, the peasants in Guangdong have gradually gained class consciousness and organized themselves to fight back against landlords and the evil gentry. The peasant association movement has become a new force in political life under the GMD government in Guangdong. However, the GMD does not know how to use this new force to take part in the nationalist revolution, so it often allows peasant associations to be destroyed by the bureaucrats of the right, warlords, and landlords. The experiences of the past year also help us discover our own mistakes: (i) In terms of propaganda, sometimes we let peasants rely too much on the forces in the GMD government, with the result that the peasants do not believe that they have their own force or understand that the peasant association is the organization of their own class. Thus, peasants lose their faith in us when they are beyond the protection of the political forces. (ii) Sometimes our slogans for the peasantry are too ambitious and extensive; or the slogans are raised before the opportunity to exploit them has arrived. Instead this disease of naïveté causes the reactionary forces to unite to attack us. This makes us less able to support such struggles. (iii) On occasion, we place complete responsibility for conducting the peasants' economic struggles on the shoulders of a few of our comrades who are in charge of peasant associations. This puts the peasant masses in the position of a "third person" and renders the peasant association as a skeleton that is not based on the strength of the masses.

5) Of course, in the name of the GMD, we can use the organization of the peasant association to unite peasants. At the same time, however, we should try to use each opportunity of concrete struggle to resist repression by the GMD-right and warlords in accordance with the GMD's political programs that support the interests of workers and peasants. We should make peasants realize that the GMD and its political forces can be used to protect peasant interests. But real protection can be gained only when peasants unite and ally with urban workers. Thus, the worker and peasant forces can influence the GMD—making it march forward under their influence. Peasants will gain genuine liberation only after the overthrow of the oppression and restraints imposed by imperialists and warlords, the success of the revolution of the proletariat with the precondition of socialism. Therefore, we should remain outside the GMD and, at the same time, independently carry out our party's open propaganda and the work of our party's branches. Our branches in peasant associations everywhere will be the center for this kind of work. Moreover, in all areas, special emissaries for the peasant movement are to be placed under the command of our party's district committees. In the peasants' struggle against the right, bureaucrats, warlords, and landlords, our party's district committees should engage in appropriate propaganda or make announcements to let peasants know that our party is the party that really fights for their interests.

In the peasant movement we should pay constant attention to raising the peasants' class consciousness. When peasants have doubts about the GMD, we should explain to them the relations among the factions within the GMD and use real examples to show them what rightists, centrists, and leftists are. We should also explain to them the nature of the CP, its constitution and strategy. This kind of propaganda is particularly necessary after the alliance between the big landlords and the defeated reactionary compradore class in Guangdong has started to stir up anticommunist agitation in the countryside.

6) In addition, we should pay more attention to the following: (a) The slogans to be raised must meet the practical demands of the peasants in that area and at that time; before action is taken, there should be sufficient propaganda and preparation; meetings of peasant associations should not rashly decide to launch a rent-reduction campaign. (b) In the peasants' political struggles, we should ally middle, tenant, and poor peasants and farmhands to oppose big landlords (in our experiences with the peasant movement in Guangdong, because of inappropriate tactics, we often force middle peasants to take the side of big landlords). In particular, we should protect the special interests of the poor peasants and farmhands in this kind of alliance. (c) We should make specific propaganda for the abolition of unjust taxes and levies, and raise the slogan of increasing the income tax of the wealthy, because this slogan has great effect. First, it can win over the sympathy and support of small landowners; second, it will isolate and deliver a blow against big wealthy landlords; third, it will make the GMD's policies shift to the left; fourth, if the GMD government fails to satisfy this demand of the peasants, they will be given a deeper understanding of the GMD. (d) We should encourage peasants to ask the GMD government to distribute the government-owned land to poor peasants. In addition, peasant associations should do more in the public interest, first to increase their stature and second to prevent local hoodlums and evil gentry from collecting levies in the name of public-interest enterprises. [The peasant associations] should also raise the cultural level of villages (but at the beginning of the movement they should beware of overstepping too much the boundaries imposed by religious and feudal psychology in the countryside), establish evening schools and reading classes, give lectures, perform new plays, put up wall posters, etc. Material help should be sought from the GMD to do these things.

7) During the continuous wars among the warlords of the past several years, the landlord class has established its own civil defense corps and village militia of armed peasants. Such organizations in Guangdong nowadays have become armed reactionary forces used by the landlord class to oppress peasants. From now on, we should use the levies collected from peasants to oppose the landlords' efforts to establish civil defense corps and call for a civil defense corps founded by peasants themselves. In addition, we should propagandize and expand the organization of the peasant self-defense corps and persuade those peasants who have joined the civil defense corps and the village militia to break away from local tyrants and landlords and enlist instead in the peasant self-defense corps. This type of peasant self-defense corps should be under our command.

The relationship between the bandits and peasants is an important issue. Based on the situation in Guangdong we are making the following instructions: (a) Establish appropriate connections with those bandits who help peasants resist oppression. (b) Use the slogan of opposing landlord oppression to deal with those bandits who are used by landlords to oppress peasants. However, we should not single them out for attack and thus cause mutual slaughter and hatred between peasants and unemployed peasants (bandits), thus falling into the trap of local tyrants. What is more important is that when bandits are being used [by landlords] to attack peasants, we should use force to deal with them and do our best to spread propaganda and expose the landlords' conspiracy. (c) Train peasant self-defense corps to deal with those bandits who support local despots and live off the peasants.

8) We use the experience of the rapidly developing peasant movement in the south for our work everywhere. From now on, in places reached by our party's organization, the GMD's organization, and our labor union movement (for example, along the railways, in mines, and in the suburbs of all major cities), and particularly where land is concentrated, we should use the experiences gained in Guangdong and all the methods in this resolution to carry out [the peasant movement] to the fullest possible extent. We must do our best to win over the largest possible majority of peasants as allies of the working-class revolution in this anti-imperialist, antiwarlord national revolutionary era.

9) The real liberation of peasants all over the world is related to the liberation of the working class in the world. Therefore, within the realms of the possible, we should lead organized Chinese peasants to join the international peasant organizations to develop the world character [of the Chinese peasantry] and contribute to the progress of the world revolution.

B.9 Second Revised Constitution of the CCP (January 1925)⁷¹

Chapter One: Membership

1. Members of our party are not differentiated on the basis of nationality or sex. Those who acknowledge our party's program and Constitution and are willing to serve our party loyally can become members of our party.

2. To be granted probationary membership in the party one must be sponsored by two people who have held party membership for over half a year; [the application] must be passed by a meeting of the party branch [zhibu],⁷² and examined and approved by the district committee. The probation period is three months for laborers and six months for nonlaborers; this period may be extended or shortened at the discretion of the district committee. A probationary member participates in branch meetings (if necessary, a probationary member may be authorized by the district executive committee to attend the district congress but will not have the right to vote) and enjoys the right to speak but not to vote. Other duties are identical to those of the regular party member.

3. Party members accepted by the CEC must also go through a probationary period after their district committees have been notified. Those who hold membership in CPs recognized by the Comintern may become regular members of our party after having been checked by the Party Center [zhongyang].

4. When a party member voluntarily applies for withdrawal from the party, his or her application must be approved by the district, party card and other important documents must be returned, sponsors must guarantee that he or she will strictly keep all party secrets, and, in the event of violation of this commitment, the district executive committee⁷³ will take appropriate measures to deal with him or her.

Chapter Two: Organization

5. In the countryside, in factories, on railways, in mines, in barracks, in schools, and in other organizations and their surroundings, a party branch may be formed as long as there are three or more members [five or ten in 1923 Constitution]. Each branch elects one secretary and three members to form a secretariat and will come under the command of the district executive committee. Where there are fewer than three party members, a courier [tongxinyuan] is appointed and will come under the jurisdiction of the district [committee] or directly under the Party Center. When the number of members in a branch is too large, several cells [xiaozu] may be formed according to the situation; each cell has a group head who is to be appointed by the branch secretariat [zhibu ganshihui]. In places where there are branches but no district executive committee, the branches will come directly under the area executive committee; in places without area executive committees, the branches will come directly under the Party Center.

6. If an area has more than three branches, the area executive committee may send, with the authorization of the CEC, a person there to convene a full members' or delegates' congress. This congress is to elect three persons to form the district executive committee; it is also to elect two alternate members—when committee members have to leave their posts for any reason, they are to be replaced temporarily by alternate members. In localities where there is no area executive committee, the CEC is to send personnel down to organize a district executive committee. It will come under the Party Center. Once formed, the area executive committee will take over the responsibility and powers of the district executive committee.

7. If an area has more than two district executive committees and when the CEC deems it necessary to organize an area executive committee, it will send personnel to the area in question to convene a delegates' congress. The congress is to elect five people to form the area executive committee as well as three alternate members; if committee members have to leave their posts for any reason, they are to be temporarily replaced by alternate members. When the CEC deems it necessary, it may entrust a district executive committee to take over temporarily the responsibilities and powers of the area executive committee. The jurisdiction of the district is determined by the CEC and is subject to constant change.

8. The CEC is to be composed of nine persons elected by the National Congress; five alternate members are also elected by the Congress; when members leave their posts for any reason, they must be replaced temporarily by alternate members.

9. The term of office for CEC members is one year; for area and district executive committee members, six months; for branch chief or secretary, three months. The resignation of members of area and district executive committees and of branch chiefs and secretaries has to be approved by the superior organ.

10. The CEC implements all resolutions passed by the Congress and deliberates and decides on our party's policies and all the methods of implementation; area and district executive committees implement resolutions by superior organs and, within their jurisdiction and authority, deliberate and decide on all methods of execution. The CEC is to elect a general secretary from among its number to be in charge of party affairs for the whole country. Executive committees and secretariats at other levels must elect one secretary to manage party affairs at that level; other committee members assist the general secretary or secretaries at all levels in administering party affairs.

11. The resolutions passed by the National Congress or the CEC and special problems that arise unexpectedly are to be handled by special commissions made up of several party members who are appointed by area and district executive committees; when such special commissions convene meetings, the chair of such meetings must be a member of an area or district executive committee.

Chapter Three: Meetings

12. Each branch must meet at least once a week as convened by the branch secretary. In branches that have already been divided into cells, the cells must meet at least once a week as convened by the cell head. The meeting of the entire branch must be convened at least once a month. All districts must convene a full members' meeting at least once a month (in exceptional circumstances the full members' meeting may be changed to one of branch secretaries or a joint meeting of secretaries, but the full members' meeting must be held at least once every two months). In each area, the executive committee should call a delegates' congress once every six months. The National Congress is to be convened by the CEC on a fixed date once a year. The voting power of each delegate is determined by the number of party members he or she represents. The CEC shall meet in full session every four months.

13. When the CEC deems it necessary, it may convene an unscheduled [linshi] National Congress or an enlarged CEC meeting. It must also call an unscheduled National Congress when one-third of the area representatives or one-third of party members make such a request.

14. Regarding the number of delegates to the National Congress or to an unscheduled congress, each district may send one representative; if it has over 100 members it may send two delegates, three if it has over 200, and one more delegate for each additional 100 members. Where a district [organization] has not yet been [formally] set up, it may send one representative if the CEC deems it necessary.

15. Should a problem arise, a superior executive committee may order a subordinate executive committee to convene various kinds of ad hoc meetings.

16. The CEC must always send personnel to all places to convene various forms of ad hoc meetings. They are to be chaired by the special commissioners sent by the CEC.

17. The meetings of the central, area, and district executive committees and branch secretariat meetings may be called at any time by the general secretary or the secretary at the relevant level.

Chapter Four: Discipline

[[Articles 18 to 25 are almost identical to those in the Constitutions adopted by the Second and Third Party Congresses. The only change is in Article 22, where branch is substituted for cell. See Articles 17 to 25 in the Constitution adopted by the Second Party Congress, Doc. A.15.]]

26. On leaving a locality, party members must receive permission from the local party branch and they must report to the party branch in the locality they are moving to, if a branch exists.

[[Article 27 is almost identical to Articles 26 and 25 respectively of the Constitutions adopted by the Second and Third Party Congresses. See Doc. A.15. The only change is in point b), where the stipulation that a party member should be expelled if he or she fails to attend two consecutive meetings without any reason is changed to three consecutive meetings.]]

Chapter Five: Funding

28. The revenues of our party come from the following sources:

a) Party dues. Party members whose monthly income [yue shouru] is under 30 yuan pay 20 cents per month; those without income or whose monthly income is below 20 yuan may have their dues reduced by the district committee according to circumstances; those whose income is between 30 and 60 yuan pay one yuan; those whose monthly income is between 60 and 80 yuan a month pay 3 percent of their income; between 80 and 100 yuan, 5 percent; between 100 and 200 yuan, 10 percent; special levies are collected from those whose income is above 200 yuan. Party dues are waived for unemployed workers, imprisoned party members, or members who are still in the SYL.

b) Contributions from within the party. These shall be determined by the district executive committees taking into consideration the state of local finances and the economic strength of party members.

c) Support sources from outside the party

29. All revenues and expenditures of our party are to be disposed of by the CEC.

Chapter Six: Appendix

30. The power to revise this Constitution belongs to the National Congress, and the right to interpret it belongs to the CEC.

31. This Constitution has been adopted by the Fourth Party Congress (11–22 January 1925) and is effective the day it is issued by the CEC.

B.10 Resolution on the Current Political Situation in China and the Tasks of the CP (October 1925)⁷⁴

1) The National Revolutionary Movement Since “May 30”

The situation since the “May 30” [1925] slaughter has offered a truly excellent opportunity for developing and expanding the national revolutionary movement.

The exploding revolutionary tide of the past four months has spread over almost the entire country.

The first characteristic of this movement is that it is a genuine movement of ordinary people. From the very beginning, the "May 30" anti-imperialist movement had a huge following among the urban masses: the proletariat, handicraft workers, small merchants, students, guilds in various areas, and even the intellectual class in churches and church-run schools, who originally were subject to the direct influence of imperialist institutions.

The second characteristic of this movement is that it has caused a part of the domestic military forces to lean toward the side of popular movement, for example the National People's Army.⁷⁵ On the other hand, the Fengtian clique of warlords have displayed their counterrevolutionary nature all the more clearly in this national revolutionary movement by blatantly supporting the imperialists.

Of course, these characteristics show even more clearly the changes in China's social and economic conditions that continue to unfold in the wake of the Xinhai [1911] Revolution and that move us nearer to completing this nationalist revolution.

Guangdong occupies a special place in the nationalist revolution. The strikes and boycott of goods that were supported fully this time by the revolutionary government truly assumed a nationwide character.

Political power in Guangdong is now in the hands of the GMD-left. Of course, the [left wing] is the most revolutionary vanguard in this revolutionary battlefield. The workers, peasants, and masses of the south go all out to encourage this revolutionary government to resist imperialism and domestic counterrevolutionaries. However, these enemies of the Chinese people also launch the fiercest attacks because the British imperialists in the south have a monopoly of despotic power and can oppress China without anybody preventing them.

It is the development of the mass revolutionary movement in north and central China and the conflicts between imperialist powers nationwide that have prevented the British imperialists from quashing the revolutionary movement in south China.

2) The Working Class and the National Revolutionary Movement

In the current struggle against imperialism, the working class has clearly demonstrated its leading role in the revolutionary movement for national liberation. The enormous scale of the strikes in Hong Kong and Shanghai is unprecedented in Chinese history, and all the democratic classes and ordinary people who are oppressed by imperialists have rallied together under the flag of the struggle by the working class. Most urban residents support the victory of the anti-British strikes. This confirms that the Chinese proletariat is the vanguard and main force for liberating the whole nation.

In addition, the cruel slaughter and suppression of workers by the Fengtian clique of warlords in Shanghai, Nanjing, Qingdao, and Tianjin prove that the Chinese working class spearheads the fight for civil rights. At the peak of the strikes, its movement was really very close to causing a national general strike, daily guiding more and more people from all classes in urban and rural areas to join the liberation movement and constituting a serious threat of a national popular uprising against the imperialists and warlords.

The proletariat is mobilized to fight for our nation's general interests: yet, at the same time, it must struggle to improve its own economic and legal position. The strikes in Hong Kong and Shanghai are the main fighting force in the nation's working-class movement. In the last couple of months, the masses of workers have risen up to fight for improvements in their economic positions: pay increases, reduction in working hours, and recognition of labor unions—this movement has acquired a scope and force hitherto never seen in China.

The experiences of the past several months in China obviously prove that the Chinese bourgeoisie is the same as the bourgeoisie in the capitalist countries in the past. If they want to seize political power and oppose the foreign and domestic forces that oppress them, they must join forces with the workers—however, this will only be to pursue their own class interests. As soon as the proletariat, in its common cause with the bourgeoisie, begins to make demands on the bourgeoisie for its economic interests and legal rights, the domestic bourgeoisie will immediately start to oppress workers. It will even be willing to compromise with enemies at the expense of the national interest.

The division within the Chinese bourgeoisie is being exposed every day because of the development in the proletarian economic struggle. As a result of such divisions, the most reactionary bourgeoisie not only opposes the proletariat but also betrays the national revolution. However, the several million members of the urban petty bourgeoisie, who have been drawn into this movement of anti-imperialism and fighting for citizens' political power in concert with the struggles of the proletariat, are still allies of the working class.

The Chinese proletariat must conserve and concentrate its forces with extreme care. It can deliver a heavy blow against the imperialists and warlords only by forming a united front with ordinary people among the urban democrats and organizing the peasant masses to join in the revolutionary movement.

3) The Peasantry and the National Revolutionary Movement

The peasant movement in China has gradually developed in the southern and central provinces. The CP's demands for the peasantry should be synthesized into a political program on the peasant question. Its ultimate objective should be the confiscation of the land of big landlords, warlords, bureaucrats, and churches. The land should be given to the peasants. The CP should make ordinary democrats realize that the confiscation of land is an inevitable policy, as well as an important mission in completing the Xinhai Revolution. Now we should let ordinary workers and peasants know that when the time comes to establish a national revolutionary government, the confiscation of land will be an important issue of the revolution. If no land is confiscated and given to the peasants, if several hundred million peasants are thus unable to join the revolution, the government will surely fail to consolidate its power and suppress the warlords' counterrevolution.

Our party should realize that the peasants' demands we are now raising during the transition period are aimed at revolutionizing and organizing the peasants. These demands include rent reduction, improvement of irrigation, tax reduction, abolition of extortion, return of the power to administer salt tariffs, reduction of salt tariffs, peasants' self-government of their villages, and organization of peasant associations and self-defense corps. However, if the peasants are unable to satisfy their most important demand—land to the tiller—in the last analysis, they will not become supporters of the revolution.

However, our tasks should not be limited only to declaring openly the peasants' demands and the future of the peasant movement. We should also pay attention, in the course of the peasant movement, to the development of the organization that leads the peasants—our party. The CCP is the representative of the Chinese proletariat. Only through establishing a secure alliance with the peasants can we fulfill our historic mission. Therefore, when the peasant movement is thriving as now, our fundamental responsibility is not only to organize peasants and guide their thinking but also to consolidate our party's organization inside the peasant associations, cooperatives, and peasant self-defense corps.

4) The Struggle Between the Warlords and the Revolutionary People's Regime

[[The current revolutionary movement not only opposes imperialism but also strives for the realization of a revolutionary people's regime. The revolutionary forces comprise not only the proletariat but also the peasantry, the urban petty bourgeoisie, intellectuals, and military opponents of the Fengtian clique such as Feng Yuxiang's National People's Army. These forces must be tightly united to defeat Zhang Zuolin and his Fengtian clique.]]

5) Conflict Among the Imperialists and the National Revolutionary Movement

[[The imperialists' attempts to suppress the national revolutionary movement are hampered not only by the Chinese people but also by divisions between the imperialists themselves and the intense class struggle in their own countries. Further, the presence of Soviet Russia undermines the militarists' capacity to use force in China. Despite these factors, however, the possibility still exists that the imperialists will use force to crush China and thus cause international chaos in the Pacific region.]]

6) The Chinese Revolutionary Movement and the World Proletariat

[[The Chinese people's struggle has opened a new front of anti-imperialism and has strengthened the revolutionary forces of the world proletariat and the oppressed nations of the east. The recent movement in China has shown that the relationship between the world proletariat and the national revolutionary movement in colonial countries is a much more important issue than ever before.]]

7) The Tasks of the CCP

a) The current period of the Chinese people's revolution has presented the CCP with tasks of great historic significance. The CCP directs the proletariat and the leaders of the national liberation movement. It must point the way forward to the masses, devise and declare its political program to enable the working class and its allies—the peasantry, the urban petty bourgeoisie, and revolutionary intellectuals—to struggle forward, in accordance with the program, and to fight for the realization of a revolutionary people's regime in China, and the unification and independence after ridding China of imperialist oppression.

During this period of revolutionary struggle, the CCP should not only outline the movement's future and the political program for the people's struggle, but also explain very clearly to the people the significance of the following concepts: the revolutionary people's regime; the unification of China; the national assembly of the representatives of workers, peasants, merchants, students, and soldiers; and the organization of a revolutionary nationalist army.

b) It is one of the fundamental tasks of the CCP to organize for the workers, in accordance with the above concepts, labor unions, factory committees, and labor union federations and to convene a national labor congress to concentrate the proletarian forces. At the same time, it is the most urgent task to recruit into our party the revolutionary elements in the Chinese proletariat. At present, a very important task for the CCP is to unite the class-conscious proletariat, organize it under the CP's banner and instruct it in class struggle according to communism. If the CP fails to develop and consolidate itself inside the revolutionary proletariat, then it is unimaginable that the Chinese proletariat's struggle and the national liberation movement will progress.

c) In the shift from strikes aimed directly at imperialists to strikes for the right to organize unions for economic reasons, there is the recent danger that the working class has neglected political struggle. However, there is also a danger in reducing the workers' economic demands in order to strengthen their political struggle. The CCP must be aware of both dangers. They are sufficient proof that the Chinese working class, in the revolutionary movement for the liberation of the whole nation, does not have a very clear conception of the struggle's future. To eliminate these two dangers, we should encourage the masses to participate more in various political movements, such as demonstrations, rallies, and other verbal or written propaganda. At the same time, there is a need to expand the workers' important economic struggles. These are important tasks for us at the moment and have crucial implications for our party's development.

d) In the working-class struggle of recent months, although many brave elements have been lost owing to the repeated repression by imperialists and warlords, an unprecedented revolutionary psychological state has been created among the masses of workers. The CCP should make use of this revolutionary psychology to prepare, in an organized manner, the arming of the bravest and most loyal elements among the working class. This kind of endeavor should be pursued not only on the railways and in the mines. In factories of reasonable size, young workers should be organized into armed groups of ten or 100. Therefore, a military committee must be set up under the C[E]C.⁷⁶

e) The GMD represents part of the urban petty bourgeoisie and the peasantry. The CCP should continue its policy of cooperation with the GMD and do all it can to guide and push the latter to carry on with the revolutionary movement. Dai Jitao's recent pamphlet, The Nationalist Revolution and the Chinese GMD,⁷⁷ represents the thinking of the rightists in the GMD, and it can be seen as the direct result of the revolutionization of the people in the past four months. The recent position of the Chinese proletariat and the CCP in the national revolutionary movement, especially in central and north China, has aroused considerable reactionary opposition from the bourgeois representatives in the GMD. They have felt the revolutionary force of the proletariat and have hastily cobbled together slogans of class compromise. If we regard this phenomenon as signaling the time for the CCP to sever its relations with the GMD, it would be a big mistake.⁷⁸ However, it would be a dangerous mistake not to pay attention to the significance of the class compromise championed by these rightists. Thus, we should seek a good method of alliance with the GMD which, ideally, will not hamper the alliance of the proletariat with the urban petty bourgeoisie and intellectuals, but will, instead, expand this alliance.

Politically, efforts to turn our party into a legitimate, open organization are also one of the important means to achieve the above objective. Organizing our own comrades to develop and consolidate our party's organization and guiding every movement and mission with our own distinct views on thinking and tactics act as safeguards for undermining the rightists and openly uniting with the leftists in the GMD.

d) The CCP and the [S]YL should guide the majority of students to join the revolutionary movement while, at the same time, trying to recruit revolutionary elements into the CCP and the [S]YL. In the past, students in the national liberation movement have played many revolutionary roles. Especially in the recent anti-imperialist movement, almost all students in every major city cooperated with the working class at the forefront of the anti-imperialist [struggle] and also guided the petty bourgeois masses to participate. Right now, when the revolutionary tide is continuing to surge forward, undoubtedly students will play an even bigger role. Because the daily polarization of the bourgeoisie in the national revolutionary movement has evidently also manifested itself among the student masses, however, a section of the reformists among students are now being controlled by the GMD-rightists. Thus, they are not actively fighting the imperialists but instead concentrate their energy on opposing the CP and all leftists in the national revolutionary movement.

The present responsibility of the CCP and the [S]YL in the student movement is to try to form a unified student organization and breach the reformist policy of the rightists among the students. On the whole, students should become leftists in the national liberation movement. To bring about a unified students' organization, it is necessary to conduct extensive propaganda among the students so that the masses among the rightists may pressure their leaders to cooperate and negotiate with us openly.

To lead the student masses to join the national revolutionary movement, it is also necessary to pay attention to the problem of the students' daily work and through leading them in this induce them to accept our beliefs and form a centralized organization to raise their own demands in the national revolutionary movement:

demands such as the right to organize self-governing associations in all universities and colleges.

B.11 Resolution on the Question of Organization (October 1925)⁷⁹

1) Hundreds of thousands in Shanghai, Hong Kong, and Canton have joined in the national revolutionary movement by means of strikes. The most backward part of the proletariat in north and central China was mobilized to join the struggle, thus helping millions of workers attain consciousness through the political and economic struggles. This is an unprecedented period and compels the CCP to emphasize the proletariat's leading role in the struggle and guide it into the national liberation movement.

2) The high tide of this nationalist revolution and the enthusiasm with which the immature proletariat joined this movement have meant that the CCP's role has greatly increased. It must mobilize and organize the proletariat and, through political training and education, search for ways to ally with the peasantry and with other advocates of democracy. To fulfill this mission of great historic significance, the CCP must first expand its own organization by absorbing the proletariat and the most revolutionary elements among the radical intellectuals.

The current period for the CCP and the national revolutionary movement is marked by the daily rising revolutionary tide among the masses. This is beyond doubt.

The future destiny of China's revolutionary movement depends entirely on whether the CCP is able to organize and guide the masses.

3) However, whether the CCP will be able to lead and organize the revolutionary workers, handicraft workers, and intellectuals depends not only on recruiting them into our party but also on whether our party has a just and good organization. It is essential to have centralized organization of active members, from the top to bottom, from branches [zhibu] to the Party Center. The lower-level organizations must have very clearly defined and close relations with the higher levels.

Now that the number of party members has increased, the CC will be enlarged accordingly at the next congress. Unambiguous organizational definition must be made for the Party Center's different departments such as organization, propaganda, women's, distribution, and publication. The relationships between these departments must also be clearly defined. CC and area secretaries should, if possible, avoid assuming positions in these departments. Committees for the labor, peasant, and military movements should be established under the Party Center.⁸⁰ They should be responsible for implementing their own tasks. The number of special commissioners [tepai xunxing de zhidaoyuan] sent by the Party Center should be increased to direct all work at the area and district levels. The experiences of the past few months show that in many places, especially in the north, there is too little guidance from the Party Center and an unequal distribution of personnel over the various areas. Our party's expansion is even more important following the high tide of the revolution. Special attention should be paid to the north, because workers there did not participate fully in the last movement. In particular, the setbacks in Tianjin and Tangshan have prevented us from immediately expanding the party in these two areas. Thus, in the north, the Beijing area organization must be consolidated to govern Zhili, Shanxi, and the three northeastern provinces. The Beijing district committee is an independent organization and is not subordinate to the Beijing area committee.

4) Area and district committees should, on the one hand, genuinely implement commands from the Party Center to the fullest extent and report to the Center for instruction on all questions concerning policies and tactics; on the other hand, they should direct the tasks in their areas (branches, party fractions [dangtuan], clubs [julebu], workers' study societies [gongren yanjiuhui], etc.) and dispatch personnel to monitor the party's daily work in all localities under their jurisdiction. Our party has expanded so much in places such as Shanghai that different geographical areas under the area committee [quwei] have to be divided into several "departments" [bu], and "departmental committees" [bu weiyuanhui] have to be organized. This organizational innovation is very necessary, first because it is convenient for directing work, and second because it makes the expansion of the party's organization easier.

The task of each branch, particularly in factories, is to consolidate our forces organizationally regularly and to recruit revolutionary workers.

5) At present, the most important organizational question is the consolidation of our party's influence among the masses. Now the revolutionary movement is riding high. The willingness of the masses to accept our proposals is not sufficient proof that we have a genuine following among the masses and can actually lead them. We must make use of this revolutionary wave in the following ways:

a) Complicated party entry procedures for revolutionary workers, students, and peasants are to be waived. The probation period will be one month for workers and peasants and three months for intellectuals.

b) Our party's branches and groups [fractions] should be organized in all workers' organizations, peasant associations, and intellectual groups.

Only after joining the party will all revolutionary elements in society have the opportunity to receive the party's training and really understand its doctrines. We should never dream of recruiting many ready-made party members from Chinese society. The industrial worker in major industries is a natural CP member. As long as he or she has class consciousness and loyalty to the revolution, he or she can join the party without having to satisfy other criteria, especially now in the middle of this revolutionary era. At present, most leading comrades in all localities have the mistaken view that every CP member should understand Marxism and possess a great capacity for work. They think that if party membership improves only in quantity and not in terms of quality, there will be no benefit and the party's organization would be weakened further. Thus, many such leaders propose that the quantitative development of the party is to be limited by the party's capacity for educating its members. This mistaken view is the only obstacle to making the party a truly mass party.

During the high tide of the revolutionary movement, when the Hong Kong workers' struggle was at its peak, the Guangdong area even failed to use the opportunity to consolidate and expand our party. Although the Guangdong area was able to influence the thinking of the masses of workers and peasants, it was unable to consolidate these forces in organizational terms by recruiting workers and peasants into our party and organizing our party groups [fractions] among the various social groups. This was a mistake. Our comrades in Guangdong only worked individually inside the labor unions, peasant associations, and troops under the GMD. They did not resemble a powerful political party with its own interests and properly organized so as to lead the proletariat in the national revolutionary movement.

6) Our comrades and committee members at all levels (central and local) have always worked individually inside labor unions, the GMD, and the student masses, and limit themselves to certain specific tasks. Then, toward the party, they behave as if they represented that particular movement while failing completely to pursue the party's overall tasks. This is a bad habit and should be corrected immediately.

This habit is a manifestation of transition from a small group [xiao tuanti] to a centralized mass political party. Now this transitional period should be ended in the shortest possible time. The whole party should be close to the masses of the proletariat, the peasantry, and the intellectuals.

7) The question of a united front of the working class, peasants, petty bourgeoisie, and all those who advocate democracy is, in large part, a question of the relationship between the CCP and the GMD. Therefore, in organizational terms, we should particularly emphasize building our party's organization where the GMD has great strength (such as in Guangdong); this is the only way of expanding this united front and consolidating our cooperation with the GMD-left.

8) The reactionary high-pressure policy of the warlords and capitalists in the industrial areas is, on the one hand, the inevitable result of the development of economic struggles and, on the other, the result of the fact that the majority of the masses of workers did not participate fully in the revolutionary movement. Now that such reaction has come, we should move underground in certain places. However, this is not to say that we should return to the previous situation. This is only to carry out secret tasks among sections of the working class and intellectuals.

We should prepare secret organs [mimi jiguan] while simultaneously doing our best to carry out open political movements. We should remember that by engaging in secret work, the party cannot become a mass party.

9) In addition to developing the organization and tasks of the party, the organizational expansion of the CYL⁸¹ to penetrate young workers, peasants, and students has great significance for the realization of a mass party and the work of the national revolutionary movement. Hence, the enlarged meeting considers that one of the most important tasks at present is to assist the CYL to develop and consolidate its organization, as well as with the education and training of its members.

In the past, the party did not give guidance and help in the work of the CYL. Several localities transferred comrades with important responsibilities in the CYL as they pleased without permission from the CYL central authorities. This is a mistake that hinders the organizational development of the CYL. From now on, all localities should try to correct this shortcoming and, whenever possible, not transfer or use comrades responsible for CYL work. The localities should also consolidate relations between the party and the league in all respects in accordance with the decisions on the relationship between the CP and the CYL adopted in the resolution on the question of organization adopted at the league's Third National Congress [January 1925].

B.12 Resolution on the Relations Between the CCP and the GMD (October 1925)⁸²

[[1) Since Sun Yat-sen's death [12 March 1925], bureaucratic and compradore classes in the GMD have been forming groups. They intend to overthrow the Canton government and compete with the CC of the GMD.

2) The proletariat is an autonomous social force and the formation of the bourgeoisie as a political force is speeding up. The GMD and the petty bourgeoisie are doing their utmost to define their thought and consolidate organizationally.]]

3) However, the recent developments in the revolutionary movement not only have caused further differentiation within the GMD but also have expanded its organization and, in particular, have truly made it the mass political party of nationalist revolution in the south. Tens of thousands of new party members from the urban petty bourgeoisie, peasants, and workers have joined.

4) The CP's current task is to continue, more firmly than ever, with its policy of cooperation with the GMD in order to bring it close to the majority of the masses, give assistance to the left, and enable it to carry out the tasks of expanding the revolutionary movement. At the same time, we should do our utmost to oppose the slogans and strategies of the rightists. All party members should realize that our current policy toward the GMD is to oppose the rightists but form a close alliance with the left, doing all we can to help the left and fight the right.

5) An important method of executing this strategy is to expand and consolidate our party everywhere, especially in the places dominated by GMD. Our party should actively enter the political stage and carry out our own ideological struggle

Leftists	Rightists	Reactionaries
1) oppose all imperialists to the end	oppose one set of imperialists, but compromise with others because of the workers and peasants' struggle	collude with imperialists
2) support labor and peasant movements for the sake of the revolution	propose compromise between labor and capital	cruelly oppress the labor and peasant movements
3) oppose warlords for the sake of democratic politics	oppose warlords for the sake of own interests	collude with warlords
4) ally with Soviet Russia and the CP	ally with Soviet Russia but exclude the CP	oppose both Soviet Russia and the CP
5) eliminate all reactionary forces	save the reactionary forces to resist the left	they are the reactionaries and strategy everywhere. This is the second method for realizing our objectives. More specifically, we should use the following methods:

a) The CCP's propaganda and organization should be independent and must be expanded, especially in Guangdong.

b) We must win over the masses of workers and peasants.

c) Unless absolutely necessary, our new comrades should not join the GMD or do any work for the GMD, particularly in its highest branches (those branches completely under the control of our forces are exceptions).⁸³

d) Where the GMD-left exists (especially in Guangdong), we should sincerely cooperate with it and force it to participate in the nationalist movement to the best of its ability. We must not intentionally avoid it and let it stand by as an apathetic spectator. At the same time, however, we must make no concessions on the issues of the theory and practice of class struggle in all movements.

6)⁸⁴ Previously, among our comrades, GMD members were analyzed in terms of three factions: left, center, and right, classifying all GMD leaders as the center. Not only is this incorrect theoretically, but also it is strategically inappropriate. Its first defect is that our comrades unwittingly neglected our own positions and thus became purely members of the GMD-left. Its second defect is that it gave the false impression to the leftist elements in the GMD that "leftist" was synonymous with "communist." All who have not joined the CP or youth league consider themselves to be the "center" and regard all the policies that should be those of the GMD-left as policies of the CP, and thus refuse to endorse them. Its third defect is that this classification made the genuine rightists in the GMD (such as Dai Jitao, Zou Lu, Shao Yuanchong, and others) regard the reactionaries as the rightists and themselves as the center. Moreover, the former so-called rightists have now become open reactionaries and have publicly split from the GMD. Members of the former so-called center have now joined either the left or the new right. Thus, at present, the GMD has only two factions: the left and the right. However, for the left, it is not enough simply to mouth leftist views. By their deeds, members must not violate the Manifesto of the First GMD Congress. Their concrete political standpoint must be different not only from the reactionaries but also from the rightists. In this period, the attitude toward the question of whether to unite closely with the communists is a distinguishing character of the GMD-leftists. In our propaganda, we should classify the left and right in the GMD and the reactionaries according to the political views listed [in the table] above.

B.13 Proclamation for the Peasantry (10 October 1925)⁸⁵

[[Since ancient times our people have been divided into four classes: the intellectual class, the bourgeoisie, the peasants, and the workers. The peasants suffer oppression from four sources: the landlords, through rent, usury, etc.; the foreign capitalists because their goods and industry have destroyed traditional handicraft work and because of their control of such things as the salt tax; the warlords with their indirect taxes and extortion of moneys needed to wage their wars; corrupt officials and evil gentry who collect in bribe money at least twice as much as the state levies—the tax on land deeds is 9 percent of the value of the land but only 3 percent goes to the state treasury, 3 percent goes to the county governor, and the other 3 percent is divided between the police and the local bureaucrats. The suffering caused means many peasants have to give up farming and enlist in the army, become bandits, or drift to the cities.]]

The peasants have an important job growing food and account for the majority of the population, but now they are so miserable that they have to wander about the country. This is not a misfortune for the peasants alone, but is a danger and loss for the whole country. The fundamental solution to eliminating the peasants' misery lies with the implementation of the policy of "land to the tiller." This means that peasants till the land they own and do not have to pay rent to the landlord. In addition, abolition of the salt tax and high interest rates would also have a great impact on peasant livelihood. However, in order to realize the goal of abolishing the salt tax and high interest rates, and implementing "land to the tiller," the peasantry must be allied with the workers to make revolution and overthrow the warlords' government, since this government will never be willing to abolish the salt tax and high interest rates. As for "land to the tiller," it will have to wait for the workers, peasants, and other people to seize political power; only then can the land of warlords, bureaucrats, churches, and big landlords be confiscated and be owned by the peasants who farm the land. As a temporary strategy of self-help, our party suggests that the nation's peasants should make the following minimum demands:

- 1) That the government must recognize peasant associations organized by the peasants to replace the peasant societies that are thoroughly controlled by the non-peasant, evil gentry.

2) That rural self-governing bodies be directly elected according to the law of popular election, and never be manipulated by the gentry.

3) That peasant associations and rural self-governing bodies should have the power to determine the highest rent and the lowest price for grain.

4) That every rural self-governing body should be allowed to use local public funds to set up an office to make interest-free loans to peasants.

5) That every village should ban private individuals from stockpiling grain for speculation.

6) That all kinds of exorbitant taxes and levies and land taxes demanded in advance should be resisted. Necessary land taxes, regardless of whether they are calculated on population or grain, should be paid in accordance with market prices. Objectionable levies should be resisted.

7) That central and local governments set up special bureaus for river management and improvement. Special government budget funds for river management and improvement must not be diverted for other purposes.

8) That peasants be authorized to organize self-defense corps, armed by the government, to defend themselves against bandits and roving soldiers.

These are the peasants' current urgent demands. However, to satisfy these demands, peasants will have to organize themselves into groups and contribute their energy to the struggle.

How should peasants organize groups? The answer is to organize peasant associations. Perhaps some people think that peasants are, as a rule, always loosely knit and will have difficulty in organizing themselves into groups. The truth is just the opposite. According to our experience in Guangdong, peasant groups can be organized successfully. Only after our party's Third Congress in July [June] 1923 did we begin to help peasants organize groups in Guangdong. In under two years, peasants in over twenty counties organized peasant associations, with a total membership of over 400,000 people. Moreover, the thousands of self-defense corps have fought many battles with the landlords. The peasant association representatives in these twenty-plus counties met in Guangdong's provincial capital on May Day this year (every 1 May is labor day throughout the world) and founded the Guangdong Provincial Peasant Association. It so happened that on the same day (1 May), representatives of the nation's labor unions also met in Guangdong's provincial capital for the Second National Labor Congress.⁸⁶ The 278 labor congress representatives and the 125 representatives from the Guangdong Peasant Association held a joint conference and raised the call for an alliance between workers and peasants. Relations were very close and friendly. From these meetings, we can see, first, that peasants are just as capable of organizing associations as workers are of organizing unions. Second, we can see that peasants and workers belong to the same laboring class that uses its labor to make a living and has a real need for mutual assistance. Most workers are concentrated in metropolitan cities, such as Shanghai, Tianjin, Hankou, and Canton, and occupy important positions in the political struggle. Since the "May 30" Movement, the Shanghai and Canton localities especially have organized labor unions, and now they have over 200,000 members. Their continuous economic and political struggles have frightened the Chinese and foreign capitalists out of their wits. This shows more clearly that the peasantry now have urban workers as their powerful leaders. Third, we can see that workers and peasants, who have long been regarded by factory owners and landlords as cattle and horses and looked down on by the gentry, have now all organized themselves into groups and have bright prospects for gaining their dignity one of these days.

Perhaps some people think that the peasants in Guangdong were helped by the GMD government and thus were able to organize themselves but that this may not be possible for other provinces. This view is half right and half wrong. Of course the GMD government in Guangdong is willing to help the peasantry but, at the same time, there are many instances of landlords and chambers of commerce in Guangdong colluding with the GMD-center and right (the bureaucratic elements inside the GMD), as well as with the military and county magistrates, to sabotage the peasant associations and maltreat the peasants. Sometimes the GMD government could do nothing about it. In the last analysis, the peasants have to rely on their own forces to succeed. In addition to Guangdong, the peasants in Hunan and Hubei are gradually organizing peasant associations. Here, it is clear that peasants are capable of uniting themselves without the help of the government.

Dear peasants! If you want to get rid of poverty and oppression, all of you have to organize groups, form peasant associations, and then let the associations organize peasant self-defense corps. All existing associations in every province and county were organized by the landlords and gentry. Their interests are directly opposed to the interests of the real peasants. Unless the real peasants who till the land organize their separate associations, peasant interests cannot be protected. Our party is a party that fights for the interests of workers and peasants. There is no doubt that we will help you. Even the leftists in the GMD (the revolutionary elements in the GMD) also should help you, because their national revolutionary movement will not succeed without your participation.

How should peasant associations be organized? The constitutions of peasant associations in various places have, naturally, slight differences according to the local situation. However, their chief methods should be the same, and they are as follows:

- 1) Members of peasant associations must be sixteen years old or older, tenant peasants, farmhands, self-tilling peasants and manual laborers in handicrafts in the countryside. All landlords who do not till their own land, money lenders charging high interest, church personnel who do not till their land—such as fathers, priests, monks, Taoist priests, nuns, and witches—are not to be admitted.
- 2) All members must pay the entry fee and some monthly dues.
- 3) Every province's peasant association is to be divided into four levels:
- a) The village peasant association comprises one or several villages; its members must number more than twenty; a three-member village executive committee is elected by the members.

b) The township [xiang] or area [qu] peasant association comprises peasant associations from more than three villages within its area. A five-member township or area executive committee is elected by a general congress (or representatives' congress) of members of the entire township or area.

c) The county [xian] peasant association comprises peasant associations from over three townships or areas in the same county. A seven-member county executive committee is elected by the county congress of peasant association representatives.

d) The provincial [sheng] peasant association comprises peasant associations from over five counties. A nine-member provincial executive committee is elected by the provincial congress of peasant association representatives.

4) Sixty percent of membership dues collected by each village should be spent on the village peasant association, the remaining 40 percent on higher-level peasant associations.

5) Nonmembers are not allowed to join the peasant self-defense corps.

6) Each year, the province's executive committee calls a provincial congress of peasant association representatives and elects new executive committee members and alternate members. County, township, or area congresses are to be called once every six months by the county, township, or area executive committee to elect new executive committee members and alternate members. Village meetings of members are called every month by the village executive committee to elect new executive committee members.

7) The village executive committee meets three times a week. The township or area and county executive committees meet twice a week. The provincial executive committee meets once a week.

8) Executive committees at all levels have one committee chair and one vice-chair as standing members to work for the association.

9) All executive committee members at all levels should appoint association members to organize specialized groups, such as self-defense corps, consumer co-operatives, education councils, irrigation bureaus, and other enterprises in the public interest.

10) Executive committees at all levels should appoint nonpeasant advisers and other technical personnel to assist in various administrative matters.

B.14 Resolution on the Current Political Situation and the Main Tasks of the CCP (February 1926)⁸⁷

The anti-imperialist and nationalist "May 30" Movement originally formed the widest possible united front of all classes, but this united front soon split. On the one hand, the Chinese bourgeoisie was frightened by the unprecedented mass movement of the proletariat while, on the other, it was bought off by the false friendliness of the imperialists. Gradually, it left the movement and caused the working class to fight the imperialists and warlords alone at the cost of its own blood. After the split in the nationalist movement, class differentiation began among the students, who had always been prone to revolution. The workers' movement became a mass movement, but it did not make the students more united; indeed it caused even greater divisions among them. The [students'] contradictory nature was fully revealed. Now among the students there are Communists and statist, each reflecting the thinking of different classes in Chinese society. Communists represent the working class; statist represent the compradore class that oscillates between the national and the imperialists' interests.

However, the Chinese proletariat does not believe that the Chinese bourgeoisie and a minority of students have already gained real concessions from the imperialists. In fact, the splitting off of the bourgeoisie from the nationalist movement and from the vanguard of the nationalist revolution, the proletariat, is premature even when seen from the standpoint of the bourgeoisie's interests. This split has only occurred because the bourgeoisie wants to sell out the mass movement so that it can gain concessions from the imperialists. However, the bourgeoisie has completely deluded itself. All it has gotten are empty promises about China having sovereign control over customs by 1929⁸⁸ and a deceptive trick about calling a meeting on the issue of extraterritorial rights. Under these circumstances, it is not possible, in the short term, for the bourgeoisie to reach a genuine compromise with the imperialists. Therefore, the bourgeoisie's resistance to imperialism is inevitable.

However, if the anti-imperialist nationalist movement really attains a stage of genuine struggle, the working class will immediately be isolated. Even now we can already see that a small genuine concession from the imperialists would be enough to split the Chinese nationalist movement even further. Under these circumstances, if our party fails to convince itself and our own class of the significance of the peasant question, then our party will fail in its divine mission. It will not have the ability to become the conscious vanguard and leader of the working class. Because peasants are the most consistent allies of the working class in the national revolution, they also want complete success for the national revolution. The current general political situation and the future of the revolution have made this a very problematic issue. The isolation and segregation of the working class in the national revolution since the "May 30" Movement further proves that the rise of the peasant struggle is an indispensable condition for the success of the national revolution. The [peasants] are the most necessary and reliable allies of the working class. The imperialist plunder of China results in the unlimited exploitation of peasants and workers. The main objective of the peasants and workers' anti-imperialist struggle is to avoid such exploitation. Thus, only the alliance between the workers and peasants will be enough to lead the national revolution to its final victory.

At our last congress [January 1925] and the recent enlarged meeting of the CC

[October 1925], our party discussed the peasant question and took general decisions [see Docs. B.8 and B.10]. Now we should make a summary of the situation and the results of our work. We can say that these decisions can be implemented and become effective only in those areas under the political power of the GMD or the National People's Army. With respect to developing the peasant movement, the political power of the National People's Army and the GMD has special significance. Therefore, the CCP should work particularly hard on all fronts to extend this kind of regime to every province and thus expand the basis of the peasant movement, making it possible to establish a united front of workers and peasants. Under the present political circumstances, the working-class struggle against imperialism is taking place almost in isolation. Our party's most important task is to expand the base of the peasant movement. Thus, the Northern Expedition of the Guangdong nationalist government is a question of the utmost importance.

The popular anti-imperialist "May 30" Movement dealt the reactionary warlords a powerful blow and caused their internal disintegration and conflicts that led to gradual political and military defeats. Very quickly, however, the British and Japanese imperialists established a united front with Wu Peifu and Zhang Zuolin to counterattack the National People's Army. Although the National People's Army in the north has been dispersed and no longer has a center, it is on the side of the anti-imperialist front and performs the role of undermining and overthrowing the imperialists and warlords. The anti-National People's Army united front of the British, the Japanese, Zhang, and Wu represses all national revolutionary movements. If the united front of the British, the Japanese, Zhang, and Wu wins, a very reactionary situation will be created as the imperialists further divide the nationalist movement. Moreover, they exert great force to maintain this reactionary situation, and thus it will certainly be a very long period. At the same time, this victory of the imperialists' counterattack will certainly continue in order to overthrow the national revolutionary government in Canton, the source of the Chinese revolution. The current situation is indeed crucial, and the life and death of the Chinese revolution depends on it. Of course, we should do our best to concentrate all the revolutionary strength in the north to resist the imperialists' counterattack. The fundamental solution, however, lies in the victory of the Northern Expedition of the Canton national government, which is the indispensable guarantee for our nation's people. This will also broaden the struggle against imperialism and win final liberation.

The Canton national government was established [1 July 1925] in the course of the "May 30" Movement. It was not only helped by hundreds of thousands of workers who rose up to support the struggle in the south but was also aided by hundreds of thousands of organized peasants. This government relies on the workers and peasants' revolutionary struggle as its pillars of support and thus sweeps away all counterrevolutionary warlords. It has unified civil, financial, and military powers in Guangdong; abolished unjust taxes and numerous levies; and in so doing has won the sympathy and support of ordinary people. However, if the forces of the Canton national revolution fail to expand across the country, they will become isolated. At the same time, they suffer oppression from the British imperialists, even to the extent of having to compromise and become a purely bourgeois government. At present, it is the only revolutionary center and source of the revolutionary movement. Only by expanding and developing the national revolutionary movement from Canton can we create great political significance and success later on.

At present, the National People's Army in the north is fighting Zhang [Zuolin] and Wu [Peifu]; peasants everywhere are agitating spontaneously; the working class is expanding and developing its organization and struggle; the Guangdong national government—a revolutionary alliance of workers and peasants—is indeed the most important vital force. However, the imperialists are doing their best to exterminate these forces. Amid the direct and indirect struggles between these revolutionary forces and the alliance of British and Japanese imperialist forces and Zhang and Wu, our party should clearly realize that an important historic opportunity now exists. This is the starting point for the revolution's victory. However, during these revolutionary times, if our party's political forces fail to develop in response to this opportunity, we will not consolidate or expand our political leadership of the ordinary people. Mere organizational expansion of the party will certainly not guarantee that we will be able to fulfill our historic mission. For all these reasons, this special meeting of the CC deems that the foremost current tasks of our party are to prepare the northern expansion of the Canton national revolutionary forces and to intensify our work among the peasantry, especially during the Northern Expedition, in order to build the basis of the revolutionary alliance between workers and peasants and achieve the victory of the national revolution across the entire country.

B.15 Political Report of the CC.

Chen Duxiu (July 1926)⁸⁹

1) Changes in the political situation since last year's enlarged meeting and our party's policies at each stage.

The political changes in the nine months since the enlarged meeting last October can be divided into three periods. In each period we pursued different policies. The three periods are: the first, between the Fengtian-Zhili war and Guo Songling's rebellion [22 November 1925]⁹⁰; the second, between the defeat of Guo Songling [23 December 1925] and the retreat of the National People's Army from Beijing [15 April 1926]; the third, between the National People's Army's retreat and the meeting between Zhang [Zuolin] and Wu [Peifu] [28 June 1926].

The first period is marked by the instability of the warlords' regime. During this period, the Fengtian clique disintegrated; the Anhui clique was weak; the Zhili clique had not yet revived; and the imperialists had lost control over all the warlord cliques and were in panic. The Duan [Qirui] government did its best to connive with the National People's Army, and Wu Peifu made friendly overtures toward the national government. It looked as if the southern national government and the northern National People's Army might unite, take over the national political power of the country, and establish a relatively red government.

During this period, our party's strategy was to use Sun Chuanfang's military actions against the Fengtian clique. We immediately raised the slogan "expand the nature of the war" and explained that the anti-Fengtian war was to be "fought for the freedom of the people," and that all revolutionary forces should gather under the anti-Fengtian flag. This propaganda had an enormous impact on the people and penetrated the warlords' troops. Thus, there was Guo Songling's uprising. Our party also raised slogans opposing the Zhili clique's movement to defend the constitution and to prevent an alliance between the Fengtian and Zhili cliques, as we expected that once the Zhili clique gained the upper hand it would certainly defend the constitution, and that if the Fengtian clique were defeated it would do its best to reach a compromise with the Zhili clique in order to secure the warlords' power.⁹¹

The second period is marked by the imperialists' attempts to suppress this revolutionary high tide by promoting, on the one hand, the military anti-red united front of the British, the Japanese, Wu, and Zhang and, on the other, making extensive anti-red propaganda among the people to thwart the revolution's victory.

During this period, our policy was to divide the anti-red united front. Thus, we proposed establishing a temporary gray government in Beijing, which would include both the Anhui and Zhili cliques so that forces could be concentrated against the Fengtian clique. This policy was never implemented, however, as Wu Peifu had already allied with the Fengtian clique in Hankou and begun to attack the National People's Army. Then, we proposed that the Guangdong government send an expeditionary force to crush Wu and rescue the National People's Army from its danger. In the end, this policy was not workable because our party did not possess sufficiently strong political forces. Even if the policy had been workable, we would not have been able to influence the GMD and the National People's Army to bring it to fruition.

The important phenomena of the third period were that the warlords' regime stabilized again and the behind-the-scenes conflicts between the British, the Japanese, Wu, and Zhang intensified. At the same time, the Guangdong national government actually began the Northern Expedition.

Although the conflicts among the British, the Japanese, Wu, and Zhang were very serious, the Fengtian and Zhili cliques did not let them escalate into the open because of the strength of the National People's Army.

During this period, our policy in the north was to unite the National People's Army with the Fengtian clique to oppose the Zhili clique and, in the south, the national government was to aid Hunan against Wu Peifu. If the anti-red military forces in the north (the Fengtian, Zhili, and Shanxi cliques) attacked the National People's Army together, it would be difficult for the National People's Army to survive. However, because of lack of sincere cooperation—each had its own selfish motives—the National People's Army was not defeated. As long as the relationship between the Fengtian and Zhili cliques did not change, the National People's Army could only defend and was unable to go on the offensive. When the southern national government dispatched its troops, it could only fight a defensive battle to prevent the anti-red forces from breaking into Hunan and Guangdong, but could not launch a thorough revolutionary Northern Expedition.

The current stabilization of the warlords' regime will be short-lived and can only be maintained through reluctant cooperation among the British, the Japanese, Wu, and Zhang. This stability will not last long.

2) Imperialist policy toward China.

[[Britain and Japan are the two most powerful imperialist nations in China. While Japan concerns itself only with Zhang Zuolin in the north, Britain wants to suppress the nationalist movement in central and south China. It wants Wu Peifu to capture Guangdong and challenge Zhang in the north. The United States seeks to win over the Chinese bourgeoisie with its calls for the Chinese to resist British and Japanese imperialism. Thus, we propose opposition to Britain first, Japan second, and the United States third.]]

3) The attitude of various social forces with regard to the nationalist revolution.

[[There are four types of social forces in China. First, the anti-red movement of warlords, compradores, bureaucrats, and new and old gentry. These are semifeudal forces. The warlords will collapse soon, the compradores are still very strong, bureaucrats are appendages to the warlords, the new lackeys (university professors educated abroad) are lackeys of the compradores, and the old gentry exploit the peasantry on behalf of the warlords. Second, the revolutionary movement of the masses of workers, peasants, and radical intellectuals. Third, the resistance movement among medium and small merchants. Fourth, the reform movement of the bourgeoisie. Unlike the compradore class, its cooperation with the imperialists is conditional. Under certain circumstances this inclines them toward the revolution.]]

Of the above four types, which should we use to further the revolution? Of course, only the second type, the workers and peasants, are the basic force of the revolution. The medium and small merchants of the third category have suffered from economic oppression by the imperialists through brutal levies and excessive taxes. Thus, they feel the need for revolution and do not oppose it. The workers and peasants should ally with them to avoid isolation. The fourth type, the bourgeoisie, also occupies an extremely important position in the national democratic revolutionary movement. In terms of the current political situation in the world, the Chinese nationalist revolution would face enormous difficulties or even danger without the vigorous participation of the bourgeoisie. We should understand that the Chinese revolution now is undoubtedly a bourgeois national democratic revolution. Therefore, when estimating the social forces in the revolutionary movement, it is not a question of whether we desire the participation of the bourgeoisie, but rather a question of whether the bourgeoisie wants to participate in it and to participate to the end. In fact, since the “May 30” Movement, the Chinese bourgeoisie has gradually become an important part of the nationalist movement and has demonstrated a tendency toward leadership of the movement, especially in Shanghai.⁹² The internal divisions of the warlords have clearly shown that the new military forces belong to the national bourgeoisie both in terms of thought and action. This is a new phenomenon in the Chinese nationalist movement that we must never overlook. However, a special characteristic of the bourgeoisie is that once it wins some small victories and satisfies slightly the demands of its class, it will immediately tend toward compromise, desert the people, betray the revolution, and cooperate with the enemies. Undoubtedly, it is incapable of staying with the revolution to the end. Therefore, our current attitude toward the bourgeoisie should be to do our best to retain the petty bourgeoisie and make it move closer to the people, so that it will not be completely dominated by the political thinking of the bourgeoisie. We then can compete with the bourgeoisie for the leading position in the revolutionary movement and prevent it from making future compromises. On the other hand, we should do our best to strengthen the united front of all classes and promote the revolutionization of the bourgeoisie, even though we know clearly that it will become our future enemy, probably within one to three years. However, at present we have to regard it as our ally; we must treat it as a powerful ally with whom we can overthrow foreign enemies (imperialists) and domestic enemies (semifeudal forces). If we foolishly believe that the bourgeoisie will stay with the revolution to the end, and do nothing to defend ourselves against future dangers, fail to win over the petty bourgeoisie from the bourgeoisie, and allow it to be ruled completely by the bourgeoisie, this will be a rightist mistake. At the same time, if now we deny the role of the bourgeoisie in the nationalist movement, fail to win over the Chinese bourgeoisie from the imperialists, treat the bourgeoisie with premature hostility and force it to be used by the imperialists, this will be a leftist mistake.

4) The internal divisions in the GMD and our attitude.

The internal divisions in the GMD reflect the four types of social forces described above. The reactionary right (Li Fuling, Feng Ziyou, Ma Su, and Gu Yingfen) represent the first; the Communists represent the second; the left (Wang Jingwei and Gan Naiguang) represent the third; the new right (that is, the center, people such as Dai Jitao and Chiang Kai-shek) represent the fourth. Our attitude toward the GMD should be identical to that vis-à-vis all social forces in the country—we must ally with the left and the center to attack the reactionary right. We can only support the left but not replace it; we can only ally with the left and control the center to make it lean toward the left. However, we cannot hope to wipe out the center. Especially, at the moment, we do not treat the bourgeoisie as an enemy. Sometimes we need to support those in the center. If we dream of making the GMD, which represents many classes, into a homogeneous party, if we wish the GMD to be monopolized by the pure left and not cooperate with other forces, this is to commit the same mistake as Dai Jitao with his idea of eliminating both the left and the right simultaneously.

5) The future of the nationalist movement.

There are two foreseeable paths for the future of the Chinese nationalist movement: (a) The activation of the bourgeoisie by the petty bourgeoisie under the leadership of the workers and peasants and the use of revolutionary means to build national capitalism; b) The control of the petty bourgeoisie by the compradore-bourgeoisie, which will compromise with the imperialists to crush the revolutionary movement and realize the Dawes plan⁹³ for capitalist aggression. Our task is to unite with the masses of workers and peasants, ally with the petty bourgeoisie to pressure the bourgeoisie to propel and consolidate the concerted development of the nationalist movement. Then, the Chinese nationalist movement may move in the direction of the first path. If we fail to win over the Chinese bourgeoisie from the imperialists and the revolution is aborted, or if we fail to win over the petty bourgeoisie from the bourgeoisie, the workers and peasants will not gain the leading position in the revolutionary movement. This will cause the revolutionary movement to expire in mid-life. The course of the second path will then be inevitable. If the Chinese workers and peasants want to lead this revolution in practice, the most important condition is to make our party, which represents the interests of workers and peasants, into a mass party with an excellent organization. This will enable us to expand the organization of workers and peasants as well as to unite with the GMD-left to keep the petty bourgeoisie in our alliance and lead the revolution through to its end.

As for the current condition of our party, we do exert a very strong influence on the nation's general propaganda. Our strength and concrete actions are still characteristic of the transition between a small group and a mass party. We need to make much greater efforts in order to gain the leading position in the revolution.

6) The development and work of the party in the last nine months.

On the positive side, we can say the following about the party's development during the last nine months: (a) party membership has tripled; (b) although we are unable to influence the petty bourgeoisie in terms of organization, we have more or less managed to lead the popular movement in the country, especially in Beijing, Shanghai, Hunan, and Guangdong; (c) we have great influence on political agitation in the country; our slogans and policies for each major political incident have all influenced the people; (d) the labor movement in Shanghai, Tianjin, Tangshan, and Hunan enjoys a firmer foundation than before. The labor movement in Shanghai has been gradually strengthened. Although Tangshan and Tianjin have suffered severe repression from the reactionary forces, the foundation of the labor movement has not yet been destroyed; (e) in general, the peasants in Guangdong and Hunan have their own mass organizations.

It is clear from this description that our party has expanded, but there are many shortcomings.

a) Although party membership has increased, the quality has decreased. This can be seen in several respects:

i) Our comrades are deficient in theory and lack a precise revolutionary outlook on life. In particular, few can creatively apply theory to actual work.

ii) Responsible comrades have tended to behave like hired labor and thus lack the previous spirit of hard work and spontaneous revolutionary passion. Thus, even if they maintain discipline, they cannot avoid the problems of formalism and bureaucracy.

iii) Some of the comrades have become corrupt (their finances are confused and they appropriate the party's assets).

b) On the whole, from the CC down to the party branches, there is insufficient capacity for leadership and training.

c) Branch [zhibu] organization exists in name only, but not in substance.

d) There is a serious lack of theoretical propaganda. Agitation work mostly fails to suit reality or penetrate the masses.

e) The labor movement has become institutionalized and lacks mass substance.

f) Everywhere, the peasant movement has developed the disease of leftism. Either slogans are too extreme or actions too leftist. As a result, we fail to attack our enemies while suffering heavy losses ourselves.

B.16 Resolution on the Question of Relations Between the CCP and the GMD (July 1926)⁹⁴

1) Events such as the March 20 coup in Canton, the meeting of the GMD C[E]C on 15 May, and the measures for dealing with the Communists proposed by the Whampoa [Huangpu] Military Academy are part of the usual attack on the CP. The armed center is now in power in Guangdong, but the rightist anti-red movement prevails throughout the country. Now, they are attacking the CP. Such attacks have been made possible by great changes in the actual political situation (the defeat and retreat of the National People's Army, the counterrevolutionary victory of the imperialists and warlords in the north, Wu Peifu's reappearance on the political scene and his collusion with the British, the Japanese support for Zhang Zuolin and their anti-Soviet campaign on the pretext of the Chinese Eastern Railway Incident, etc.). However, our party has also committed several mistakes.

Thus, from the Party Center down to the branches, we should launch propaganda to explain that the attacks against us by the right and part of the center of the GMD are in harmony with, and in response to, the anti-red movement of the imperialists and warlords and are counterrevolutionary actions. Moreover, we should study the reasons why the rightists and the centrists easily took advantage of the recent political situation to launch their attack. We should try to eliminate these causes.

2) One of the main reasons the right and even the center were able to attack us so easily and demand that we withdraw from the GMD is the mistake in our previous formula for leading the GMD. This formula simply forced the left not to participate in party affairs or the struggle against the right. We ourselves have created the situation of direct confrontation between the GMD and the CP, but have obscured the nature of this struggle—the struggle between the left and the right. Also, we failed to make the left organize itself both politically and organizationally. Of course, this meant that the GMD's development encountered obstacles and could not fully absorb the revolutionary intellectuals and the urban petty bourgeoisie. However, the right and center seized on this opportunity to influence the people. We did not implement the decisions of last October's enlarged CEC meeting that called on our party branches everywhere to act more independently and ally with the left to fight the right both ideologically and organizationally. This meant that we failed to establish sufficiently secure bases among the masses (labor unions, peasant associations, and student unions). We failed even more drastically in using the strength of the revolutionized masses to beat back the attacks from the right and the armed center after the political situation in the north deteriorated.

3) The decisions on the question of the GMD adopted by the enlarged CEC meeting last year were: (a) remain in the GMD to form a close alliance with the left and help it expand the GMD and oppose the right. We cannot substitute ourselves for the left. (b) Our party should be more politically independent. The reasons behind these decisions were that we perceived the GMD to be a political alliance of various social forces (revolutionary intellectuals, the national bourgeoisie in medium industries and businesses, the petty bourgeoisie of artisans and small merchants, peasants, and workers). Moreover, we still believed that the expansion of the GMD and our joining the GMD's leadership were preconditions for the victory of the Chinese revolution.

We should define more clearly our policies for the national revolution. On the one hand, our party should further demonstrate its political independence and establish its own forces among the workers and the majority of peasants in order to gain political influence among the revolutionized ordinary people. On the other hand, we should organize the revolutionary movement of the petty bourgeoisie and unite it with the GMD to strengthen the GMD-left. In addition, the revolutionary forces of the proletariat and the masses of peasants should be mobilized to influence the GMD. This will establish a powerful alliance with the GMD and will be able to compete with the bourgeoisie for leadership of the nationalist movement. The success of our efforts to gain the leading position in the nationalist movement can be guaranteed only in this fashion. Therefore, our current policies with respect to the GMD should be: expand the left, unite more closely with the left with whom we can jointly deal with the center, and openly counterattack the right.

If some comrades believe that the CP should completely sever organizational relations with the GMD and annihilate this party composed of a multiclass alliance in the belief that the CP can independently lead the proletariat and encourage other oppressed people to follow it to complete the national revolution left unfinished by the bourgeoisie, then they are completely wrong. They have completely misinterpreted the long-term future of the Chinese revolution for national liberation. The suggestion that we sever organizational ties with the GMD and merely cooperate with it has the same rationale as that used by the GMD-right and new right (the center) in demanding that the Communists withdraw from the GMD. This tendency reflects the bourgeoisie's desire to seize the leadership of the national movement because of its growth during the last year.

If some comrades still believe that the Communists should completely monopolize GMD organs and the GMD's organization and branch work, then, our experiences in Guangdong have proved them wrong. The GMD's current organizational form and social bases are not suited to it. Our occupation [of important positions in the GMD] would naturally create small parochial groups because of the concentration of power. The result would be to dissipate the strength of the majority of the revolutionary petty bourgeoisie because of dispersion and confusion.

Although these two views are opposed to one another, they commit the same policy mistake and pose identical dangers to the Chinese liberation movement, with the end result being the separation of the CP and the proletariat from the majority of the urban petty bourgeoisie who would, in reality, hand leadership over these masses to the big bourgeoisie.

4) These mistaken tendencies exist in our party because recent events have been very complex. The crystallization of the proletariat and the bourgeoisie in the past year is naturally reflected in the GMD in terms of the competition between the Communists and the right for influence over the center and the left. Therefore, at present, it is more important than ever that our party should have a clear long-term view of the future of the national revolution and a definite policy for dealing with the GMD. The CEC's views on relations between the CCP and the GMD must be clearly understood by party members and the masses so that they can form their own correct ideas.

Although this (July 1926) enlarged meeting of the CEC feels that the solving of the problem of an appropriate organizational relationship between us and the GMD is a question for the next party congress, it is necessary to make the following decisions:

a) Implement the resolutions of last October's enlarged meeting for independent action by our branches in Guangdong and elsewhere.

b) Actively expand the GMD-left and correct the previous policy mistake of restricting the left, thus not allowing the left to manage party affairs or participate in the struggle against the right.

c) Actively develop the left's mass organization outside of the party, especially among the urban petty bourgeoisie (political clubs, etc.), and use these social groups to expand the basis of the GMD.

d) Make the GMD-left understand that the GMD cannot be a party where power is concentrated in one class. The GMD cannot have regulations or a constitution that are too rigid. The GMD's organizational form should be informal and relaxed because of the need to recruit more of the revolutionary petty bourgeoisie. For example, the lower-level branches of the GMD should assume the character of a political club to bring them closer to the masses. It is not necessary to emphasize rigid regulations and thus restrict ourselves. For example, revolutionary social organizations should not be denied collective admission. In this way, the GMD will become a very large mass party.

e) Work together with the left for more frequent and practical struggles against the right to expose their crimes of compromise and betrayal of the country and the people. Only in this way can the center be separated from the right.

5) Our current urgent task in dealing with the GMD is to give priority to the antiright struggle. Even though they are led by the center, we should give all our support to the National Government and the GMD CC against the counterrevolutionary forces within and outside Guangdong. At the same time, we should maintain our own policies that support the interests of the working people and take these policies as the fundamental criteria for our support of the GMD and the national government.

B.17 Resolution on the Question of Organization (July 1926)⁹⁵

The Experience and Shortcomings in Party Development

1) Since the last enlarged meeting [October 1925], our party organization has expanded threefold. In the past eight months, despite the gradual ebbing of the tide of the May 30 Movement, our party's organizations across the country have managed to lead the popular movement in one form or another. In terms of the national revolutionary movement, our party has truly become a political nucleus. In terms of the substance of the mass movement everywhere, our party has gradually begun to assume the leading position.

2) We have gained the following experiences from past organizational work:

a) Through all kinds of political movements, we can come into close contact with the majority of the people and develop both mass organizations and the party itself.

b) The emphasis on expanding our work has won over the masses to our party, and we have been able to build basic organizations among them where the revolutionary tide is relatively high and the popular movement advanced.

c) Because we have begun to emphasize the results of branch [zhibu] work, we have given our party a better social composition, recruited progressive elements, and penetrated deep into the proletarian masses. Thus, we have secretly built a preliminary foundation.

3) While these are some of the better results derived from practical work, our party remains very naive in terms of organization and has many major flaws. Four flaws are the most important: first, our party departments [dangbu] at all levels have not appreciated the political significance of organizational work; second, the work of branches has not really begun and, in the past, they existed in name only. Our party departments at all levels do not understand the significance of branch work; nor do they know about work methods for the branch; third, the work of party fractions [dangtuan] is extremely bad; fourth, party organs are not perfect.

The Significance of Organizational Work

4) The significance of organizational work is never purely technical; it is also political. In other words, organizational work is the nerve center through which the party directs the mass movement. Without good organization, we cannot direct the mass movement or implement party policies; a good policy can be implemented only through good organization. The greatest characteristic of the Bolsheviks is organizational work. A young party must rely on good organization to become bolshevized, to change from a small group into a mass party, to change from a group bound by thoughts to one bound by deeds, and to organize mass action through the basic work of the party branches.

5) However, a recurrent danger in our party is weak leadership. Our subjective strength fails to match objective needs, thus wasting many opportunities for action. In particular, when mass political actions suffer from weak leadership, the losses will be huge. This is the most serious organizational problem. The revolutionary movement progresses day by day. Our party's biggest task in terms of organization is to advance the revolutionary movement further, hold the center of the movement, and command all within the largest possible scope. This is the responsibility not only of the Central Organization Department but also of organization sections in party departments at all levels. Therefore, the enlarged meeting has decided that from now on the Party Center will send special commissioners to inspect and implement organizational work in all areas, and the areas will send commissioners to all districts. If an unexpected event occurs in a certain place, such commissioners must be sent.

6) What is the biggest obstacle to organizational work? This is the suspicious mentality about developing our organization. Despite the temporary reign of a reactionary military regime, the revolutionary movement still continues unabated. Many workers, peasants, and intellectuals have become revolutionary because of the reactionary political situation. The problem is that they must be brought into close contact with the proletarian party or they will fall into the traps set by the compradore and bourgeois classes. Since the May 30 Movement, the main question has been who controls the largest number of masses in the United Front. The implication is that if our party is incapable of expanding or leading the masses, we will only enable the bourgeoisie and the reactionary forces to increase their strength day by day. Therefore, this enlarged meeting has focused serious attention on this problem and has again raised the slogan "Expand the party." It is imperative to develop our party further and to recruit even more revolutionary workers, peasants, and intellectuals.

7) One of the party's organizational tasks is to work among the nonpartisan and unorganized masses. It is a most important task at the present time to develop under many different forms and organizations masses sympathetic to our party. For example, we have achieved a great deal through work in the disaster relief associations, although our party's organs in various areas have not paid enough attention to this method. From now on, we must pay attention to, and operate within, organizations such as disaster relief associations and recreational, sports, education, and cultural groups.

The Significance and Working Methods of Branches

8) The branch is not a division, but the nucleus of the party in each factory, mine, school, or area. These many nuclei are joined together into one party according to Bolshevik principles. Branch organization is precisely determined by the nature of social life. However, most of our party's existing branches have lost this meaning; they are merely divisions of our party organized on the basis of revolutionary elements gathered from various social organizations or areas, and to whom party training is given. But these branches fail to perform their role as the nuclei of these social organizations or geographical locations. Without such a role, the party branch can never establish close contacts with the masses or lead them. This most serious flaw should be corrected immediately.

9) There are five methods to correct this flaw in order to build real branches:

a) At present, the real foundation of our party is not the branch, but the district committee. It is in the district committees rather than the branches that our party's activists are to be found. In the future, the real foundation of our party must be built on individual branches, and each branch must be held accountable for the party's basic work. We must establish each branch's work and activities, and divide each up so that every comrade has work to do. We should implement the slogan of "all work to the branch," thus allocating to the branches various kinds of work (such as the labor movement, peasant movement, cooperatives, disaster relief associations, women's movement, youth movement, sale of books and newspapers, party recruitment, reporting information, transportation and communication, etc. Such tasks are to be determined in light of the actual situation in each branch . . . which are to be determined by the practical situation of each branch, its number of members, and its needs). When operating in secret, large branches may find it difficult to call frequent meetings. For collecting party dues, relaying orders, and other affairs, the branch may be divided into cells [xiaozu]. However, we must not forget that the existence of cells is predicated on the circumstances described above; it is not the party's basic organization. The party's basic organization is the entire branch in each factory, mine, and school.

b) Strong and effective secretariats [ganshihui] should be established in the branches to direct branch work. For example, when a large branch divides itself into cells, in addition to the expansion of the branch's secretariat, regular meetings of the cell heads must be called. The branch secretariat must work actively in a planned, orderly manner, executing the resolutions and directives of the party and allocating each comrade's workload.

c) The nature of the branch should be changed so that there are only two kinds: (i) in a factory, a village, or a school, and ii) in a neighborhood or a geographical area (determined in accordance with place of residence). In defining the nature of the branch, first the branch's work must be established, and then it must not be confused with the cell.

d) In big industrial areas (such as Shanghai, Hong Kong, Wuhan, and Tianjin) and large villages, where the organization is developed and the number of branches has increased, departmental committees [buwei] defined by area should be set up under area or district committees. Several neighboring cells can set up a departmental committee to administer the work of all the branches within that area.

e) The organic system of the party extends from the Party Center to the area and district committees, from area and district committees to departmental committees, from departmental committees to branch secretariats or even meetings of cell heads. Internal relations within this system should be very close. The following organizational work must be strictly implemented starting from the mass branches or cells: (i) political action, (ii) expansion work, (iii) sale of books and newspapers, and (iv) collection of party dues and other work.

10) When the party is still in the process of expansion, lack of discipline, delay, and imprecision in organizational work will make it impossible for the party to launch any actions. An all-out effort must be made to convene all types of meetings no matter under what circumstances. As long as each member is prepared for the meeting beforehand, any meeting, even one lasting ten or twenty minutes, is beneficial and effective. Branch and cell meetings are even more important. All comrades have the responsibility to prepare their own reports and views before the meeting. Cell heads and branch secretaries or heads are responsible for convening meetings, and they must summarize the reports, make conclusions, and execute resolutions and directives. Each area, district, or departmental committee should call as many "meetings of activists" and "meetings of responsible comrades" as possible.

The Work of Party Fractions

11) Party fractions implement party policies and increase party influence in all kinds of nonpartisan groups, such as labor unions, peasant associations, student unions, and various social groups. Their functions and organization are different from those of the branch. Party fractions are not independent units; nor do they form a separate system. Rather they are part of the party organization and are set up under and administered by the party's organs at various levels. From the Party Center down to the branch secretariat, there are all kinds and levels of party fractions. Usually, they are temporary. They change often and depend for their existence on the decisions of party departments at each level. When the number of party members in a fraction becomes too large, it will be instructed to form a secretariat.

12) The work of the party fractions is to represent collectively the view of the party in implementing party policy. Individual members do not have independent views. When a party organ issues a directive to the party fraction, it must follow the directive. All members of the party fraction should be mobilized [to implement] the directive. All members should be mobilized to implement majority decisions of the party fraction with the exception of those that must be reported to higher level party organs for approval. Within certain limits, the party fractions can determine their own work. When there is a difference of opinion between the views of the party fraction and a party agency (for example, between the party fractions in a factory and that factory's branch secretariat), the difference must be reported to a superior party organ for resolution.

13) Many flaws have appeared in the past work of the party fraction. Some did not even understand what the party fraction was and tended to turn it into a rival organization to the party. These shortcomings must be corrected. Party organizations at all levels must not neglect this problem. Comrades in the party fractions can never afford to be separated from the basic organization of the party (the branch).

Party Organs

14) Political parties cannot be without organs; of course the CP must have organs. Our party organs are what Lenin termed organizations of "professional revolutionaries." The role of the party organs is to develop party organization and implement the party's political and technical tasks. Especially as our party is developing, it needs very good organs—the scientific organization of the proletariat.

15) The full establishment of party organs depends on two conditions: (a) the perfection of the organization and its adaptation to actual needs, and (b) sufficient and responsible working personnel. Organizations in the past often existed only in form, and sometimes even in name only, doing no actual work. For example, the organizations in every department and committee all have this problem. Although the source of this problem lies in insufficient labor, sometimes it stems from [the organizations'] inability to adapt to actual needs. To correct this problem, we should examine and reform organizational structures while starting work on replenishing and appropriately distributing labor in order to increase the number of responsible comrades. According to the report of the Central Organization Department, based on current needs, the number of working personnel needed for the nation's work is at least 35 for area committees, 160 for district or departmental committees, and 160 for special branches—altogether 355. In reality, however, the number of personnel working in the party is about 120 at most. From this figure, we can see the huge discrepancy between our labor power and actual needs. We should do our best to train personnel to aid our organization.

16) At the last enlarged meeting [October 1925], it was decided that each department of the Party Center should have a distinct organization and that secretaries of the CC and area committees should not take on concurrent positions [Doc. B.11]. It was also decided that the CC should have committees for the labor and peasant movement, as well as a military department. They should implement their own work. These decisions have only been partly carried out; the majority have yet to be implemented. For example, no comrade has been appointed exclusively to take charge of the Central Organization Department [Chen Duxiu was also general secretary]. The leading comrade in the committee on the labor movement [Zhang Guotao] is often dispatched to work temporarily in other places. The committee on the peasant movement has not yet been formed [set up in November 1926]. All the decisions must be implemented gradually after this enlarged meeting so that we can do our best to correct the past mistakes in our work. We should also add a secretariat [mishuchu] to the CC to take over all the technical work [set up in September 1926 with Wang Ruofei as head]. Party organization at all levels should be consolidated in the same fashion.

The mass revolutionary movement can be advanced only after the party organization is perfected. Close mutual relations must be established between the CC, all branches, and all organs at all levels. Regular reports must be made by the higher party organs to lower party organs, and vice versa.

B.18 Resolution on the Peasant Movement in Guangdong (July 1926)⁹⁶

[[While the peasants have a warm sympathy toward us, they do not understand our party's political program for them because we have not defined it clearly. A minimum program is necessary and is outlined in part I below. The temporary measures outlined in part II will give direction to the comrades in Guangdong who work directly with the peasant movement as well as giving guidance to the peasants.]]

Part I: A Minimum Political Program for the Present

- 1) The minimum political program for the present time
 - a) Economic:
 - i) The average tenant peasant demands rent reduction. There have been several rent-reduction campaigns in Guangdong, but they must have viable slogans with universal appeal. Hence, we suggest a 25 percent reduction in original rent, in accordance with methods used in tax payments.

ii) The self-tilling peasants and small landlords suffer great hardships from harsh levies and multiple taxes. To satisfy the demands of the self-tilling peasants and small landlords, we should propose the following: “abolish all miscellaneous levies and added taxes (no matter whether they are levied by the state or local government) and illegal extractions (the civil corps⁹⁷ fees and other non-governmental collectors), and establish a unified single income tax.”

iii) Stipulate that interest rates on loans must not exceed 2 percent. Violators will be penalized by law.

iv) The state is to found a bank for peasants that will offer low-interest loans to poor peasants.

v) The government must support rural cooperatives and ban evil merchants from monopolizing prices and stockpiling scarce goods for speculation.

vi) Improve the irrigation system and give relief to disaster-stricken areas.

vii) Unify measurements.

viii) Abolish unequal contracts between the landlord and the tenant, such as iron rent, rent deposit, rent for previous periods, etc., and other harsh provisions, such as the practice of the tianxinji rent. The government should devise regulations to govern farming. If landlords refuse to obey these regulations, peasants may take legal action at the village residents' arbitration office.

ix) Improve the economic position of farmhands and pay attention to female and child labor in the countryside.

b) Political:

i) All members of the civil corps must be local property-owning residents. The head must be elected by the township residents' meeting. The budget is determined by the township residents' meeting.

ii) The township head must be elected by the township residents' meeting.

iii) Township and village [government] financing must be completely open. Financial administrators must be elected by the township residents' meeting.

iv) The township judge must be elected by the township residents' meeting. Duties must be executed fairly.

v) A county committee should be established (with five members); the county magistrate will be elected by the people. During this transitional period, however, county magistrates appointed by the government are acceptable, although the people have the right to ask the government to remove them.

vi) The people's armed self-defense corps in each county may set up county federations for self-defense and a “county corps headquarters” that will not come under the control of the county magistrate. A department for self-defense corps affairs should be set up under the provincial government, and it will direct all county corps.

c) Education:

i) Popularize compulsory education in the countryside.

ii) Fifty percent of local funds are to be spent on schools for compulsory education in the countryside.

2. Methods of implementation

[[Lengthy propaganda will be required to enable the peasants to understand the above measures. However, the propaganda should not incite the peasants to spontaneous riots. Once they see them as their own demands, we should ask the national government to implement the program.]]

Part II: Temporary Measures for Dealing with the Present

1) How to Develop Party Organization in the Countryside

a) The need for party development.

This need can be explained with the following points. First, in the past our party's organization developed from Canton down to each village, and thus the peasant movement evolved in its wake. At present, the situation is precisely the opposite. Now, the peasant movement in each village has developed a great deal, while the party has not expanded significantly. This is why now the party is incapable of commanding the peasants. Many flaws have emerged. Second, there are 800,000 organized peasants in Guangdong, dispersed over more than sixty counties. However, there are less than twenty counties where we have branch organizations, and they have less than 600 members. This is why under the present circumstances the peasants have revealed their weaknesses and our party has been unable to lead them. If this situation continues, the peasant movement will be in grave danger. Ultimately, this danger will affect the party itself. Third, our party has been leading the Chinese peasantry to achieve economic liberation and then to gain its political liberation. If our party does not expand and becomes incapable of leading the peasant masses, the party will have failed in its mission. Therefore, now there is the need to develop our party in the countryside both in terms of theory and in practice.

b) Past mistakes and methods for correcting them.

Previously, when implementing our party's work in the countryside, we made many mistakes. First, the party's branch organization was placed inside each county's peasant association, with the result that [the peasant movement] became the movement of the executive committee of the county peasant association, instead of a mass movement. Second, previous criteria for admitting comrades into the party were far too harsh, even to the extent that comrades were admitted only on the condition that they must be ready to sacrifice the lives of their entire family. This is why ordinary comrades have become "unemployed" and had to become executive committee members in the county peasant associations, while peasants were afraid to join the party because, after hearing such harsh conditions, they thought they would have to put down their plows in order to join. Third, the branches did not call meetings; they hoped to hold meetings under the secret agency of the Communist Party. Unless they had a secret place, they would not hold a meeting. Thus, our comrades did not have the opportunity to receive party training which, in turn, hindered the party's development. Fourth, our inability to make use of good opportunities prevented us from linking up with our comrades scattered over the countryside.

If we want to correct these mistakes, we must:

i) Build our party's foundation on the township [xiang] peasant association. The township peasant association is the place where the peasants' efforts are most concentrated. This means that we should develop our party's organization among the township peasant associations.

ii) Convene regular full members' meetings of township peasant associations. This kind of meeting provides an excellent opportunity to train peasants; we can also recruit comrades during meetings.

iii) Learn to use opportunities provided by current events and recruit comrades when peasants conflict with landlords and during the high tide of the revolution. If necessary, we may appoint special personnel to organize special committees to take charge of such work.

iv) In the township or district [qu],⁹⁸ peasant associations or peasant clubs should be established. At times when farm work is slack, we should select peasants with whom we have close relations to attend lectures or discussions. This is also a way to recruit members.

v) When possible, each county peasant association may open training courses especially to train the progressive elements among the peasants. However, the number [of trainees] should not be too large; nor should the duration of the course be too long. We would rather run more courses, so as to find new comrades.

vi) When possible, each county peasant association should select its better members and, together with our capable comrades, organize visits to Canton. In this way, we can use the opportunity to assemble them in Canton for training. Such groups should be organized by county, but the area committee must be notified so that we can prepare for the training program.

vii) Peasant training classes, as decided on by the central committee for the peasant movement, should be established in the name of the provincial peasant association.

c) Responsibilities of the area committee.

In the past, as we did not have the personnel to train peasants, the scope of our party's activities was too large, local committees did not make any reports, and organization was very slack. Thus, the area committee was unable to give detailed directions. This greatly affected the party. In the future, the area committee must pay attention to this problem.

i) The area committee is to assemble capable comrades in each county in the provincial capital to organize training classes to nurture personnel to act as branch secretaries.

ii) The area committee is to dispatch on a regular basis seven capable comrades to inspect the peasant movement in the following seven big areas: the first comrade is to cover: Mei County, Chao, and Hailufeng; the second, Huizhou; the third, Xijiang; the fourth, Beijiang; the fifth, the south; the sixth, the center; the seventh,

Hainan Island. In addition, they should inspect peasant strength and urge comrades to work hard and improve party affairs.

iii) Within a certain period, the area committee should regulate the number of new comrades to be recruited by each county. It should urge recruitment while providing [the counties] with good methods for doing so. Those who fail to fulfill their tasks should be penalized.

iv) Leadership to be provided by area committees. On the one hand, the area committee should make plans for recruitment among our peasant comrades and, on the other, make plans for recruiting from among rural artisans, students, and women, thus avoiding adversely affecting the comprehensive expansion of the party in the countryside and concentrating too much on peasants.

2) How Our Comrades Should Work in the Peasant Movement

a) Specifying the work for our comrades.

i) The special-assignment comrades who are sent by the GMD and are in exclusive charge of the peasant movement and comrades in our party's organizations in each locality who also work in the peasant movement should always publicly use the name of the GMD party departments at each level. Also, on occasion they may use the position of special propagandist in the peasant association while concurrently being CP or CYL members. They are frequently confused and make many mistakes. Some use the authority of the special officials sent by the GMD's central peasant department to command everything. The special officials treat the peasant associations as their appendages and agencies. Of course, sometimes our comrades have to use the name of the GMD Center to crush reactionary elements. However, this has gradually become a custom, and the peasants only look to the special officials and neglect their own peasant associations. Sometimes peasant associations are also administered by comrades from individual levels of the GMD's party departments, and thus the work of the peasant associations naturally merges with that of the GMD party departments. Obviously this confuses the GMD party departments with the peasant associations. This renders the peasants unable to distinguish their own associations from the GMD—this is incomprehensible. Some special officials are also employees of the peasant associations and never distinguish their affinities or functions. They use the title of special official or that of the peasant associations at will to issue commands to the peasantry. Thus, the peasants see one person doing two functions and they are left completely at a loss. Some comrades get so excited that they publicly make speeches as CP or youth league representatives regardless of their surroundings. By doing this, they sometimes provide the reactionaries with materials that they can use to agitate. Sometimes, because of certain mistakes or lack of verbal skills, they make peasants suspicious or even make fools of themselves. The most obvious and mistaken instance is the Shunzhi incident in which comrades used the name of the GMD county department to order the peasant self-defense corps to beat to death the local despot, Tan Shier. This caused great problems both in terms of organization and practical work. From now on we should make all comrades who work in the peasant movement understand: (1) the fundamental difference between our party and league's organizations and those of the GMD and the peasant associations; (2) the respective roles of the party organization and people's organizations; (3) the political tasks of individual parties and the responsibilities of the peasant associations; (4) the significance of the peasant movement within which our comrades are working. In persuading our comrades, they must understand the relationship between the individual and the group. In particular, we must make it clear to our comrades that without permission from superior agencies of the party or league, no one is allowed to make a speech as a party or league representative.

ii) In reality, previous work by our comrades has been cursory and superficial. They were unable to get into close contact with the masses, let alone lead them. The best example was the intentional disturbances created by the representatives from the Qujiang County Peasant Association at the second provincial conference of peasant representatives. In the future, we should pay special attention to work at lower levels and underground work. Our comrades should rely on the township peasant associations as their base. If there is insufficient personnel, our base should be at least the district [qu]. Township and district associations should be asked to convene regular meetings of all peasants or their representatives. These meetings are very important. They are extremely useful practical training courses. The responsible comrades in each county must at all costs attend these meetings. We must do our best to turn the associations into mass organizations and prevent the infiltration of illegal, corrupt, and reactionary elements. Also, we should make sure that peasants represent the dominant force in these associations and let them take charge of them, thus avoiding the risk of the peasant movement coming under the total control of one leader and thus destroying it.

iii) In addition, we have carried out too little investigation. For a variety of reasons, we need to find out about the peasants' living conditions and of those who have contacts with the peasantry such as students, workers, and ordinary people. We need to find out the relationship of the local garrisons, government officials and employees, the gentry, local tyrants, landlords, and the civil corps with the peasantry in economic, political, and educational terms. We only have the very vaguest idea about the relationship between secret societies such as the Big Sword Society, bandits, the Triads, and the peasantry, as well as the customs, languages, and habits of the peasants. If we fail to investigate thoroughly the above questions, it is likely that (a) sometimes our propaganda will be irrelevant to the real situation with the result that the peasants will not know how to organize themselves; (b) sometimes our propaganda will raise overly ambitious slogans that provoke attacks from our enemy, or push those who are not yet reactionaries into becoming reactionaries; (c) sometimes our propaganda will evoke taboos of this feudal society and cause unnecessary hostility to us, thus obstructing our work. In the future, we should direct our comrades to pay attention to investigative work in the countryside and devise survey forms so that our comrades may systematically carry out such work. At a minimum, we must carry out an investigation on one particular subject.

iv) In the past, our comrades treated the organization of peasant associations with too much rigidity and only wanted to establish township or district peasant associations in accordance with the constitution [of the peasant association] and the number of peasants. Although initially they performed necessary procedures such as the opening speech, lectures, presentation of the flag and the seal, and a report on the process of establishing the association, within a few days of the association's coming into existence, there were internal conflicts or, because of the small number of members, they were prone to external oppression, which the new association was unable to resist, thus collapsing immediately. On occasion, before our propaganda began to take effect, we ordered [peasants] to form peasant associations and thus turned the association's opening day into the eve of its collapse. This is why, in the future, we must tell our comrades to be creative in using the constitution [of peasant associations], adapt to the countryside's reality, and continue to follow organizational procedures issued by our organizational agencies and the Guangdong Peasant Association.

v) Previous work by our comrades focused on the peasant association movement and certainly not the Chinese peasant movement, which is characterized by class [struggle] and national [struggle]. This is why: (a) our comrades did not know about the current living conditions of the peasantry or their needs that must be satisfied. In general, they failed to pay attention to how to fight for these demands. Thus, the peasants were just asked to do something for us while getting nothing in return. This caused them disappointment. On occasion, our comrades instigated peasants to make demands for things that could not be obtained at present, thus causing much trouble, or even defeat. (b) Our comrades had no political common sense; nor did they understand the meaning of the revolution or class struggle. Often, they provoked peasants to fight against landlords even when they should not have done so. They just knew about overthrowing landlords, local despots, and the evil gentry, and even encouraged peasants to carry out assassinations, and knew nothing about the process and application of class struggle. (c) Our comrades did not understand the trends in the peasant movement or the tendencies in the nationalist movement. When Guangdong was unified, they did not know how to link up the peasant movement with the nationalist movement or how to make the peasant movement march together with the nationalist movement. In the future, we must make our comrades understand the Chinese peasant movement and its trends. They should try to cut out the negative elements and carry out propaganda for the peasants to avoid unnecessary struggles against the landlord class. On the one hand, they should pay attention to the life and needs of the peasants at present, and lead them to fight for their own interests while, on the other, they should expand and train peasant organizations and lead the peasants to participate in the nationalist movement to overthrow imperialists and warlords and to struggle for the Chinese revolution. We should show them the methods of revolution and the stages of the revolution. At the same time, to attain the above objectives, we should pay more attention to the role and significance of the united front of all classes, as well as to the means for its realization. During preparations for all kinds of commemorative meetings and demonstrations, the peasant associations should organize these events jointly with other social groups. They should not act alone. In all kinds of movements, our comrades must not show themselves as exceptionally capable or as seeking the limelight for themselves. They must look for the common interest of all social groups and form a united front of all classes based on such common interest. An example of this type of united front is the joint efforts by all social groups to exterminate banditry in Guangning. The peasant self-defense corps supplied labor power, merchants the money, workers the scouts, and students the propaganda. In each type of united front, the demands raised by peasants should not be too simplistic and should take into account the interests of other classes. At present, we still need to pay attention to the reform movement, such as positive enterprises in education and charity in the countryside. In general, the united front of all classes is not simply shouting a few slogans, but involves some real work among and alliance with artisans, small merchants, students, and women in villages. We must not lapse into our previous naïveté and shout the slogan of “down with capitalism” as soon as we see a small merchant. Only in this way, can we win the sympathy of other classes and give ourselves a good opportunity to expand. Similarly, only this will enable us to use the people’s organized strength in each social group to reform rural [social] organizations and destroy all types of feudal bases that obstruct the popular movement.

b) Training and leadership:

i) We may use changes in the political situation and unexpected incidents that happen among peasants to teach our comrades work methods so that they will get training through real actions.

ii) We should try to have personal talks with individual comrades. When comrades come to report to the peasant committee, we should ask them to report on the conditions of the peasant movement in their area, as well as giving them instructions on work methods.

iii) When individual comrades make mistakes, we must point out the source of the mistakes and the effect of such mistakes on the peasant movement. Also, we should educate them in party discipline and correct the mistakes they have committed, pointing out ways to remedy such mistakes. Such instances of educating our comrades should be used for reports and discussions in the branches, so that ordinary comrades can also receive party education.

iv) Short-term special training courses should be opened to provide party education. This would include giving reports on the political and economic situation in the world, China, and Guangdong, as well as on the trends in the peasant movement and the methods of handling it.

3) How to Deal with the Political Environment

[[a) Now we think the peasant movement is in great political danger and we must gain the understanding of the GMD-left and rally the peasants under the left’s flag.

(b) Many weaknesses have emerged in the peasant organizations, and even after Guangdong's unification, feudal organizations in the villages have not changed at all. We should make great efforts to establish a united front of all classes in the countryside. (c) The peasant self-defense corps was originally founded for defense against attacks by the landlords' armed forces, but their function is to support the existence of peasant associations rather than to attack landlords. (d) The civil corps is an armed force used by the landlord class to protect its own interests. We should disarm it and retrieve the public money that funds it.]]

e) In the past, we had three different sets of attitudes toward bandits: (i) adopt a cooperative attitude to those bandits who suffer oppression and who express sympathy with the peasant associations; (ii) try to establish links with bandits who have little to do with the peasant organizations so that they will not be used by landlords; (iii) attack well-established bandits and those who are connected with imperialists or any counterrevolutionary force. However, in our practical work, the bandits who cooperate with us are those who want to join the peasant associations, or who somehow have already joined the associations without anybody's knowledge. This is how peasant associations have bandits within, thus inviting attacks from those outside. The second type of bandit is interested only in profit. Even though we will do all we can to establish some ties with them, we cannot beat the money offered by the landlords. Frequently, such bandits are used by the landlords to attack peasant associations. The third type has been used by the reactionaries and has become the peasants' enemy. The reactionaries want to use bandits to destroy the people's organizations, thus creating political confusion. As a matter of principle, in dealing with the three types of bandit, on occasion we should restrain them while at other times we should improve their livelihood to convert them into good people. In reality, however, they all obstruct revolutionary actions and the development of peasant associations. Indeed, the peasant associations will not gain anything from them. Therefore, we deem it necessary to eliminate the bandits, especially those who have links with the imperialists and reactionaries. In every county, we should expand the people's security committees and occupy important positions in these committees. We should call for the organization of these committees so as to provide the GMD with a good method in its bandit-eradication campaign. This will prevent the peasants from incurring heavy losses during the bandit-eradication campaign. At the present time, we must pay attention to this.

4) How to Consolidate the Organization of Peasant Associations

The Guangdong Provincial Peasant Association is now in grave danger.

Since the 20 March coup [1926], the political environment has greatly deteriorated. The GMD-right has intensified its attacks on the peasant associations. Now, the reactionaries have taken control of the GMD CC and, in the future, will certainly attack the peasant movement.

Although the number of our association members has increased enormously, mere increase in control of territory will boost numbers without increasing the associations' work. This phenomenon can be said to be good, or very bad. The Provincial Peasant Association has now lost control over its subordinate associations, such as county peasant associations. Not only do they act independently but also they never submit a single report. Relations between the Provincial Peasant Association and the county associations have almost collapsed. The organization of individual county peasant associations is very insecure. If attacked they will be severely affected. There are no leaders in the counties; we cannot command the local masses.

Under these circumstances, it is extremely important to determine how to bring the peasant associations under our independent leadership, how we can lead them, and how we can secure their organizations and come to their rescue during a crisis. We resolve the following:

a) We must assume the leadership position among the peasants. All our deeds and thoughts should become examples for the peasants. We should become the [revolutionary] core among the masses. In any incident, we should stand at the forefront of the masses.

b) We must use the resolutions of the second peasants' congress [May 1926] to call on the peasantry to join peasant associations in order to expand the associations' organization and increase both the quantity and quality of the members.

c) Abide by the regulations of the associations to strengthen their internal unity.

d) Pay attention to the members' political training and hold more meetings. At each meeting, we should make a political report, read and explain the announcements of the superior associations and the articles in The Plow [Litou].⁹⁹ We should also discuss the content of the reports. The provincial association must be informed after each meeting.

e) Without relying on other political forces, the peasant associations must unify their organizations and strategies for long-term struggle. We must tell the peasants to get rid of their temporary fears, and we must stimulate their self-confidence.

f) There must be close communication between each level of the peasant associations.

g) We should make efforts to reform the peasants' thinking. Under feudalism, peasants have many natural weaknesses: regionalism, individualism, clanism, superstition, and inability to unite. None of these is a revolutionary trait; all of them must be reformed. The current situation in Guangdong provides the opportunity for such reform. However, we must still pay attention to technical aspects in case we arouse unnecessary opposition on this account.

h) Pay attention to women and youths in the countryside and gather them under the leadership of the peasant associations.

i) All reports must be absolutely true.

j) The strength of the local garrisons and the county magistrates must not be underestimated. They are capable of making trouble for us, and thus we should avoid unnecessary conflict and use some of the skills of diplomacy.

k) Try to divide the enemies and unite ourselves.

l) Peasants often lack self-confidence and have a blind faith in the gentry. We should take advantage of all kinds of opportunity to unmask the gentry and destroy its authority.

m) The peasant associations should be financially independent and cannot impose levies as the civil corps does. Such a practice is not allowed under the unified public finances of Guangdong.

n) Methods of preventing local tyrants and evil gentry from controlling the associations. Peasant associations should establish the difference between formal members and special members, as well as other rights and duties. (i) Those who use their own labor to till the land are formal members; the remainder are special members. (ii) Special members do not have voting rights; they are only representatives. (iii) The dues for special members are twice as much as those for formal members. (iv) The peasant association cannot protect the interests of special members when they are outside the association. (v) Those special members who have worked in the association for many years and achieved good results may be authorized by the provincial association to become formal members. This will make local tyrants and evil gentry see that joining the peasant association will not bring any benefits, but will cost them more in membership dues. Of course, they will not join. This strategy has to be passed by the third peasant congress. At present, we should propagate this among the peasants in order to prepare them.

o) Methods for persuading members to pay monthly dues. On the one hand, we should estimate expenses, make a budget, and announce new plans while, on the other, the provincial association should issue a simple pamphlet for members on what they should know about joining the association.

p) Methods to prevent employees of the association from becoming jobless. Those who work in the county and area peasant association executive committees should not work on the land at the same time. After being defeated in elections, they do not want to return to work on the land and often become unemployed and then join the bandits. To avoid unemployment, we must sternly order them to return to work on the land.

q) Methods for monitoring members. The provincial peasant association should have identical membership cards with serial numbers for members in the province. Special members and formal members should have different membership cards.

r) Propaganda should be done so that peasant resistance against landlords does not interfere in administration. Heavy attacks on peasant association interference in administration [of the government] have come from forces outside. Of course, the peasant associations must challenge the landlords on many issues; such conflicts are not sanctioned by law. However, many things done by landlords are not allowed by the government. Imposition of all kinds of levies on peasants is not sanctioned by law. Landlords often use their political forces within the village to oppress the peasants; they arrest, lynch, torture, parade them, and even bring them to trial and punish them. All these things are also interference in [government] administration. This kind of propaganda can be carried out by printing small pamphlets within the party and distributing them outside. This will also raise the peasants' class consciousness. On the other hand, this will let the outsiders know that such events are the inevitable result of conflicts between peasants and landlords. It is something which the peasants are forced to do to resist the landlords.

5) Education and Propaganda

a) We have only about 400 party members among the peasant masses, yet the peasant association members number more than 600,000. It seems that we are faced with a crisis. Moreover, there are only about ten people directing the work. This presents a great problem in terms of labor power. Therefore, it is urgent that we now train dozens of leading personnel. We should select twenty to thirty people from the countryside, who are both capable and trusted by the peasants, to undergo intensive training for a month or two in the essential knowledge and work methods a party member must know. On graduation, they should be distributed over the counties to take charge of the party's internal work and to train and recruit party members in each individual area.

b) "Peasant hostels" should be established by the peasant associations to accommodate peasants coming to the provincial capital from distant counties. Opportunities should be taken to promote them. Apart from providing room and board, they should have clubs, reading rooms, and other recreational equipment to attract interest.

6) Publishing

[[At present, there are three publications for the peasantry. The Plow, published by the provincial peasant association; The Chinese Peasant [Zhongguo nongmin]¹⁰⁰ and Peasant Friends [Nongyou], both published by the central peasant department of the GMD.]]

Now let us describe separately the reasons for, and methods of, opening peasant training courses:

Reasons: the area covered by peasant association organizations in Guangdong includes sixty-six counties and no fewer than 800,000 people. If our comrades responsible for the activities in this area are divided into seven separate groups in seven large regions (or seven missions), each mission, on average, will have five people. Thus, the total number will only be thirty-five. However, the peasant associations have over 50,000 basic organizations. Therefore, these thirty-five leading figures cannot deal with the different kinds of incidents that may crop up unexpectedly. As for the lower-level cadres, the danger is even greater. Even if we add up all the peasant comrades who are now working in the countryside, the number is no more than 800, which is insufficient to cover the area peasant associations that serve as the basic unit. Thus, to recruit more rural comrades in order to expand the party's organization and train cadres for the district [qu] peasant associations, there is an urgent need to establish peasant training courses. This resolution was passed by the Guangdong area within the last six months and is considered an excellent resolution. Unfortunately, it could not be implemented because of lack of financial resources.

Methods: first, select important or problem counties. The first class should enroll students from the ten counties close to Canton, thirty peasants from each county. Each course should last one month. Six months of courses are planned (or six separate courses). Calculated on the basis of the number of counties which have peasant associations now, 1,800 personnel can be trained within six months.

Three to five [party] comrades will be appointed to divide the thirty people from each county into small groups and to provide them with training. It has been decided that all thirty must be recruited into the party within one month. Even if not all of them can become members of our party, at least one-third must [join]. In this way, we can recruit 1,800 comrades within six months; they will be distributed almost all over the province. The results will be amazing indeed. If these 1,800 comrades are spread over all sixty-six counties and begin work there [in expanding the party in a similar way], party organizations in each county will be more consolidated, and the results will be even more surprising.

Training methods should resemble those used in the Peasant Movement Training Institute,¹⁰¹ although the subjects should be easier and more practical. Only our comrades with work experience will be appointed as teachers, although we may ask the leftists in the GMD to be teachers. This should be done when it is considered diplomatically necessary.

B.19 Resolution on Shanghai's Work Plan (July 1926)¹⁰²

Shanghai is the economic headquarters of the imperialist aggression against China. It is also China's major industrial center. Shanghai is the heart of the country's anti-imperialist movement within the national liberation movement. In terms of our party, a genuine CP can be created here.

Since the May 30 Movement, Shanghai has indeed been a revolutionary city. Although the imperialists' police departments, the Chinese official security forces, and the class of big businessmen and compradores have either jointly or individually attacked the Shanghai people, the Shanghai people continue to be increasingly revolutionized. This point is proved by the medium and small merchants' movement against the harsh levies and multiple taxes that have been imposed during the last few months in Shanghai, the primitive uprisings against inflation by ordinary citizens, and the massive economic strikes by Shanghai workers.

Now class divisions in Shanghai are clearly visible. The class of big merchants and compradores is counterrevolutionary; workers, artisans, students, and ordinary citizens are revolutionary. Although medium and small merchants have expressed revolutionary sentiments, they have not been able to escape the influence of the class of big businessmen and compradores and join the mainstream of the revolution. This fact shows that the bourgeoisie has gradually revealed its concern with and actions for national independence.

Although the Shanghai area committee paid attention to local political struggles in the past, these struggles failed to penetrate society. At present, it is difficult to say whether they can influence the medium and small merchants as well as ordinary citizens in Shanghai. From now on, the Shanghai area committee should pay special attention to the local political movement. It must realize that we—a proletarian political party—must lead the revolutionary movement in Shanghai and increasingly revolutionize the city. Only by winning over the masses of the middle and petty bourgeoisie (particularly the petty bourgeois masses) can we prevent Shanghai from falling into the hands of the imperialists.

The Shanghai area committee should raise the common demands of the Shanghai people—the political program of the Shanghai citizens' movement—so that ordinary citizens in Shanghai will not consider us a mortal danger. Instead, we hope that they will regard us as representing the interests of workers and other oppressed people. In line with the spirit of this political program, we should establish a united front of the revolutionary masses. First, we must bring them under the influence of our ideas and then ensure that their actions take place under our leadership. Our area committee's political actions should rely on the proletarian forces as their core on every local issue when guiding ordinary citizens in the struggles against the local Shanghai government (the works department, the harbor police, and the Nanjing government). We should strike at them continuously and expose the crimes of betraying our country committed by the compradores and evil gentry who control the so-called people-mandated institutions. We must also point out that it is daydreaming to hope that compromise with bourgeois politicians will bring about peace.

The Shanghai Chamber of Commerce should become an organization for medium and small merchants; it should not come under the influence of the big bourgeoisie; nor should it allow ordinary shop clerks (except shop clerks in big companies) to join because the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce is an agency which will attract and gradually revolutionize medium and small merchants. Our party should influence the medium and small merchants in Shanghai through the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce and other organizations.

At present, work inside the GMD is particularly important. In reality, medium and small merchants, the progressive gentry, university professors, students, artisans, and free professionals are all GMD masses. In the past, because the Shanghai special party department [of the GMD] was run entirely by us, and also because ordinary comrades did not understand GMD work in Shanghai, it meant that not only has the GMD failed to develop but also that the impression has been created among ordinary people that the Shanghai special party department equals the CP. This has caused a great loss to the revolutionary movement in Shanghai. In the future, we must turn the GMD into a mass party; work in the GMD should be turned over to the GMD-left. Before the left has been formed in the GMD, the Shanghai area committee should come up with all kinds of methods to help its formation (for example, we may occupy a minority position in the executive committee of the Shanghai special party department, thus enabling the left to join the department). Since the end of the May 30 Movement last year, the Shanghai student movement has remained divided because of the fear-mongering by the statists and the Society for the Study of Sun Wenism [Yat-senism].¹⁰³ The Shanghai area committee was able to lead itself and the masses of the GMD-left and avoid internal division. This was the result of applying united front methods. From now on the Shanghai area committee should particularly emphasize continual use of the united front and call for the unification of the student movement, as well as raising the slogan that students should fight for freedom, etc., so that the student movement will not split internally. The chief enemies inside the Shanghai student movement are, of course, the Shanghai Federation of Comrades from All Universities and the Shanghai Union of Comrades for All College Students, which are controlled by Guo Renyuan and Zhu Jingnong. Their thinking and slogans—"study to save our country," "cooperation between teachers and students"—suit the psychology of the average backward and reactionary intellectuals, with the result that they comprise the general assembly of reactionary intellectuals from all factions. In the future, the Shanghai area committee should guide the student masses in Shanghai to compete with them for the leading position in the Shanghai student movement.

Although the organizational work of the Shanghai area committee has become quite strict lately, it remains slack. In the future, we must make each party member take part in the life of the party, and party publications must find their way to the masses both in and outside the party. In the various levels of party departments in Shanghai, such as divisional committees [buwei] and branches [zhibu], they may experiment with an initial kind of democracy. This is to say that of the members of divisional committees, some may be appointed by the area committee and some elected by representatives of the divisional committees; branch secretaries are still to be appointed by the divisional or area committees, while the executive secretary of the branch is elected by the full meeting of the branch or the meeting of branch representatives. In terms of the expansion of party members, in big branches attention should be paid to improving the quality of party members; in smaller branches attention should be paid to expansion of numbers. At the same time, in factories attention should be paid to the development of cells in each workshop. Perfecting the branch secretariat [zhibu de ganshihui] will make the branch the nucleus of the masses in the factory. Concerning organization, this is the most important work for the Shanghai area committee. From now on, the Shanghai area committee should directly train branch secretaries [zhibu de shuji] and then branch executive secretaries [zhibu de ganshi].

It is also an urgent matter to develop branches in the city, because only after neighborhood branches have been developed can we claim to have a nucleus among the petty bourgeois masses.

Although the workers' movement in Shanghai has achieved excellent results recently, and although the Shanghai General Labor Union has insuperable authority among all the workers, workers' organizations in each industry and those of the artisans have not truly become mass organizations. Moreover, because of connections with the secret societies, it was discovered recently that the danger exists that the party and labor unions cannot command the workers. In the future, the workers' movement in Shanghai should: (1) turn the workers' organizations in each industry and the artisans' organizations into true mass groups and make the Shanghai General Labor Union the true leader of the masses; (2) consolidate the labor union organizations that already have some basis so as to prevent workers from starting premature unguided uprisings, and correct the mistake of total control of labor unions by a few leaders without mass following; (3) pay attention to the development and expansion of the organizations of sailors, railway workers, postmen, trolley and telephone workers, and dock workers; (4) raise general demands based on the economic miseries of the Shanghai workers in order to make society at large really understand the workers' hardships and then express sympathy with various actions by the workers, such as strikes; (5) use all kinds of opportunities to work openly in the labor union movement to gain a fait-accompli social status for the labor union; (6) do our best to prevent the emergence of the secret societies [in labor unions] from causing internal splits among workers; we should regularly send people to all kinds of secret societies (Green and Red Gangs, etc.) to use their connections to secure our organizations and defend them against outsiders who want to sabotage our forces; (7) pay attention to consolidating the workers' picket groups in each district in order to deter harassment by hoodlums and traitors; (8) pay attention to the organizations of artisans and shop clerks and eliminate the forces and influence of the yellow labor unions in the handicrafts industry; and (9) pay attention to training personnel to become lower-level cadres.

Propaganda work in Shanghai is particularly important. It is true to say that, in the past, the Shanghai area committee did not regularly engage in propaganda work. It only carried out occasional political agitation. In the future, we must strengthen the Shanghai area committee's propaganda department. The Shanghai area committee should also publish a weekly magazine to strike at, and respond to, all kinds of reactionary thinking. It should also demonstrate to the Shanghai people revolutionary solutions based on the actual circumstances of the people in Shanghai. It is not necessary to issue regular leaflets and pamphlets on particular political issues or ideological struggles.

The Shanghai comrades have such a low level of party culture that from now on, the area committee should pay attention to raising their level of party culture. The area committee should establish party schools and publications; each divisional committee should set up senior or junior training courses and call more meetings of active elements and establish various kinds of temporary committees. These are all methods we should adopt.

B.20 Report on an Investigation of the Peasant Movement in Hunan. Mao Zedong
(28 March 1927)¹⁰⁴

I. Rural Revolution

1) The Seriousness of the Peasant Problem

On a thirty-two-day (4 January to 5 February 1927) inspection tour of the five counties [xian] of Hunan—Xiangtan, Xiangxiang, Hengshan, Liling, and Changsha—I have collected a considerable amount of materials by listening carefully to reports made by experienced peasants and comrades in the peasant movement at fact-finding meetings held both in county seats and villages. Many aspects of the peasant movement directly contradict what we have learned from the gentry in Hankou and Changsha. Some unique incidents have never been seen or heard before. I think that such conditions also prevail in other provinces; thus various arguments against the peasant movement must be controverted immediately, and the erroneous decisions of the revolutionary regime [the Wuhan government] concerning the peasant movement must be quickly corrected. Only thus can the revolution benefit in the future. The further development of the peasant movement is a tremendous problem. Within a short time, hundreds of millions of peasants will rise in central, south, and north China with the fury of a hurricane; no force, no matter how strong, can restrain them. They will break all the shackles that bind them and rush toward the road of liberation. All imperialists, warlords, corrupt officials, and bad gentry will meet their doom at the hands of the peasants. All revolutionary parties and comrades will be judged by them. Are we to get in front of them and lead them or criticize them behind their backs or fight them from the opposite camp? Among these three alternatives every Chinese can choose freely, but the current situation demands a quick decision. The following are the results of my investigations, and my opinions are presented in detail for reference by revolutionary comrades.

2) Let's Organize!

[[The development of the Hunan peasant movement is divided into two phases. January–September 1926 was a phase of organization, membership of peasant associations did not exceed 300,000 or 400,000, and the masses under their direct command totaled just over one million. October 1926–January 1927 was a phase of revolution. Association membership jumped to 2 million with 10 million directly under their influence. About half of Hunan's peasants had been organized. After organizing themselves extensively, the peasants began to take action; within four months, an unprecedented rural revolution broke out.]]

3) Down with the Local Tyrants and Evil Gentry! All Power Belongs to the Peasant Associations!

After the peasants organized themselves, action ensued. The major targets of their attack were the local tyrants, the evil gentry, and the lawless landlords, as well as the old patriarchal ideology, corruption of city officials, and undesirable village customs. This attack was like a hurricane: only those who bent to this force could survive. As a result, privileges of the feudal landlord class, thousands of years old, were totally swept away. Their prestige and prerogatives were altogether abolished. After the overthrow of the gentry's power, the peasant associations became the only organs of power, and [the slogan] "all power to the peasant associations" became literally true. Even such trifles as quarrels between married couples were referred to the peasant associations for settlement. No problem could be solved independently of peasant association membership, whose every word passed for a command. In the villages the peasant associations became the authority for everything, [seeing to it that] "whatever was promised was done." Outsiders could only comment favorably, not critically, on the peasant associations. Local tyrants, evil gentry, and lawless landlords were deprived of their right to speak, and none dared to voice objections. Under the peasant association regime, the top local tyrants fled to Shanghai; the second layer fled to Hankou; the third layer to Changsha, and the fourth layer to the county seats, while the small fry of the fifth layer and below surrendered to the peasant associations in the villages.

[[Many of the middle and small landlords and rich and middle peasants who had previously vehemently opposed the peasant associations now tried everything in their power to become members.]]

4) Very Bad or Very Good

The peasant revolt in the countryside awakened the gentry from its sweet dreams. When the news reached the cities from the countryside, the urban gentry protested tumultuously. After arriving in Changsha, I met people from different backgrounds and heard much gossip. From the middle social strata up to the GMD-right, the general comment was "very bad." Even some revolutionary[-minded] people did not object to this comment, especially when they used their imagination as to the conditions in the countryside. Some progressive elements only remarked apologetically: "Though this is bad, it is inevitable during the process of revolution." All in all, nobody entirely denied the epithet "bad." But as pointed out previously, it is actually the rising up of the vast peasant masses to accomplish their historic mission; it is the rising up of the democratic forces in the countryside to overthrow the feudal forces in the villages, which is the true goal of the national revolution. Sun Yat-sen devoted forty years to the national revolution; what he wanted but failed to achieve has been accomplished by the peasants in a few months. The patriarchal, feudal local tyrants and evil gentry, together with the lawless landlords, were not only the foundation of the dictatorial regime of the past several thousand years, [but also] the tools of the imperialists, warlords, and corrupt officials. This is a great achievement unprecedented in the past forty years or several thousand years. This is “very good”—not in the least “bad,” and not at all “very bad.” To give credit where it is due, if we allot ten points to the accomplishments of the democratic revolution, then the achievements of the urban dwellers and the military units rate only three points, while the remaining seven points should go to the peasants in their rural revolution. The comment “very bad” is obviously an argument to serve the interests of the landlords and crush the peasants: it is obviously an argument of the landlord class, which tries to preserve the old feudal order by obstructing the establishment of a new democratic order: it is obviously a counterrevolutionary argument. No revolutionary comrade should blindly repeat such remarks. If you are a person of firm revolutionary ideology and visit the countryside, you will experience a satisfaction never experienced before; tens of thousands of slaves—the peasants—are overthrowing their rapacious enemy. The reaction of the peasants is entirely correct; their action is “very good!” “Very good” is a slogan of the peasants and other revolutionary groups. All revolutionary comrades should realize that the national revolution requires a tremendous change in the villages. The 1911 Revolution did not bring about such a change, and thus it failed; now there is such a change, and it is one of the major factors in the accomplishment of the revolution. Every revolutionary comrade should support this movement; otherwise he or she is against the revolution.

5) The Problem of “Excesses”

Another group of people say: “Peasant associations should be organized, but their actions are excessive.” This is the argument of the middle-of-the-road group. But what is the actual situation? The peasants in the villages have indeed been “disorderly.” The power of the peasant associations being supreme, the landlords have been prohibited from speaking up, and their prestige is wiped out. This is like stepping on the landlord after striking him down. The phrase “All landowners are tyrants and all gentry are bad” is coined. In some places those who owned fifty mu of land or more were immediately called local tyrants, and those who wore long gowns were all branded as evil gentry. Their “names being recorded in the subsidiary census,” local tyrants and evil gentry were fined, required to make contributions, and had their sedan chairs smashed. Some people forced their way into the homes of local tyrants and evil gentry who were hostile to the peasant association and killed their pigs and commandeered their grain. The ivory beds of the daughters and daughters-in-law of the local tyrants and evil gentry were stepped on by the dirty feet of the peasants. On the slightest provocation men were paraded down the streets, wearing tall paper hats. “Vile gentry! Now comes our day!” Actions were unrestrained; things were turned upside down, and terror swept some of the villages. This is what some people called “excesses,” “going to the other extreme,” or “unspeakable.” This kind of comment appears superficially correct, but it is erroneous.

First, the above-mentioned incidents were the results of oppression by the local tyrants, evil gentry, and lawless landlords, who bore down on the peasants with their power and privileges. Thus, [the peasants’] tumultuous resistance is only a reaction. Their resistance is more intensive and disorderly where local tyrants, evil gentry, and lawless landlords have wreaked the worst damage. The peasants’ eyes see clearly. Who is bad and who is not bad; who should be punished most severely and who should be punished lightly: the peasants judge this most clearly; only very seldom do they hand out undeserved verdicts. So even Mr. Tang Mengxiao¹⁰⁵ once said: “When the peasants attacked the local tyrants and evil gentry in the villages, they were right in nine out of ten cases.”

Second, revolution is not a dinner party, or literary composition, or painting, or embroidering. It cannot be done so delicately, so gentlemanly, and so “gently, kindly, politely, plainly, and modestly.”¹⁰⁶ Revolution is insurrection, the violent action of one class overthrowing the power of another. A rural revolution is a revolution by the peasantry to overthrow the power of the feudal landlord class. If the peasants do not apply great force, the power of the landlords, consolidated over thousands of years, can never be uprooted. There must be a revolutionary tidal wave in the countryside in order to mobilize tens of thousands of peasants and weld them into this great force. The excesses described above result from the tremendous revolutionary enthusiasm of the peasants. In the second [revolutionary] stage of the peasant movement, such acts are very necessary. In this second stage, an absolute peasant power must be established, and no criticism of the peasant association should be allowed; the gentry’s power must be totally liquidated, the gentry knocked down, even trampled on. All excesses in the second stage have a revolutionary significance. Every village should be in a state of terror for a brief period; otherwise, counterrevolutionary activities in the villages cannot be suppressed, and the gentry’s power cannot be overthrown. To correct wrongs one must go to the other extreme, without which they cannot be righted. The argument of this group [against peasant “excesses”] appears superficially different from that of the former group; but in reality it is based on the same viewpoint, being an argument for the interests of the privileged landlord class. This kind of argument retards the development of the peasant movement and serves to sabotage the revolution. We must oppose it firmly.

II. The Vanguard of the Revolution

1) The Movement of the “Riffraff”

The GMD-right claims: “The peasant movement is a movement of riffraff, a movement of peasant loafers.” This argument was widely circulated in Changsha. When I visited the villages, the gentry told me: “Peasant associations are all right, but their present leadership is unacceptable and should be replaced.” This comment has the same meaning as that of the [GMD-]right, namely, that the peasant movement is all right (it being already in existence, no one dares to say otherwise), but that the present leaders of the peasant movement are not all right, especially those in the lower units, all of whom are allegedly riffraff who used to go around in worn-out shoes, carry broken umbrellas, wear blue gowns, and gamble. In brief, all those who used to be despised and trodden down by the gentry, who had no social standing, and were deprived of their right to speak are now raising their heads. They are not only raising their heads, but are holding power in their hands. They have become kings of the village peasant associations (the lowest unit of the peasant associations), which they have turned into deadly weapons. They put their muscular, sun-burned hands on the heads of the gentry. They bind the gentry with ropes, put tall paper hats on them, and parade them through the villages. Their crude curses are heard every day by the gentry. They give orders to all, standing above all, where previously they stood below. Hence this is called “abnormal.”

2) Revolutionary Vanguard or Revolutionary Heroes

[[The peasants have fulfilled the major task in the national revolution, but the peasantry itself is divided into three: the rich, the middle, and the poor peasants. They have different perceptions of the revolution. Rich peasants have cash and grain surpluses. Initially they were not interested in joining the peasant associations, and it was only when they began to feel perturbed that they sought to join. Yet even after joining, they did not work enthusiastically for the associations but remained passive. Middle peasants have no surplus cash or grain, or debts, but barely maintain a living. They adopted a wavering attitude, thinking that they would not benefit much from the revolution. As peasant association members, they are better than the rich peasants, but rarely become active.]]

Only one group in the countryside has fought hard and relentlessly from the very start: the poor peasants. Out of the secret stage into the open stage, it was they who fought, who organized, and who did the revolutionary work. They alone were the deadly enemies of the local tyrants and evil gentry, whose bastions they attacked unreservedly. They alone were capable of doing the destructive work. They asked the rich and middle peasants: “We joined the peasant association long ago; why do you hesitate?” The rich and middle peasants answered sarcastically: “You have not a single tile above you, nor a needle-sized [strip of] land beneath you—naturally you joined the peasant association!”

It is true that the poor peasants have nothing to lose. They are the outcasts or semioutcasts of the village, and some of them are literally “without a single tile above and without a strip of land below.” Why shouldn’t they join the peasant association? According to an investigation made at Changsha, poor peasants constituted 70 percent, middle peasants 20 percent, and rich peasants 10 percent of the peasantry. Poor peasants can be further classified as very poor and poor. The very poor—20 out of the total 70 percent—are entirely without occupation, having neither land nor capital; with nothing to live on, they have to become soldiers, or hired hands, or beggars, or bandits. The remaining 50 percent constitute the poor [peasants] who are partially without occupation, but who, although they have a little land or capital, it is not enough to meet their expenses. Thus, they suffer all year long—handicraft workers, tenants (except rich tenants), and owner-tenants. (The percentage of poor peasants may be less in other counties than Changsha, but the difference is slight.)

This multitudinous mass of poor peasants is the core of the peasant associations, the vanguard in the overthrowing of feudal forces, accomplishing the not-yet-accomplished revolutionary mission. Without the poor peasant class (in the words of the gentry: without the riffraff), no revolutionary conditions would exist as they do now in rural areas; and the local tyrants and evil gentry could never be overthrown to complete the democratic revolution. The poor peasants (especially the very poor) secured the leadership of the peasant associations because they were the most revolutionary. During the first and second stages [of the peasant movement], the chairs and committee members in the lowest units of the peasant associations (village associations) were almost entirely poor peasants. (In the village peasant associations of Hengshan, 50 percent of the cadres came from the very poor peasant class, 40 percent from the poor peasant class, and 10 percent from poor educated elements.) This leadership by the poor peasants is very essential. Without the poor peasants, there will be no revolution. To reject them is to reject the revolution; a blow at them is a blow at the revolution. Their revolutionary course is faultless from beginning to end. They have cost the local tyrants and evil gentry “face.” They have thrown the big and small local tyrants and bad gentry to the ground and trampled on them. Many “excesses” of theirs during the revolutionary period have been a revolutionary necessity.

Some county magistrates, county party [GMD] headquarters, and the peasant associations of certain counties in Hunan have already committed a number of errors. Some even dispatched soldiers to arrest the lower cadres of the peasant associations at the request of landlords. In the prisons of Hengshan and Xiangxiang counties, many chairs and committee members of the village peasant associations are imprisoned. This error is extremely grave. Unintentionally, it strengthens the position of the reactionaries. The mere fact that the lawless landlords rejoiced and that the reactionary atmosphere thickened when the chairs and committee members of the village peasant associations were arrested is sufficient to expose the mistaken nature [of the arrests]. We should oppose such counterrevolutionary slogans as “movement of riffraff” and “movement of peasant loafers,” while taking special care not to help the local tyrants and evil gentry (even unintentionally) by attacks on the leading class of the poor peasants. As a matter of fact, though some of the poor peasants have indeed been “gamblers without gainful occupation,” the majority of them have since reformed. They themselves now prohibit gambling and clean up banditry. Where the power of the peasant associations is strong, local gambling is completely prohibited and banditry disappears. In some localities, it is safe to leave articles unattended on the roadside and doors unlocked at night. According to [my] investigation in Hengshan, 85 percent of the poor peasant leaders are now reformed. Only 15 percent still retain some of their bad habits. These can only be called “a few undesirable elements,” but one should never imitate the slander of the local tyrants and evil gentry by branding them as “riffraff.” As regards these “few undesirable elements,” peasant association discipline should be improved by mass propaganda and individual training among them, under the slogan “strengthen the discipline of the peasant associations!” Indiscriminate arrests by soldiers, which cost the faith of the poor peasant class and strengthen the position of the local tyrants and evil gentry, should definitely be avoided. This point deserves the utmost attention.

III. The Peasantry and the Peasant Associations

[[In all, the peasantry under the leadership of the peasant associations have the fourteen following great achievements to their credit:

1) Organizing the Peasantry into Peasant Associations.

According to figures compiled by the provincial peasant association last November, in thirty-seven of the provinces' seventy-five counties, organizations had been set up with a total membership of 1,367,727. By the end of January, membership must have reached at least 2 million.

2) Dealing Political Blows to the Landlords

Once the peasants are organized, their first activity must be to smash the political prestige of the landlord class, especially of the local tyrants and evil gentry. This is the main struggle during the second period, the period of revolution. Without this, there can be no victory in the economic struggle. The following methods should be used to deal political blows to the landlords.

(a) Auditing of accounts to expose corrupt local tyrants and evil gentry; (b) imposing fines; (c) levying contributions; (d) minor protests against those who commit minor offenses against the peasant associations—the offender should write a pledge to desist from further criticism of the associations; (e) major demonstrations against enemies of the associations including demonstrating at their homes and slaughtering their pigs; (f) parading [landlords] through the villages in tall paper hats; (g) imprisonment in the county jail; (h) banishment; (i) shooting should be confined to the worst of the local tyrants and evil gentry and should be carried out by the peasants jointly with other segments of the people.

3) Dealing Economic Blows to the Landlords

a) Prohibition on sending grain out of the area, forcing up grain prices, or hoarding and cornering; (b) Prohibition on increasing rents and deposits, agitation for reduced rents and deposits; (c) prohibition on tenancy cancellation; (d) reduction of interest on loans.

4) Overthrowing the Feudal Politics of the Local Tyrants and Evil Gentry in the Countryside by Smashing the Old Organs of Rural Administration

5) Overthrowing the Armed Forces of the Landlords and Establishing Those of the Peasantry]]

6) Overthrowing the Political Power of the County Magistrate and His Bailiffs

Events in Haifeng, Guangdong Province, showed some time ago that a county government can only be cleaned up after the peasants rise up. Hunan has now provided additional proof. In a county ruled by local tyrants and evil gentry, the magistrate, no matter who he is, will invariably be corrupt. In a county where the peasantry has risen up, the government is invariably clean, whoever the magistrate may be. In the counties I visited, the magistrates had to consult the peasants on everything in advance. In counties where the peasant movement was very strong, the word of the peasant association worked miracles. If it demanded the arrest of a local tyrant or of a member of the evil gentry in the morning, the magistrate dared not delay till noon; if it demanded [arrest] by noon, he dared not delay till the afternoon. When the power of the peasantry was just beginning to make itself felt in the countryside, the magistrate allied himself with the local tyrants and evil gentry. When the peasantry's power matched that of the landlords, the magistrate tried to accommodate both sides, accepting some of the peasant associations' suggestions and rejecting others. The remark that "the word of the peasant association worked miracles" applied only when the power of the landlords had been completely destroyed by the peasantry. At present, the political situation in counties such as Xiangxiang, Xiangtan, Liling, and Hengshan is as follows:

i) All decisions are made by a joint council consisting of the magistrate and [representatives of] the revolutionary mass organizations. The council is convened by the magistrate and meets in his office. In some counties, it is called the "joint council of public bodies and the local government" [gong fa tuan lianxi huiyi], and in others the "council of county affairs" [xianwu huiyi]. Besides the magistrate himself, the people attending are representatives from the county peasant association, trade union council, merchant association, women's federation, school staff federation, county federation of students, and GMD county headquarters. At such council meetings the magistrate is influenced by the views of the public organizations and invariably "does their bidding." Thus, in Hunan, there is not the slightest problem in adopting a democratic committee system of county government; the present county governments are already quite democratic in both form and substance. This situation has been brought about only in the last two or three months, that is, since the peasantry has risen all over the countryside and overthrown the power of the local tyrants and evil gentry. Only after the magistrates saw their old props collapse and realized that they needed other props to retain their posts did they begin to curry favor with the mass organizations and did the situation change to that described above.

ii) The judicial assistant has no cases to handle. The judicial system in Hunan remains one in which the county magistrate is concurrently in charge of judicial affairs with an assistant to help him in handling cases. To get rich, the magistrate and his underlings used to rely entirely on “collecting taxes and levies, procuring men and provisions for the armed forces,” and “extorting money in civil and criminal lawsuits by confounding right and wrong,” this last being the most reliable source of income. In the last few months, with the downfall of the local tyrants and evil gentry, all the legal obfuscators have disappeared. What is more, peasant problems, big and small, now are all settled in the peasant associations at the various levels. Thus, the county judicial assistant simply has nothing to do. The [assistant] in Xiangxiang told me: “When there were no peasant associations, a daily average of sixty civil or criminal suits were brought to the county government; now with the arrival of the peasant associations it receives an average of only four or five a day.” Thus, the purses of the magistrates and their underlings remain empty.

iii) The armed guards, the police, and the bailiffs all keep out of the way and dare not go near the villages to carry out their extortions. In the past, the villagers feared the town dwellers; now the town dwellers and, in particular, the vicious curs kept by the county government—the police, the armed guards, and the bailiffs—fear the villagers. The latter are afraid to go to the villages, and if they do so, they no longer dare to engage in extortion. The mere sight of peasant spears makes them tremble.

7) Overthrowing the Clan Authority of the Elders and Ancestral Temples, the Religious Authority of Town and Village Gods, and the Masculine Authority of Husbands

A man in China is usually subjected to the domination of three systems of authority: (a) the state system (political authority), ranging from the national, provincial, and county government down to that of the township [xiang]; (b) the clan system (clan authority), ranging from the central and branch ancestral temples down to the household head; and (c) the system of gods and spirits (religious authority), ranging from the King of Hell down to the town and village gods, and from the Emperor of Heaven down to all kinds of gods and spirits. As to women, in addition to being subject to these three types of domination, they are subject also to male domination (the authority of the husband). These four types of authority—political, religious, clan, and male—are the embodiment of the whole feudal patriarchal system and ideology; they are the four great bonds that have bound the Chinese people, especially the peasantry. The way in which the peasantry has overthrown the political authority of the landlords in the countryside has been described above. The political authority of the landlords is the backbone of all the other systems of authority. Once this has been overthrown, clan authority, religious authority, and the authority of the husband all begin to waver. Where the peasant association is powerful, clan elders and administrators of temple funds no longer dare oppress those lower in the clan hierarchy or embezzle clan funds. The evil clan elders and administrators have been overthrown together with the local tyrants and evil gentry. No one dares practice any longer such corporal and capital punishments as flogging, drowning, and burying alive that used to be carried out in the ancestral temples. The old practice of barring women and poor people from the banquets in the ancestral temples has also been smashed. The women of Baiguo in Hengshan County gathered in force and flooded into the ancestral temple, planted their backsides in the seats, and joined in the eating and drinking, while the venerable clan bigwigs had no choice but to let them do as they pleased. At another place, where poor peasants had been banned from temple banquets, a group of them flocked in and ate and drank their fill, while the local tyrants and evil gentry and other long-gowned gentlemen all took to their heels in fright.

As the peasant movement develops, so religious authority everywhere totters. In many places, peasant associations have taken over the temples of the gods as their offices. Everywhere, the associations advocate the appropriation of temple property to maintain peasant schools and to defray association expenses, calling it "public revenue from superstition." Forbidding superstition and smashing idols have become quite the vogue in Liling County; in the northern districts the peasants have prohibited the incense-burning processions designed to propitiate the god of plagues. There were many idols in the temple at Fuboling in Lukou, but when the [GMD] district headquarters needed extra room, they were all piled up in a corner, big and small together, and not one peasant raised any objection. Since then, sacrifices to the gods, the performance of Daoist rites, and the offering of sacred lamps on the occasion of a death in the family have become infrequent. Because the initiative in this matter was taken by the chair of the peasant association, Sun Xiaoshan, he is very much hated by the local Daoist priests. In the Longfeng Nunnery in the North Third District, the peasants and primary school teachers chopped up the wooden idols to cook meat. Over thirty in the Dongfu Monastery in the South District were burned by students and peasants acting together, and only two small images of Lord Bao were snatched up by an old peasant who said: "Do not commit a sin!"

Everywhere, it has been the case that only the older peasants and the women believed in the gods; the youths and middle-aged peasants did not. As it is these latter who control the peasant associations, the overthrow of religious authority and the eradication of superstition are happening everywhere. As to the authority of the husband, this has always been weaker among the poor peasants because, out of economic necessity, their women have to do more manual labor than the women of the more prosperous classes. Therefore, they have more say and greater decision-making power in family matters. Sexually, they also enjoy relative freedom. In the countryside, triangular and even more complicated relationships are almost universal among the poor peasant class. With the increasing bankruptcy of the rural economy in recent years, the basis for male domination has already been weakened. Now, with the recent rise of the peasant movement, in many places, women have begun to organize rural women's federations. They now have the opportunity to raise their heads, and the husband's authority is getting shakier day by day. Essentially, the whole feudal patriarchal ideological system is wavering with the growth of the peasantry's power. However, up to and including the present time, the peasantry has concentrated on destroying the political authority of the landlords. Wherever this authority has been completely destroyed, the peasants are beginning to press the attack in the other three domains of clan, religious, and male domination. But these attacks are only just beginning, and the thorough overthrow of all three must await a complete victory by the peasants in the economic struggle. Therefore, our present task is to lead the peasants to put their greatest efforts into the political struggle, so that the landlords' authority can be entirely overthrown. The economic struggle should then follow immediately, so that economic problems of the peasantry can be fundamentally solved. As for the destruction of the clan system, superstition, and a one-sided concept of chastity and fidelity, this will follow as a natural consequence of the political and economic struggle. If too much of an effort is made, stubbornly and hardheadedly, to destroy these things, then the local tyrants and evil gentry will certainly seize on the pretext to put forth such slogans as "the peasant association has no piety toward ancestors," "the peasant association is blasphemous and destroys religion," and "the peasant association stands for the communitization of wives." Recent events in Xiangxiang, Hunan, and in Yangxin, Hubei, where the landlords exploited peasant opposition to the smashing of idols, are cases in point. It is the peasants who made the idols, and when the time comes they will cast the idols aside with their own hands; there is no need for anyone else to do it for them prematurely. Our propaganda policy in these matters is "Draw the bow without shooting, just indicate the motions." It is for the peasants themselves to cast aside the idols, smash the ancestral tablets, and pull down the temples to martyred virgins and the arches to chaste and faithful widows.

While in the countryside, I did some propaganda against peasant superstition. I said: "If you believe in the eight characters, you hope for good luck; if you believe in geomancy, you hope to benefit from the location of your ancestral graves."¹⁰⁷ This year, within a few months, the local tyrants, evil gentry, and corrupt officials have all been toppled from their pedestals. You don't mean to say that until a few months ago they all had good luck and benefited from well-situated ancestral graves, while suddenly in the last few months their luck has turned and their ancestral graves have ceased to exert a beneficial influence? The local tyrants and evil gentry jeer at your peasant association and say: 'How strange! Today the world is a world of committeemen. Look, you can't even piss without bumping into a committeeman!' Quite true, the towns and the villages, the peasant associations and the trade unions, the GMD and the CCP, all without exception have their executive committee members—it is indeed a world of committeemen. But is this due to the eight characters and ancestral graves? How strange! The eight characters of all the poor wretches in the countryside have suddenly turned auspicious! And their ancestral graves have suddenly started exerting beneficial influences! The gods? They are worthy of all respect and worship. But if you only had Lord Guan and the Goddess of Mercy and no peasant association, could you have overthrown the local tyrants and evil gentry? These ‘gods’ and ‘goddesses’ are indeed miserable objects. You’ve worshiped them for thousands of years, and they’ve never yet overthrown a single one of the local tyrants or evil gentry for you! Now you want to have your rent reduced. Let me ask, how will you go about it? Will you believe in the gods or in the peasant association?”

My words made the peasants roar with laughter; and in their laughter I thought I could discern the figures of the gods fleeing into nothingness.

13) The Cooperative Movement

The peasants really need cooperatives, and especially purchasing, marketing, and credit cooperatives. When the peasants buy goods, the merchants exploit them; when they sell their farm produce, the merchants force the prices down; and when they borrow money or rice, they are fleeced by the usurers; they desperately need to find a solution to these three problems. During the fighting in the Yangtze valley last winter, when trade routes were cut and the price of salt went up in Hunan, many peasants organized cooperatives to purchase salt. When the landlords deliberately stopped lending, there were attempts by the peasants to organize credit agencies, because they needed to borrow money. The major problem is the absence of detailed, standard rules of organization. As these spontaneously organized peasant cooperatives often fail to conform to cooperative principles, comrades working among the peasants are always eagerly inquiring about “rules and regulations.” Given proper guidance, the cooperative movement can spread everywhere along with the growth of the peasant associations. As the term hezuo is too unfamiliar for the peasantry, instead we could call such cooperatives hehuopu.¹⁰⁸

[[14] Building Roads and Repairing Dikes]]

All fourteen aspects enumerated above have been accomplished by the peasantry under the leadership of the peasant associations. Let the reader recount them; which of them is bad? Only the local tyrants and evil gentry, I think, will call them bad. Curiously enough, it is reported from Nanchang that Chiang Kai-shek, Zhang Renjie [a mentor and supporter of Chiang Kai-shek], and other such gentlemen do not entirely approve of the activities of the Hunan peasantry. This opinion is shared by Liu Yuezhi¹⁰⁹ and other such right-wing leaders in Hunan; all of them say: "They have simply gone red." I wonder where the so-called national revolution would be without this red. Day after day to talk about arousing the masses and then to be scared to death when they do rise—what difference is there between this and She Gong's love of dragons?¹¹⁰

B.21 Discussion on the Question of the Left by the Guangdong Area (October 1926)¹¹¹

The party group had two discussions on the question of the left: Comrade Borodin made two reports. The party group decided unanimously: "Comrade Borodin said that only the ordinary oppressed workers, peasants, shopkeepers, students, and people in other walks of life are the real left. They will become the genuine leftist forces in the everyday struggle for the interests of the people. At the present time, one person or another at the top is referred to as leftist; this is laughable and unreliable." These words of Comrade Borodin are fundamentally correct. However, the tone downgrades the role of the present left in the top leadership and creates many difficulties for practical work. At the last meeting of the party group, all the comrades drew up the following views for the Party Center concerning the question of the left. We hope that the Party Center will make a final decision after deliberation and instruct all areas to use [the following] as criteria for their work in the GMD.

1) The current left at the top (this is referred to as the quasi-left below so as to distinguish it from the genuine left) comprises the people inside the GMD who cannot cooperate with the center and right and is an organization that defends itself against the attacks of the right in order to protect the position [of its members]. They are not supporters of the leftists' political program, so its members are constantly wavering and unable to make a firm leftist stand. In addition, they are weak and not brave enough to step forward and fight for the views of the left. Internally, they cannot reach a common viewpoint. However, one cannot say that we grudgingly patch up this kind of left. For reasons of sentiment and self-interest, they cannot cooperate with the right. Since they act differently from the right on certain issues or at a certain time, we regard them as left.

2) The fact that this quasi-left is weak and wavering does not necessarily make us pessimistic. Without the masses, of course there can only be this kind of left. When newly formed, it can only be this kind of creature. However, this kind of quasi-left has a considerable role to play in the national revolution. The division between the left and the right after the GMD's reorganization has contributed much to the development of the national revolution. Because of the conflict between the quasi-left and the right, it [the quasi-left] has to move toward us, yet it cannot afford to hold views different from those of the right. Sometimes, it needs the strength of the masses to resist the right and thus it must take some kind of a stand on the side of the masses. Therefore, even though this kind of quasi-left has many weaknesses, we must watch out for one particular point in our handling of it: we cannot treat it in the way we treat the center or the right. For example, when this quasi-left is in conflict with the right, we must accord it considerable respect and offer assistance. When this quasi-left has wrong proposals and engages in incorrect actions, we can only correct it in a spirit of friendship but not attack it as if it were the right.

3) The organization of this quasi-left will inevitably produce some turncoats or internal squabbling in the future, but we should assist this kind of organization and use such organizations wherever the necessity of fighting the right arises. Moreover, we should help set up links between them and the reliable left in Canton. We should lead this kind of quasi-left to work among the masses and get close to the real left among the rising masses. This will encourage some within the quasi-left to become more steadfastly left, so that genuine leftist leaders may emerge from within. If, in the future, no genuine leftist leaders emerge from within (a possibility), the current cooperation with them will still be beneficial because with them as our ally, we can, at least, boost leftist tendencies and deal a blow to rightist tendencies. This will be of great assistance to us in our work among the real leftists in the masses.

4) In the conflict between the GMD-left and right, we should encourage the quasi-left to become involved. We should only use such methods as voting and so on to help them; we should not say much and interfere in other people's affairs. We should adopt the above attitude toward the struggle for power between the GMD-left and right. However, we must expose and attack their crimes of leftist¹¹² political tendencies. We must occupy the position of leading the left, and should not always hand over such responsibilities to the quasi-left. Such a quasi-left without mass following will never have the strength or courage to shoulder such responsibilities.

5) At the same time, we should pay attention to the organizations of such a quasi-left. [This] is limited only to areas where there is a practical need to deal with the right (referring to the right that makes trouble in the party organizations); no organizations should be set up beforehand in places without this need. Therefore, the organizations of this quasi-left tend to exclude us in one way or another (for example, the organizations of the right [left, presumably] are unwilling to admit anybody suspected of being a CP member). In places where the right launches its attacks, the quasi-left has to cooperate closely with us in order to deal with the right. We also need it to reduce the number of our direct confrontations with the right. In places where there is no need to deal with the right, we should not be in a hurry to establish such quasi-left organizations. Also, the relatively genuine leftist members in the quasi-left have made no demands for organization. Therefore, those who demand such organizations are those who are relatively rightist and hate the CP (in fact, these people are lazy, weak, narrow-minded, jealous rightists or Dai Jitao-ists; we must not recognize their demands as the demands of the left). If we organize such quasi-left organizations beforehand, they are sure to demonstrate this kind of anticommunist spirit and in fact become organizations of the center or the right. We must not limit ourselves to organizing such a quasi-left everywhere. If there is no undertaking against the right in a particular area, and the work there is against the right in the GMD CC, we should allow our people to have unlimited cooperation with the quasi-left but not leave them to organizing themselves independently.

6) We should correct our mistake of overemphasizing these quasi-leftists and neglecting the center and the right. Of course, there is a huge ideological gap between us, but in reality, the behavior of the quasi-left, who are often either afraid or unwilling, is no different from that of the center and right. If we really want to place the responsibility for the revolution on the shoulders of the quasi-left, we will get into big trouble. If, on behalf of such a quasi-left, we completely offend the so-called center and the right, the consequences will be much more serious than if we offend the quasi-left. This is an example of getting into trouble. Within the framework of not worsening our relationship with the quasi-left, we should treat the center and the right in the same way as we do the quasi-left. Sometimes we can also obtain their assistance.

7) Only the genuine leftists are really capable of shouldering the responsibility of the national revolution. These are the ordinary oppressed students, shopkeepers, peasants, urban residents, and artisans. We cannot produce genuine leftists here by simply establishing relations with a handful of top GMD leaders or by talking and negotiating in secluded rooms. They have to be produced in the everyday struggles for the interests of the people. At present, the national revolution is in urgent need of such genuine leftists. No matter where, we should make great efforts to promote the leftists to lead the people to struggle for their own interests. The organizations of ordinary leftists which we need should not be the organizations of the quasi-left, but the organizations of the masses of the genuine leftists.

8) The masses of the genuine leftists need leaders in their everyday struggle, while the quasi-leftist elements often do not dare to become leaders. Only our comrades can easily become their leaders because our comrades have the masses of the party behind them. The quasi-leftist has only himself but, since the majority of the masses are under our leadership and not that of the quasi-left, any comrade [of ours] will more easily and courageously stand in front of the masses and lead their struggles. Although the quasi-left is the real left in the GMD, others and even the quasi-left regard themselves as followers of the CP, and not as the GMD-left. We must make it [the quasi-left] look like the GMD-left and establish regular ties with it [the GMD-left]. If the quasi-leftists get as close to the masses as possible, sometimes they will have more courageous and resolute leftist tendencies.

9) The quasi-leftists are not necessarily genuine leftists. Sometimes, their thinking is fundamentally rightist or Dai Jitao-ist; before the rise of the masses of the genuine leftists, certainly some of them may be more leftist while others (or even all of them) may retreat or lag behind, just like Dai Jitao during the era of the May 30 Movement. Therefore, the revolutionary position of the quasi-left is not a sure one. However, no matter what, for their own protection and to undermine the center and the right, it is easier for people at the present time to work on the leftist masses and thus easier to be considered by others as the GMD-left. We must do something for the quasi-leftists today and turn them into temporary shadows of the GMD-left.

10) On the surface, we should respect the independent position of the quasi-leftists because the quasi-left demands this kind of status and does not want to be an appendage of the CP. However, in reality, we must gain leadership over them; otherwise such a quasi-left will become rightist or slack in its work. As for the alliance between the masses of the genuine leftists and the quasi-leftists, on the surface, we should respect their independence while, in reality, trying to gain the actual power of leadership over the leftist masses. This will enable the masses under our command to influence the quasi-left. If we allow the leftists to be led entirely by the quasi-left and break away from our influence, the quasi-leftists may, on the contrary, exert rightist influence on the leftist masses. In general, if we say that the national revolution needs the leadership of the GMD-left, such words will be too rigid and we will not be able to gain the real power of leadership. This will endanger the national revolution.

B.22 Comrade Chen Duxiu's Report on the Question of the GMD (4 November 1926)¹¹³

On the question of the GMD, the first point to be made is whether the Chinese national revolution is passé. Some foreign comrades think this is so. Some Chinese comrades also believe that the Chinese national revolution has succeeded or is about to succeed and that the proletarian revolution is now on the way. These views are obviously wrong, because two-thirds of China are still under the rule of the Zhili and Fengtian warlords. In terms of international relations, [China] is still a semi-colonial country; politically even the Guangdong national government has certain aspects of compromise of a semicolonial nature. Economically, national finances, financial administration, customs, transportation, and major industries (particularly coal and iron) are controlled by the imperialists. Therefore, it is wrong to say that the Chinese national revolution is passé or near its end. We can only say that it has just begun. If our observations are correct, China still needs a national revolution.

However, then the second question arises: do we need a national revolutionary party? Some comrades think that the national revolution can be carried out by the CP; a national revolutionary party is not necessary. On the surface, people who say such things appear very leftist, but in fact they have aided the imperialists and warlords. This is because first, without a national revolutionary party, we cannot directly command the petty bourgeoisie in the cities and, second, communist regimes cannot survive under the present international circumstances (recently a Japanese viscount asked the GMD commissar in Beijing whether Guangdong had a communist government). This is why we still need a national revolutionary party at the present time.

There is yet another view that recognizes the need for a national revolutionary party but asks whether we should select another national revolutionary party besides the GMD. Many comrades in our party hold this view. At present, it seems that this view is also incorrect. We must understand the social conditions of the whole of China. The mentalities and abilities of the petty bourgeoisie are almost identical; if we do not want this GMD, and opt for another GMD, it will hardly make any difference. Moreover, the new party might not have as long a history of revolution as the current GMD. In practice, we have seen many people, for similar reasons, attempt to organize new parties, but all have failed. For example, the New China Party [Xin Zhongguo dang], and the statistes [guojia zhuyi pai]¹¹⁴ both had ambitions to organize another nationalist party outside of the GMD. But one has failed completely while the other has gradually declined. Therefore, viewed both from a theoretical and a factual perspective, it is impossible to organize another national revolutionary party.

In the present social conditions in China, not only is it difficult to have a second petty bourgeois party, but the emergence of a party of the big bourgeoisie is unlikely. Since the strength of the compradore class is still enormous, while the national bourgeoisie has not yet formed completely, the progressive bourgeoisie can only go over to the side of the GMD. Particularly after the victory of the Northern Expedition, the bourgeoisie has tended even more toward the GMD. Only the compradore class still remains in the camps of the Research and Communications cliques. We are not saying that the Chinese national revolution needs only one nationalist party; CP participation in the national revolution is a fact. Nor are we saying that there should not be a second nationalist party in addition to the GMD. We are saying that at the moment China only has the GMD—a national revolutionary party—and that, in reality, it is very difficult to create another nationalist party.

According to the above analysis, we can positively say that China now is still in the era of the national revolution. In this era, we need a national revolutionary party to cooperate with. The GMD is the only national revolutionary party in China now. What is the substance of the GMD? Its left wing is already on the road of national revolution. During reorganization at the First National Congress [January 1924], two factions were formed: the left and the right. At that time, the right included Feng Ziyou, Ma Su, and others. They represented landlords, compradores, and warlords and opposed the inclusion of communist elements. Now these rightists have left the GMD. Around the time of the Second Party Congress [January 1926], new rightists emerged, such as Dai [Jitao] and Chiang [Kai-shek]. At the time, the right and the left were in the process of formation. If the bourgeoisie joined the GMD, the right would become stronger. Its current strength alone is not as great as that of the old right, relying only on Chiang's armed forces to control the power of the party and government. Indeed, the new right oppose the old right. The strength of the new right will expand increasingly (the Chinese bourgeoisie will develop as will the GMD-right that represents them), even if it is not led by Dai or Chiang in the future.

The left represents the petty bourgeoisie. The right now represents the bourgeoisie; the right that has already left the GMD represents the compradores, landlords, and warlords. Roughly, we can say this; it is not farfetched. Under these circumstances, it is clear that our party should remain inside the GMD and form a close alliance with the left in order to help the left resist the infiltration of the ideas and forces of the right, and to prevent the new right from making rightist compromises. Our policies of the two enlarged meetings last year and this [October 1925 and July 1926] now seem to be very correct.

Since the March 20 coup [1926], the new right of Dai and Chiang splintered off from the left. Wang [Jingwei] also departed. The rest of the leaders on the left appear to waver very much. Therefore, comrades in the Guangdong area began to suspect the GMD and doubt whether the GMD could still carry out the revolution. Can the GMD make a firm stand? Is our party's policy on the GMD correct?

Not only in Guangdong, but also comrades in the northern area have similar thoughts. Some even believe that the GMD has abandoned the revolution; after all, the revolution needs the CP. In fact, there are many things that make us suspicious. After 20 March, the left was almost blown to pieces; no matter what, the left consulted with the CP first and did not dare to do anything if the CP did not express its views. Even the joint meeting of the GMD CC and provincial party departments was completely run by the CP. Without the CP's management they could not run it. The above is the situation in Guangdong. In Shanghai, [everything] depends even more on the CP's total management. The leader of the left, Liu Yazi, refused to take over the responsibility despite the many efforts we made to persuade him. All work is done by the CP. This situation makes the bourgeoisie in Shanghai also willing to cooperate with the Shanghai General Labor Union, which is controlled by the CP, and feel that the GMD is not much use. The bourgeoisie in Guangdong sometimes pays more attention to the CP than to the GMD. In Beijing, despite the depression of both the left and the right, everything is managed by Comrade Shouchang [Li Dazhao]. Almost the entire GMD there is merely Li Shouchang. In Hunan, at the recent provincial congress [of the GMD; 6–9 August 1926], communist elements accounted for more than 40 percent of the delegates, the leftists, over 10 percent, neutrals, more than 20 percent, and the rightists, over 10 percent. At first the Hunan area adopted a hands-off attitude; all resolutions were drafted by the left, lest, first, we be accused of completely controlling the congress and, second, the ability and theory of the left be tested. But a week into the congress, discussions mounted—without any results. The CP members had to come out and take over. The result was that the resolutions and the outcome of the election were all approved according to our recommendations. At the beginning of the congress, our comrades seldom spoke; so on some minor issues the views expressed by various comrades were at odds with each other. The right thought that the CP was not unanimous. However, when the passage of the final resolution and the outcome of the election were effected entirely in line with our predictions, all factions expressed surprise and admiration for CP organization, on the one hand, and panic, on the other.

Recently, Dai Jitao complained that the GMD can no longer do anything and that the revolution is now the CP's. Tan Yankai and his subordinates say that the GMD has no strength and that the CP's strength is greater. Tang Shengzhi also holds similar views.¹¹⁵

I do not cite these facts to prove that the GMD is no longer useful and must rely on the CP to continue the revolution alone. These facts prove two things: (1) alliance between the CP and the left is possible, and (2) although the left cannot be controlled and managed by us, it still needs our help and leadership; we cannot abandon this responsibility for the moment. If we give up this responsibility or even withdraw from the GMD, we will allow the new right that completely represents the bourgeoisie to ally with the left that represents the petty bourgeoisie and leads the revolution.

The most important question here is whether there is a left in the GMD that can ally with us. We can say positively that there is. Not only within, but also outside of, the GMD there are huge masses of the left. Moreover, the organizations of the left are in the process of continuous expansion. Let us look at the evidence from Canton alone: (1) In the Whampoa Military Academy, since the withdrawal of more than 160 of our comrades, the leftist students have been organized under our leadership; their organization has expanded into the masses and is attempting to expand across the country. Their political program is to welcome Wang [Jingwei]'s restoration to his position [chair of the national government] and continue the premier's [Sun Yat-sen] three fundamental policies of allying with Soviet Russia, allying with the CP, and supporting the workers and peasants. (2) The head of the Department of Peasant Affairs in the GMD CC, Gan Naiguang, has begun work on the peasant movement in Guangdong as well as throughout the whole country; he often assembles leftist youths for secret meetings and published a pamphlet attempting to propound a leftist theory that the GMD should seek out the peasantry as its basis. I hear that the pamphlet has sold 50,000 copies. The comrades in the Guangdong area have noticed many similar instances and written in their letter, "We believe that there must be a left wing to lead the Chinese national revolutionary movement.” They have acknowledged the instruction of the CC [of the CCP] that “we should not completely manage the revolution; we must help the left and enable the left itself to take over the responsibility and feel the power of the masses, so that they can make their own stand.” This principle is correct. But the comrades in the Guangdong area raised another important practical question: how can we help the left, and what kind of left should we help? The answer of the comrades in the Guangdong area was that there must be a political program of the left; according to this program we can develop the party organizations of the masses on the left in various areas and mass associations of the people, so that the CP may have a correct relationship with the masses on the left and advance the revolution; this is not helping only a few leftist leaders. The comrades in the Guangdong area said: “We do not have to talk about leaders because we do not have much difficulty in dealing with and helping leaders.” This view is only half correct. In helping the left, needless to say the most important thing to do is to use the masses on the left to give substance to the party organizations; but if we overlook the question of the leftist leaders and abandon them, so that the leaders are isolated from the masses, this is another mistake. Of course, leaders without masses are useless, but can masses without leaders be organized to fight? The inclinations of the masses, of course, will influence the leaders; but the leaders’ inclinations also have great influence over the entire party; it is the same in any political party of any class. The leftist leaders in the GMD are very complex and irresolute. When we deal with them, it is often difficult even to help them; the strategies we use in dealing with and helping them are not appropriate and have given rise to the March 20 coup; this is one very obvious example.

The GMD-left now has three flaws: first, it does not have a concrete political program; second, it has no central leaders; and third, the leaders of the left are isolated from the masses. These are the three things we must help the left with: help the left devise a political program; help the left find central leaders; and help the leaders of the left come into contact with the masses. Why do the comrades in the Guangdong area only pay attention to the masses of the left while neglecting the leaders of the left? We can see their views in their annual report. They think that if one claims that the GMD has a left, then there are only the masses on the left but no leaders; the leaders of the left often oscillate both in thoughts and deeds and are therefore seldom reliable; thus, there is no left [in the GMD] to speak of. The comrades in the Guangdong area once heard Wang Jingwei say: “If the peasants only care for class struggle, then we don’t want them.” They also heard Liao Zhongkai say, “The Guangning Incident occurred because the members of the peasant association were influenced by Old Borodin and the CP.”¹¹⁶ They have also witnessed the transformation of Dai Jitao, Chiang Kai-shek, and Ding Weifeng into the new right; even Gu Mengyu also accused the peasant associations of harboring bandits; at the political meeting, even Gan Naiguang did not say a word for the peasants in Hua County on the massacre there.¹¹⁷ All these facts have made the comrades in the Guangdong area doubt whether there is really a left in the GMD. They say: "The GMD-left knows that it is more important to protect its own interest," and also, "The GMD-left uses the peasantry's strength to protect its own position and once it achieves this goal, it will naturally neglect the peasant movement." Thus, if we overlook the leaders of the left in the GMD and say that they are not the real left, this observation is very dangerous. The comrades in the Guangdong area insist: "We the CP should have a correct type of relationship with the masses of the left." This is correct. However, we should not therefore start doubting whether there are the so-called leaders of the left aside from the masses of the left. Before the birth of the new leaders of the left, we must not neglect the current leaders of the left in our cooperative relationship with the GMD. The comrades of the Guangdong area suspect the leaders of the left in the GMD; this mistake is to overevaluate the left and treat it no differently from the CP. The distinct character of the left and the right in the GMD and that of the CP is that the right destroys the interests of the workers and peasants, while the CP fights for the interests of the workers and peasants; but the left uses the workers and peasants to fight for the interests of the left. If we view the GMD-left from the perspective of the CP and demand that they also fight for the interests of the workers and peasants, then it is not necessary for the CP to exist in China; at the same time, the GMD-left has to become a workers and peasants' party without being able to recruit the huge masses of the urban petty bourgeoisie, since the urban petty bourgeoisie can only support the workers and peasants out of the need of the revolution, but will never fight for the workers and peasants in the latter's interest.

We also know that the Chinese national revolution has achieved considerable success. If political power should fall into the hands of the current leaders of the left, there will be no conflict between their political program and ours over the workers' demand for reduction in working hours, wage increases, freedom of labor unions, improvement in benefits, etc. As for the political program for the peasantry, such as their demands for arms, land, and rural political power, the left may not fully allow this. In the future, our alliance with the left will split over these issues because we cannot lose the peasantry, and because we want to maintain our alliance with the left. At that time, perhaps the revolutionary situation in the world will have undergone new changes; perhaps the Chinese national revolution will have entered a new era; perhaps the political parties in China will have become divided anew along class lines. All this may happen in the distant future. At present and in the near future, in the difficult struggles against imperialists and warlords, the longer we keep our alliance with the GMD-left, the more beneficial it will be for the Chinese revolution. Therefore, in our relationship with the GMD-left, we are not to downgrade our political program for the peasantry in order to maintain this alliance; rather, we must define our political program for the peasantry and, both subjectively and objectively, try to influence and educate the GMD-left, so that not too great a distance will emerge between the political partners over the question of the program for the peasantry. This would cause a premature split even though the stand of both sides on the issue of the peasant movement is completely different.

Now my conclusion: according to our recent experiences, our current policy toward the GMD and the decisions of the last two enlarged meetings do not need to be changed at all. However, what needs our attention is that for the sake of the progress in the revolutionary movement in China we must have a political program for the peasantry that meets their demands. Also, we must use our political program for the peasantry to influence the GMD-left and make their leaders adopt a political program that is advantageous to the peasantry and avoid a split in our alliance with the GMD-left over the issue of the peasantry.

B.23 Political Report. Chen Duxiu (13 December 1926)¹¹⁸

[[The main point of the political report concerns relations with the GMD and, most particularly, the role of the United Front in the national revolution. The first part of the report comprises a review of the history of the United Front. After the conquest of Jiujiang and Nanchang,¹¹⁹ the red United Front again developed dangerous tendencies.

1) The imperialists' policy of creating divisions. Military victory and the rising popular movement have forced the imperialists to realize that violence alone will not be enough and that they must attempt co-option. They will offer compromise in order to retain most of the unequal treaties, create a rupture with Soviet Russia, and ban the labor movement.]]

2) The GMD-right. It has been frightened by the sudden rise in the workers and peasants' movement and thus display rightist tendencies. The Northern Expedition has increased the strength of the CCP because the popular forces are under the control of the party. Thus, it [the right] feels that the CCP must be restricted in its activities. Now most of the GMD's political and military strength is in the hands of the right. The right has not openly obstructed the anti-imperialist movement but, in reality, it desperately wants to calm down the workers and peasants' movement to gain imperialist recognition of the nationalist government.

[[3) The panic of merchants. The flourishing of workers' organizations and the outbreak of economic strikes has caused many middle and small merchants to take the side of the big merchants and compradores and oppose the workers.]]

4) The disease of "left" naïveté in our party—among our comrades, there are several symptoms of the disease of "left" naïveté:

a) Looking down on the GMD. This can be said to be a traditional mentality, particularly among the comrades in the Guangdong area. Somebody once said: "The GMD has been dead since 20 March [1926], and rotting since 15 May;¹²⁰ why are we still holding this stinking corpse in our arms?" However, the impetus to the flourishing of the popular movement given by the victories of the Northern Expedition prove that the GMD is not yet a stinking corpse.

b) Completely dominating and controlling the GMD. Many decent members of the GMD say: "We are not against the policies of the CP, but we oppose the CP's dominating and controlling the work of the GMD everywhere." This is the response to total domination by our comrades. This kind of total domination is not necessarily intentional, but the result is that there is neither the GMD nor the CP.

c) Completely dominating and controlling the popular movement. Not only do we want to dominate and control the popular movement completely, but we want to do the same for all popular movements. Before 20 March and 15 May, we totally managed the GMD within; now we are doing the same thing outside the GMD. The result of this total domination is that the GMD is now without the masses and that the masses of the left are separated from the leaders of the left. This has meant that there has been no strong formation of the left. Without a strong left to cooperate with us in fighting the right, the result will naturally be that we will lead the masses alone and directly confront the military and political forces of the right—in the form of direct conflict between the CP and the GMD. At the moment, this kind of conflict is just what the imperialists need, but not what the United Front for National Liberation wants.

d) Denying the existence of the left. This kind of mentality that completely negates the left is strongest among the comrades of the Guangdong area. In their report to the CC they said: "As for the left, there is no such thing as the left." Moreover, Comrade Borodin thinks that the real solution of the peasant problem lies in solving the land problem. Thus, he said: "Those who support the solution of the land problem are the real left; now there is no real left in the GMD." This is a curious kind of logic! As a consequence of denying [the existence of] the left, we have only two courses of action: first, cooperate with the right and, second, withdraw from the GMD and lead the masses in conflicts with the GMD. We must adopt neither of these courses of action. Our only way out is to remain inside the GMD and ally with the left to fight the right. The reasons for Comrade Borodin's mistaken view are, first, setting too high standards for the left and, second, overlooking the dispute concerning the struggles in China at the present time. This dispute revolves around whether to continue the nationalist movement against imperialism and the democratic movement against warlords, landlords, the evil gentry, and local tyrants. Whoever inside the GMD supports these two movements are leftists; if not, they are rightists. Therefore, the GMD-left must be democrats; if they only support opposition to imperialism but not warlords, landlords, local tyrants, and the evil gentry, they are feudalists and, of course, rightists. Rightists like this are numerous among the important personages of the GMD. Of course, the solution of the land problem deals the final blow to the landlords and local tyrants. The majority of the peasantry in the Chinese countryside, however, is struggling for such issues as rent-reduction, interest-reduction, freedom of association, armed self-defense, resistance to local tyrants and the evil gentry, resistance to harsh levies and multiple taxes—but not the fundamental question of land. They themselves have not even understood this fundamental problem. Certainly, our propaganda can proceed from the current issues in our struggle to the fundamental question of land. If we immediately raise the land issue, which the peasant masses do not yet understand as the slogan for our struggle, then we cause our struggle to stop. If we use the criterion of whether one supports solution of the land problem as defining the GMD-left, there is, of course, no left. The current struggles over rent- and interest-reduction are more pressing for the peasantry than solving the land problem. The GMD-left that supports these demands exists already; this is more realistic than hoping for the emergence of a left that supports the peasantry in solving the land problem, because negating the current left as a result of imagining a future radical left is equivalent to thinking that eating bean curd and vegetables today is unnecessary because next week one might get fish and meat to eat.

e) Misunderstanding party independence. Independence of our party refers to its independent political propaganda and the independent organization of the party; it does not mean that we should act independently in every current, practical political struggle and not cooperate with the GMD. Some comrades interpret party independence this way and thus often dream of organizing workers, peasants, merchants, students, and all the masses directly under the leadership of our party, completely dominating and managing every popular movement without cooperating with the GMD. The comrades in Beijing and Hubei all have this mentality; in particular, the comrades in Guangdong deny the existence of the left even more fervently. Naturally, this gives rise to the following mistaken view: “Of course, we stand on the side of the people in resisting the government . . . the conflict between the people and the government also reflects the general conflict between the CP and the GMD.” This leftist error of breaking away from the GMD is as dangerous to the party as the previous rightist error of not wanting to develop party [CCP] organization and submerging ourselves in the GMD.

f) Poor policies for dealing with the middle and small merchants. Neither in Changsha nor in Wuhan have we built up a good relationship with artisans, shop clerks, middle and small merchants through the GMD. Particularly in Wuhan, the excessively high demands of some artisans and shop clerks have forced the middle and small merchants to cooperate with the chamber of commerce in opposing the labor unions. As for our inability to stop [workers’] pickets from threatening and humiliating merchants, this is a phenomenon that must not continue. This is the fourth dangerous tendency in the red United Front.

When the above four dangerous tendencies link up at any time and in any place, they can cause the United Front to split. Now the possibility of this split is extraordinarily serious. We must urgently implement the following tactics to save the situation:

a) Prevent rightist tendencies outside of the party and, at the same time, oppose “leftist” tendencies within the party in order to strengthen the red United Front. The increasing distance between these “leftist” and rightist tendencies is the major factor dividing the United Front, in general, and the relationship between the GMD and the CP, in particular. The secondary causes are the new policies of the imperialists and the panic of the merchants. Of course, we do not dream of reducing totally the distance between these “leftist” and rightist tendencies, but we must pay attention to the fact that the degree of solidarity in the United Front is positively related to the distance between the “leftist” and rightist tendencies.

b) Pressure the GMD and the nationalist government to adopt the slogan “Armed forces unite with the people.” Internally, we should continue our joint democratic struggles—the struggle to overthrow the feudal warlord regimes in metropolitan cities and the rural feudal regimes of landlords, local tyrants, and the evil gentry; externally, we should continue the struggle for independence and equality. According to past experiences, each time the GMD won a military victory, it immediately compromised with the enemy and thus became rightist and was defeated. The majority of the rightists now also wants to seek compromise with the enemies (the imperialists and the domestic feudal forces). The only way to save the rightists now is to continue our struggle and pressure them to unite the armed forces with the people and continue the struggle against the enemies. Only this can salvage the present situation of the increasing “leftism” of the people and the increasing rightist tendencies of the military regime.

c) Maintain a balance of power among the military leaders of the GMD. Some comrades advocate the concentration of the GMD military forces. This is an illusion. It is both impossible and unnecessary to concentrate the GMD military forces. There is a positive relationship between the concentration of the GMD military forces and the promotion of the reactionary situation. The more concentrated the military forces, the greater the forces of reaction; the faster the concentration, the faster the reaction; he in whose hands such military forces are concentrated reacts first. This is the logical consequence of the inability of the GMD authorities to discipline their military leaders. We can also say that this is the certain fate of the countries where democracy is underdeveloped.

d) Expand democratic propaganda. Previous propaganda focused exclusively on the single aspect of nationalism. This kind of simplistic propaganda movement is often used by military dictators. Now, in order to prevent the situation of military dictatorship from becoming more aggravated and rightist, we must start propaganda and a movement for democratic politics. It is not enough to propagandize democracy abstractly. We must point out that the concrete manifestations of democratic politics are the establishment of a national parliament, provincial assemblies, city and village councils, and the return of political power in cities and villages to the people. We must explain that any democratic government must stand on the left—on the side of the people—and give the people sufficient freedom of assembly, association, speech, publication, strike, and rent strikes. It must not stand on the right—the side of the imperialists, big merchants, compradores, landlords, local tyrants, and the evil gentry who wish to suppress the movement of workers and peasants. In particular, we must stress that the peasant movement is helping the democratic government to attack the feudal landlords, local tyrants, and the evil gentry, eradicating their enemies for the democratic government, strengthening the basis of the government, and not harming it. The democratic government should not help its own enemies (feudal landlords, local tyrants, and the evil gentry) to oppress its own supporters (the peasantry).

e) Improve our relations with the GMD. All mass organizations and movements should cooperate with the GMD as much as possible and, in particular, support the development of the left's strength to enable the leaders of the left to win over the masses. They should also work hard to develop the organization of the left in the GMD among the masses of the petty bourgeoisie (peasants, artisans, shop clerks, students, small merchants) and do as much as they can to help the left to achieve victory at the Third National Congress [of the GMD]. From today, we must start implementing this policy initiative. The right began its activities long ago, sending its own people everywhere to gather together its forces and even recruiting into its party the people from the Western Hills Conference,¹²¹ traitors to the workers, and all reactionaries, as preparations to compete with the left at the Third National Congress. If victory at the Third National Congress goes to the right, there will be great changes in the GMD's policies with respect to its alliance with Soviet Russia and the CP and its attitude toward the movement of workers and peasants. We must pay special attention to this.

f) Help the left establish a civilian government headed by Wang Jingwei. Military commanders should not be standing committee members of the government; the military commission must be under the administration of the government to reduce the nature and form of the military dictatorship of the nationalist government.

g) Define our policies toward the middle and small merchants. At present, our policies toward the middle and small merchants are experiencing great difficulties. Because the strikes waged everywhere by artisans and shop clerks against factory owners and shopkeepers are essentially conflicts of interest among the petty bourgeoisie themselves, and because both sides are needed in the United Front, we should not favor one particular side; yet neither can we remain neutral. We have to adopt the following policy: negatively speaking, we should try to explain to shop clerks and workers that they should not raise excessively high demands beyond the economic capabilities of the factory owners and shopkeepers; nor should they resort to strikes at will, particularly in stores selling daily necessities (rice and coal stores, grocery stores selling cooking oil and salt, etc.). Positively speaking, we should step up our propaganda about the necessity of the United Front and about workers' support for merchants in their struggles against harsh levies and numerous taxes and for citizen's self-government, so that they may try to seek economic assistance to deal with the drying up of the economy and financial panic in the cities. Only these methods will, one way or another, moderate our conflicts with the petty bourgeoisie and thus strengthen the United Front.

(1) The Party Center thinks that there is indeed a distinction between the left and right in the GMD. There are still many elements who represent the interests of landlords, the evil gentry, local tyrants, and other feudal forces—they are certainly the right. The idealists who represent bourgeois nationalism are still vacillating between the interests of the compradores and landlords and those of the workers and peasants, and sometimes they are prejudiced in favor of the former; although their verbal support of the nationalist movement is relatively loud, they have always openly or otherwise advocated military dictatorship and disapproved of the people's government. In terms of the national revolution, these people can only be classified as rightists. Only those who are on the side of democracy, represent the interests and mentalities of the majority of peasants and the urban petty bourgeoisie, and oppose the feudal forces are genuine leftists. The Party Center thinks that these two different factions do exist. This is an undeniable fact.

2) However, the comrades in Guangdong deny that there is a GMD-left. They say: "Only ordinary oppressed workers, peasants, merchants, students, and people in other walks of life are the genuine left; only through fighting for the interests of the people in everyday life and through struggle can anyone become part of the genuine left. Such persons at the top who are considered leftist are, in fact, inactive and unreliable." They also say: "Only those who support the solution of the land problem can form the left in the future. There is no left at the present time." They believe that since there is no real left at the present time, we will blunder into trouble by helping some comical and unreliable leftists and thus offend the right.

3) The view of the joint meeting in October [1926] of party groups in the GMD seems to be shared by those of the Party Center and the comrades in Guangdong. They deny that there are real leftists in the GMD, a view similar to that of the Guangdong comrades. At the same time, however, they admit that there are so-called "quasi-leftists." They say: "Neglecting too much the role of the current left at high levels will cause many difficulties in practical work." "The fact that this quasi-left is weak and wavering does not necessarily make us pessimistic. Without the masses, of course there can only be this kind of left. When newly formed it can only be this kind of creature. However, this kind of quasi-left has a considerable role to play in the national revolution. The division between left and right after the GMD's reorganization has contributed much to the development of the national revolution. Because of the conflict between the quasi-left and the right, it [the quasi-left] has to move toward us, yet it cannot afford to have different views from those of the right. Sometimes, it needs the strength of the masses to resist the right, and thus it must take some kind of a stand on the side of the masses." [See above, Doc. B.21, section 2.] These views are indeed different from those of the comrades in the Guangdong area. But they also say: "Only the genuine leftists are really capable of shouldering the responsibility of the national revolution. These are the ordinary oppressed students, shopkeepers, peasants, urban residents, and artisans." [See above, Doc. B.21, section 7.] Such words are identical with those of the Guangdong area comrades, but they do not use as their criterion for the genuine left whether one supports the solution of the land problem. These mistaken views of theirs are easily perceived. At present, we cannot use support for the solution of the land problem as a criterion for being genuine left because land has not yet become a problem. At present, the problems for the peasantry are their urgent demands for rent- and interest-reduction, freedom of association, armed self-defense, resistance to local tyrants and the evil gentry, and resistance to harsh levies and numerous taxes. If we guide the peasantry from the practical struggles for these demands to the land problem that exists in the research office, this will stop their struggles. If we hope for the immediate emergence of a left that supports the solution of the land problem, this will be more naive than hoping that the current left can really support the current peasant struggles. Our concept of the GMD-left applies only to those GMD members who are relatively leftist. It is not a faction that has high standards. If we say that only the ordinary oppressed workers, peasants, merchants, students, and people from other walks of life are the genuine leftists, this is to confuse the difference between the left in society with the left in the GMD—this is even more laughable.

We must remember that since its foundation as the Society for the Revival of China [Xingzhonghui],¹²³ the GMD's evolution has been limited by time. The so-called left and right are relative terms and do not have definite boundaries between them. Since the left and right in society cannot be confused with the left and right in a political party, and since a GMD-left that supports a solution to the land problem has not emerged, we have to acknowledge that those elements who support continuation of the three policies made by Sun Yat-sen and Liao Zhongkai—allying with Soviet Russia, allying with the CP, and supporting workers and peasants—are leftists. Those who are against these policies are rightists. It is not necessary to distinguish the genuine left, the quasi-left, etc., in the way one might distinguish separate makes of famous scissors.

Why say they do not count as genuine leftists? Is it because they do not have a concrete political program? Yet, since the October joint meeting, they have had one. Is it because they have not formed a faction that has a definite policy? Yet, if we make this fundamental criticism, the entire GMD has yet to become a political party with a definite policy. Is it because they often vacillate and lack consistency? The nature of the petty bourgeoisie is vacillation and inconsistency. Is it because they have no central leaders? Wang Jingwei is not dead yet. Is it because they do not have armed forces? (According to Mao Renzhi's [Zedong] report, some comrades in Guangdong said, the right has troops, the left has none; even with a platoon of soldiers the right is stronger than the left.) This is even more absurd. Moreover, the reality is not as simple as it appears on the surface. Is it because they have no masses? It is not that they do not have masses, but the masses are isolated from the leaders. Is it because they are only a tendency and not a group? They also have leaders and masses just like the right, and will have even more masses than the right; as soon as Wang Jingwei returns, they will form a larger group than the right. Is it because the left's current political program cannot satisfy the demands of the peasantry? This is obviously not true. Peasant associations, rent reduction, interest reduction, armed resistance against local tyrants, the evil gentry, and other leftist political proposals are precisely the urgent demands of the peasants. Is it because they are only leftists in words and incapable of practicing what they preach? This is certainly the left's weakness at the moment, but we cannot say that there have never been any leftist activities. Even their leftist tendencies in words and thoughts are of great significance in terms of their influence on the revolutionary movement and our cooperation with the GMD.

Why do we want to recognize the left? Not only because the left's existence is a fact, but also because it is the key to our cooperation with the GMD. Of course, we should not superstitiously believe that there is already a strong and responsible left. However, even if there are only some leftists who are different from the rightists and cannot cooperate with the right, thus becoming a buffer zone between us and the right, they will have a great role to play. The consequence of denying the existence of the left will leave us only two courses of action. One is to cooperate with the right and follow the right in their oppression of the masses of workers and peasants. The second is to lead the masses ourselves to confront the right directly. If there is no difference between the left and the right, when we come into conflict with the right, it manifests itself as a conflict between the CP and the entire GMD. The imperialists and all domestic reactionaries are eager that we follow this route. The comrades in the Guangdong area are now traveling along this road. They deny the existence of the left. They fear that giving them special help will offend the right, and thus they feel that it is unnecessary to have special, close cooperation with them [the left]. The left will then feel that we have deserted them; they are afraid of being taken advantage of and thus becoming isolated. Naturally, they will take the side of the right and oppose us. This is the logical objective outcome. This fallacious theory of negating the left has already produced egregious results. If the comrades in the Guangdong area do not correct this mistake before it is too late, and if other local party organizations fail to defend against this mistake, irreparable losses will be incurred.

Therefore, the CC meeting is firmly against the mistaken view among our comrades that denies the existence of the GMD-left. It resolutely insists on the existence of the GMD-left even though it is weak, vacillating, and inconsistent. It strongly advocates that great efforts be made to strengthen and develop the forces of the GMD-left and help it gain (but not monopolize) the leading positions in the party and the government as well as among their own masses (revolutionary urban petty bourgeoisie, intellectuals, and peasants).

We must adopt the method of helping it [the left] at three levels—the top, middle, and bottom. First, we must never neglect helping their leaders at the top. We should help the leaders of the left at the top gain, both in their Party Center and local organizations, unity, win over the masses, and gain strength, political power, and power within the party. If we have only leftist masses but no leaders, they will remain the masses of the CP, and not the masses of the GMD. When there are conflicts between the masses and the right, they will appear as conflicts between the CP and the GMD, instead of as conflicts between the left and the right. As a condition of our help and cooperation with the leaders of the left, naturally they must continue the three revolutionary policies of Sun Yat-sen and Liao Zhongkai. We must also take into consideration their stand as the petty bourgeoisie and make concessions to them. In particular, in actual struggles of the peasant and workers' movement, we must not dream that they can adopt the same attitude as ours. After all, we can make fewer concessions to them than we give the right. Therefore, if they have strength, we can reduce conflicts [with the right] in the period of our cooperation with the GMD. Second, we must develop GMD organizations in the lower strata of society, such as among artisans, shop clerks, and the peasant masses, so that the leaders of the left can have leftist masses within the party. Moreover, we must help the people in the lower strata of society to get close to the leaders of the left in the GMD, so that they can have leftist masses outside of the party. The leaders of the left must have their own mass following; only then will they have enough strength of their own to rise to the challenge of the right; only then will they cool down their jealousy, suspicion, and fear of the CP because they feel that the latter is going to seize their power immediately. Moreover, when there are leftist masses, especially leftist masses within the party, the leaders of the left will be swayed to the left and become less weak and vacillating.

Third, we must help the left create a middle force as a link between the leaders of the left at the top and the leftist masses at the bottom. This is to help the left to found party schools, training schools for propagandists, political education schools, and the labor and peasant movements; to train their personnel who are able to get close to mass organizations and break down the barrier between the leaders of the left and their masses. If we can properly provide the left with assistance at these three levels, the left will certainly become stronger than now and will ally with us to resist the right.

In terms of helping the left form organizations, we should adopt the following policies: (1) We do not approve of an independent political program and constitution of leftist organizations. (2) Where the division between the left and the right has not led to obvious conflicts or where the right does not have any strength, only a small number of comparatively reliable leaders of the left should be united. We will help these leaders take control of all the party organizations and implement leftist policies under the leadership of the leftist leaders in the party center. It is unnecessary to organize the left masses among the party members. (3) Where the left is engaged in conflicts with the right, it is better to use such methods as schools, schools for political education, news agencies, scholarly associations, research associations, and clubs to organize numerous small groups among the masses of leftist party members under the command of the leaders of the left. There should not be an integrated form of union, let alone a concentrated organization. However, the leaders of the left may often call meetings of the representatives from these small groups, and the CP can also send formal representatives to attend these joint meetings. Members of the CP need not join these small groups.

The left now has several organizations. The first was formed by Gan Naiguang and others after the joint meeting in October. Most of its members were representatives from individual provinces who attended the joint meeting and, after the meeting, returned to their provinces and became couriers. They now have the four policies of allying with the CP and with Soviet Russia, opposing the Western Hills group, supporting Sun Yat-sen's and Liao Zhongkai's policies toward workers and peasants, and supporting Wang Jingwei to become the leader. However, they still have no name or constitution for their organization. Another organization is the "Left Society" [Zuoshe] founded by the students at the Whampoa Military Academy. They have an independent constitution and keep secrets from nonsociety members; but they do not have an independent political program. The recent political program devised by the joint meeting in October is also their political program. This "Left Society" has begun to develop in Hunan and Hubei; many out-of-favor politicians have joined it. This organization has a strong parochial color. The members of the "Left Society" in Hunan have become anticommunists because they are against Tang Shengzhi. We should not recognize this "Left Society" as entirely a union of leftist elements. We should warn members of the "Left Society" in all areas who have not yet become anticommunists not to have independent constitutions, not to hurriedly form complete organizations, and not to recruit nonleftist elements or out-of-favor politicians. We should ally with leftist elements who have not joined the "Left Society" and strike at those "Left Societies" in individual areas that have become anticommunist.

B.25 Chen Duxiu's Report to the CCP's Fifth National Congress (29 April 1927)¹²⁴

1. The Situation and Development of the Revolution and the Party's Strategy

[[The past two years can be divided into four periods:

a) From the Fourth Party Congress to the Shanghai incident and Guo Songling's uprising. This was the embryonic stage of the revolution when the proletariat began to lead the revolution. The Shanghai incident was openly against imperialism, and it made the nation's people realize the role and strength of the proletariat. The revolutionary tide also influenced the military with Feng Yuxiang's coup, Guo Songling's actions against Zhang Zuolin, and Tang Shengzhi declaring his support for the Canton government. This caused the reactionary united front of warlords to disintegrate.

b) From the defeat of Guo Songling to the retreat from Nankou by the First Corps of the National Army. This is the period of the decline of the revolution and the rise of counterrevolution. After the defeat of Guo Songling, the revolutionary tide began to ebb. At this time, the right wing of the bourgeoisie, the statist, and the GMD-right formed a united front to attack the revolution.

c) From the start of the Northern Expedition to the occupation of Shanghai by the National Army. The key feature of this period is the rise of the revolutionary movement. The progress of the revolutionary movement by the time of the occupation of Shanghai had so strengthened the forces of the proletariat that the bourgeoisie could not continue to cooperate with the proletariat and went over to the side of the counterrevolutionaries.

d) From the occupation of Shanghai to Chiang Kai-shek's betrayal. Incidents in this period are different because the bourgeoisie has withdrawn from the revolutionary front. Although the number of the revolutionary forces has decreased, the quality of the revolutionary masses has increased. The united front of workers, peasants, and petty bourgeoisie has been greatly consolidated.]]

Party Strategy in These Periods

In the first period, or the preparatory stage for the May 30 Incident, we staged economic strikes. Then, we were isolated and thus had to use the petty bourgeoisie and allow them to join the workers in the economic struggle. This, in turn, launched the political struggle against the imperialists. This was the strategy before the May 30 Incident. The second part of the strategy for this period was to demand convocation of the National Assembly. When Sun Yat-sen went north, there were different views within the party on this question. The comrades in Canton and some Russian comrades thought it necessary for Sun Yat-sen to go north, but the Party Center opposed this. The comrades in Canton thought that Sun Yat-sen's northern trip would expand the revolutionary movement beyond Guangdong. The view of the Party Center was that if Sun Yat-sen remained in Guangdong, the achievements of the revolution might be consolidated and the counterrevolutionary forces eliminated. The difference between these views was that some people wanted to expand the revolutionary movement while others proposed its consolidation. In recalling these controversies, we feel that the strategy of the Party Center at that time was not entirely correct.

Sun Yat-sen's trip north expanded the movement for the convocation of the National Assembly. This achievement is very important because if Sun Yat-sen had remained in Canton, he would have accomplished nothing. At that time, the military in Canton were all counterrevolutionaries, and none of the work to consolidate the revolutionary forces could be carried out.

The movement for the convocation of the National Assembly has two advantages: (a) it spreads the movement across the whole country, and (b) propaganda for the abolition of the unequal treaties has been spread over the whole country. At the time, the strategic mistake of the Party Center was not that it lacked initiative, but that it did not understand the significance of Sun Yat-sen's northern trip: nor did it perceive the influence of his northern trip on the development of the revolutionary forces across the country. The Party Center only saw the danger of a meeting between Sun Yat-sen and Tang Shengzhi.¹²⁵

Initially, the party's strategy during the May 30 Movement was to attract all classes to join this movement even though, at that time, the party did not believe in the possibility of a revolution participated in by all the people. In fact, that is what happened. The GMD-left joined this movement to protect its own interests; similarly, the right in the bourgeoisie very much wanted to use this movement for its own sake, but it did not actively participate in the struggle. On the one hand, the bourgeoisie was oppressed by the imperialists while, on the other, it was threatened by the proletariat. It was sure to drop out of the movement. The petty bourgeoisie adopted a middle-of-the-road attitude. As a result, the proletariat was fighting alone with the possibility that the warlords would crush the proletariat. However, although this was not caused by the strategic mistake of the party, it was something that was bound to happen. Not only was the bourgeoisie unwilling to be led by us, but also it was unwilling to cooperate with us.

There were many unique phenomena in the May 30 Movement. The nationwide May 30 Movement affected our work in the military. At that time, the party had already paid attention to the leadership of the military and decided to start working on progressive units within the military. We should never treat the military as a counterrevolutionary entity, but should divide the military into two parts: the revolutionary and the counterrevolutionary. The revolutionary part of the military should be included in the ranks of the revolution. Our enemies say that we want to use this tactic to cover up our collusion with the warlords, but we realized that, at that time, this was one way to the revolution and that this tactic was a necessary one. In the past, because of the implementation of this tactic, we gained many beneficial results. There is no mistake in this regard. We should further strengthen our work in the military.

During the May 30 Movement, the middle bourgeoisie had already begun to act independently. Dai Jitao pointed out these facts in his pamphlet. His pamphlet was not published by accident; nor did it represent his own individual views. He wrote in his pamphlet that the bourgeoisie had become a conscious class. This pamphlet must be read.

This kind of theory later crystallized. We know that the bourgeoisie did not stay for long in the revolutionary ranks. Because the strength of the imperialists is very great, the bourgeoisie is certain to compromise with the imperialists. Thus, all the counterrevolutionaries soon betrayed the revolution. At that time, we had already very resolutely opposed Dai Jitao's theory. We began this work as early as July 1925. At the Second Plenum in September [October] 1925 in Beijing, we determined that the proletariat had sufficient strength. The May 30 Movement proved this. The bourgeoisie had felt the danger of the proletariat and joined the ranks of the enemies of the proletariat. Dai Jitao's antiproletarian pamphlet reflected the panic in the ranks of the bourgeoisie. In the plenum's resolution, we pointed out that we should oppose Dai Jitao's theory and ally with the GMD-left to oppose the right [see above, Doc. B.10, section 7, point e]. At the same time, we should also work independently so that we will be prepared once the GMD leaves us. The resolution was drafted with this spirit in mind. When we examine this resolution now, we can see that it contains correct, as well as incorrect, elements. Developing and consolidating the GMD-left to oppose the right was correct; but planning to withdraw from the GMD was an incorrect strategy.¹²⁶ No doubt, as we had no reason to withdraw from the GMD, we should stay in the GMD to continue our work. I myself made a mistake on this issue. The attitude of the Comintern representative on this issue was also vague. Only Comrade Cai Hesen resolutely opposed withdrawal. This resolution made our strategy very ambiguous. As to the question of preparing to withdraw from the GMD, the resolution did not discuss it very clearly.¹²⁷ Such a handling of the question only confused our thoughts. What is being discussed here is the question of preparing for the sake of preparing.

On the question of whether the bourgeoisie moved to compromise, we can see it has by looking at a series of events that occurred during the May 30 Incident in Shanghai. Not only the big bourgeoisie, but also the petty bourgeoisie, has deserted the United Front.

At our party's Fourth Congress we already paid attention to the question of the peasantry. The majority of the peasantry are not landlords or average peasants, but poor peasants and landless peasants [see Doc. B.8]. If there is no alliance between the proletariat and the small landlords, there will be the danger that small landlords will oppose the proletariat. Even the petty bourgeoisie may ally with the small landlords. We have understood the importance of the peasant question as well as the necessity of launching the peasant movement. The facts have proved that without the peasantry, the proletariat will lose its capacity for action. Since the Fourth Party Congress passed the resolution on the peasant question, we have achieved great results not only in Canton but also in the provinces of Henan, Hubei, Hunan, and Jiangxi. Especially in Hubei, our comrades have paid much attention to work among the peasantry and the peasant movement. The peasant movement in Hunan has developed enormously and, under our party's leadership, has organized nearly 10 million peasants.¹²⁸ There is nothing wrong with this strategy, and we must continue to follow it. Peasants now account for 18 percent of the party membership. The majority of the Chinese population are peasants. In my view, in the future, the number of peasants in the party should equal that of workers. In the near future, peasants should account for 30 percent of party membership. Not only should we continue to implement our peasant policies, but also we should continue to recruit peasants into the party.

During the May 30 Movement, there was also the issue of the Hong Kong strike. The strike (and boycott) so damaged Hong Kong that it has not yet recovered. This strike has great significance and actively supported the GMD in terms of eliminating reactionary forces and elements. The strike lasted for over a year, which is an unusual achievement. There were two different views in the party concerning the strike. Some people proposed that the strike should end as soon as possible; others thought this was impossible, because the imperialists themselves were unwilling to end the strike. In terms of principle, the strike should have been ended as soon as possible to overcome these difficulties. Fortunately, our comrades and the GMD-left have done a great job, and international economic assistance also helped. Because of these three conditions, there was no danger. Without these three conditions very serious mistakes would have been committed should the strike have been prolonged. We would have lost the trust of the workers. Now Li Jishen has undermined the Strike Committee in Canton and Hong Kong, but this responsibility does not lie with us.¹²⁹

The second period is from the defeat of Guo Songling to the fall of Nankou; this is a reactionary period.

When Guo Songling came over to our side, the revolution seemed still to be rising. In fact, however, the imperialists had begun their intervention. At that time, the Beijing comrades wanted to organize the "capital revolution." This was a brave but mistaken wish. First, they did not have a clear or correct calculation of the domestic political situation. Second, they forgot the danger of a colonial revolution that is divorced from the armed forces. They did not cooperate with the National Army [Guomin jun]¹³⁰ and wanted to fight independently. Now we can see that such action is naive and, though brave, reckless. This dangerous policy was made by the comrades in the north without permission from the Party Center.

Now let us evaluate the policies during the entire period of the May 30 Movement.

[[The assassination conspiracy that resulted in the death of Liao Zhongkai was the work of reactionary feudal elements after their military defeat. The Party Center felt that the Canton government did not properly explain the circumstances surrounding the crime and the need to punish Hu Hanmin, Xu Chongzhi, and Xiong Kewu. Because no political propaganda was carried out, this incident lost its political significance. The most important incident during this reactionary period was the March 20 coup in Canton.]]

There are many reasons for the March 20 coup, but the most important one is class conflict. The fundamental objective of Dai Jitao-ism is to repress the proletariat and the alliance between the proletariat and the GMD-left. In this period, our party's strategy was not internally consistent. First, the view of our party comrades working in Guangdong and Comrade Borodin was that we should adopt an offensive strategy at that time. They said: "Attacking the GMD-right could consolidate our alliance with the left; not only should we not tolerate the March 20 coup, but we should launch our own March 20 coup.”

At that time, however, the party’s view was that not only was there the thinking of Dai Jitao-ism, but also the armed forces of Chiang Kai-shek, while behind them was the entire bourgeoisie. We did not have sufficient forces to crush Chiang Kai-shek. Therefore, the Party Center resolutely decided on the strategy of retreat and concession. This is to say that we allowed the forces of the bourgeoisie to remain inside the United Front. My view was that the forces of the CP and the GMD-left were not sufficient to crush Chiang Kai-shek, let alone when Chiang Kai-shek had not yet revealed his true reactionary character. At the time, public opinion would not allow us to crush him. Therefore, I think the Party Center’s decision was correct. However, the Chinese personnel working in Guangdong and Comrade Borodin thought that if we did not suppress the GMD-right we would not be able to consolidate our alliance with the left. This view was also correct. Yet before the March 20 coup, neither Borodin nor our Chinese comrades talked to the Party Center about whether we could crush Chiang Kai-shek and assist the left.

Comrade Borodin persisted in believing that members of the CP should withdraw from the Whampoa Military Academy and that, in the future, we should not work inside the military any more. However, previously he made no suggestions about this to the Party Center.

This is to say that he never thought of this problem beforehand and only raised it after the March 20 coup. Crushing Chiang Kai-shek would secure our alliance with the left. This was theoretically correct, but not so in practice, because our political and military forces were insufficient.

This is a very important issue because it involves not only the question of the strategy for dealing with the March 20 coup but also the entire question of the alliance between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie. This comprises specific questions such as how the proletariat should withdraw from the nationalist United Front with the bourgeoisie, when we will not need the bourgeoisie’s assistance and can make revolution independently, and when we can openly attack the bourgeoisie. Now our party is faced with all these questions.

After the defeat of the First Corps of the National Army in Nankou, the Northern Expedition of the Canton troops began, and the revolutionary tide began to rise again. From the occupation of Hunan to the occupation of Shanghai, the peasant movement began to develop in some provinces. After recovering the British concessions in Hankou, the Chinese revolution not only spread all over the country but also threatened the capitalist world.

On the Question of the Northern Expedition

The February 1926 CC meeting in Beijing decided on the issue of the Northern Expedition. However, the Northern Expedition forces did not march north until May. While the Beijing meeting was in session, Wu Peifu had already prepared an attack on Canton.

A Comintern representative came to Shanghai and gave us an analytical report on the political situation in China. At that time, I did not know of the Beijing CC meeting's decisions, but I advocated support of the Northern Expedition because if the Northwest Army suffered a defeat in Nankou the Canton government could hardly continue to exist. The Comintern representative did not agree with me. He said that it was a risky action because the Canton government did not have a powerful army or excellent equipment.¹³¹

At that time, I cabled Beijing, saying: first, we must solve the problem of the Northern Expedition and, second, the Party Center should remain in Beijing.

The Comintern representative went to Canton to investigate the situation there and thus chanced upon the March 20 coup. I cabled Wang Jingwei and Chiang Kai-shek that the Northern Expedition must begin. They agreed with me. After comprehending the situation in Canton, the Comintern representative also thought we must support the Northern Expedition. If the troops did not march north, there would be internal conflicts. To obey Moscow's decision, however, he had to oppose the Northern Expedition.

The Comintern representative also feared that Chiang Kai-shek would exploit and suppress people more severely during the Northern Expedition. If Chiang Kai-shek used the Northern Expedition to suppress and exploit the people, then the first to suffer this scourge would be the people in Guangdong and Guangxi. Therefore, the party's strategy on the Northern Expedition was as follows:

- a) support the Northern Expedition;
- b) the Northern Expedition should be defensive in nature;
- c) the party's strategy is to oppose anybody who attempts to use the Northern Expedition to exploit the people.

Now let us analyze our strategy and mistakes in this period.

a) Although in principle we supported the Northern Expedition, in reality we never used concrete actions resolutely to support it.

b) We treated the Northern Expedition as a defensive measure, which is to say, as a measure to defend Guangdong. Our attitude to the Northern Expedition was negative, so our achievements were small. In the future, we must implement whatever decisions are made in principle; otherwise, there will forever be contradictions between decision and practice.

I add the following to the report:

First, in the reactionary period I am talking about now, the pivotal incident was the March 20 coup, which was the period between the GMD's Second National Congress and the GMD's resolution of 15 May [1926].

Second, I want to talk about our party's anti-imperialist strategies. In the struggle against foreign imperialists, we mainly emphasize struggle against England. The most powerful imperialist countries [present] in China are England, the United States, France, and Japan. Of these, England and Japan possess the greatest strength.

However, there is a great deal of conflict between these two countries. In China, Japan is almost overwhelmed economically by England; but, on the other hand, Japanese troops can be dispatched to China very quickly, so our anti-Japanese struggle is characterized by moderation.

2. On the Role of the Bourgeoisie

[[The roles of the bourgeoisie and the proletariat are identical in each country. The bourgeoisie betrays the revolution at all times and in all places in the process of the struggle. After 20 March we saw that the bourgeoisie had deserted the revolution. When Chiang Kai-shek staged the reactionary military coup in Shanghai, all the bourgeoisie was overjoyed. We cannot say for certain whether the entire bourgeoisie has deserted the revolution, but one thing is certain: since 12 April most of the bourgeoisie has betrayed the revolution.]]

3. Attitude to the Petty Bourgeoisie

[[Although the petty bourgeoisie will probably participate in the democratic dictatorship, they remain wavering elements who sometimes accept the leadership of the bourgeoisie and sometimes that of the proletariat. We always have the need to establish an alliance with the petty bourgeoisie, so we must make some concessions to them and let them accept our leadership.]]

4. The Question of Land

[[Since the second half of last year, the peasant movement has moved on from issues of organization and rent-reduction to the land question.]]

The Question of Strategy in the Peasant Movement

Because the land question has been raised, class conflict in the countryside has become more profound. In a fundamental sense, this has smashed the designs of the landlords. The land issue was raised by the peasant movement as early as last year in the peaceful form of reducing rent and interest. The struggle last year was aimed at big landlords, using the slogan "down with the evil gentry." At that time, the struggle was only against big landlords.

The struggle in Hunan has made great strides forward; at that time the movement was launched to distribute land equally. There the peasants oppose not only big landlords but also those who rent out land and even rich peasants. This movement originated spontaneously. In the past, our party restricted the peasant movement. Now, we must confiscate the land of big and medium landlords. However, we must not confiscate at will the land of small landlords. In the national revolution we need the petty bourgeoisie. Small landlords are part of the petty bourgeoisie, and thus we must make concessions to them.

According to our political program, we should confiscate the land of every landlord, but now we need to establish an alliance with the petty bourgeoisie. So even though I feel that we have been too rightist on this issue in the past, it is still too radical now to confiscate the land of all landlords. For a long period of time, or perhaps for a short period of time, we must maintain a middle road. Certainly, for the next month or so, we must maintain our alliance with the petty bourgeoisie. Class struggle in the countryside is developing, but has not reached its extreme stage, and [we] should not start exploiting small landlords—not yet. Are we to attack big and middle landlords or expand the peasant movement and increase military actions? The question now is: Are we to intensify the peasant revolution right now, or wait to deepen the peasant revolution through the continual progress of the Northern Expedition and the expansion of the peasant movement? I believe that the second course of action is more reliable because the old warlords still exist and there are so-called new warlords, like Chiang Kai-shek. The basis can only be secured after further expansion [of the peasant revolution].

5. The Proletariat's Right of Leadership

[[We should not be pessimistic about the proletariat, as it has exerted great influence over the revolutionary movement. It is wrong to say that the proletariat has not gained the right of leadership. Rather, the proletariat has not yet gained political power.]]

First, the proletariat does not have armed forces with which to seize political power. Second, there is a question as to whether the proletariat possesses enough strength to lead the petty bourgeoisie. If it does not possess such strength, then it will have to act together with the petty bourgeoisie.

Up to now only the proletariat, the petty bourgeoisie, and the peasantry do not have armed forces. The counterrevolutionary acts of Chiang Kai-shek began with betrayal by the bourgeoisie, which is proof that the bourgeoisie has divorced itself from the revolution. Ninety-nine percent of the bourgeoisie has deserted the revolution. Thus, the proletariat must resolutely win over the petty bourgeoisie and peasantry in order to continue the revolution.

Here I want to talk about Shanghai. The Shanghai incident is about the relationship with the petty bourgeoisie. The Shanghai proletariat and its political party have done a great deal of work, but still must increase their efforts to attract the petty bourgeoisie to the proletarian enterprise. The proletariat has fought vigorous struggles, a fact acknowledged by both our enemies and us. However, who is the stronger in these struggles, the petty bourgeoisie or the big bourgeoisie? In numerical terms, they may be considered equals but the petty bourgeoisie constantly wavers while the big bourgeoisie is very resolute. Why don't the Shanghai proletariat act together with the petty bourgeoisie and also recruit some big bourgeois elements? This is a question directly related to the GMD. In my opinion, Shanghai is the greatest proletarian center, but also it is simultaneously the largest center of the bourgeoisie and imperialists. Do the proletariat and the petty bourgeoisie in Shanghai have enough strength to act independently? Or do they have to absorb some bourgeois elements?

The right wing of the bourgeoisie and the General Chamber of Commerce did not participate in the May 30 Movement, but the leftists in the General Chamber of Commerce and the Federation of Street Merchants' Associations [Malu shangjie lianhehui] did. Borodin's opinion is: Shanghai cannot become a revolutionary base; we must establish bases elsewhere and from there strike at the imperialists; in Shanghai, if we are not to conflict with the imperialists, we must compromise with them. In his view, Shanghai can only engage in struggles for improvement in the material conditions of the working class and for the right of association and assembly. He thinks that it is wrong to wage a struggle to seize power in Shanghai because the ruler of Shanghai is not Sun Chuanfang or Li Baozhang, but the imperialists. Borodin's conception of destiny is a mechanical one. However, we should not sneeze at this point, because the view of the ECCI seems to be the same as Borodin's. Previously, I did not think that this view was incorrect, so I did not raise it as an issue for discussion. The Shanghai incident is not only a question of the past, but also of the present and the future. Although now I do not think Borodin's view is entirely wrong, I think we should discuss this question seriously. The Shanghai bourgeoisie has deserted the revolution; Chiang Kai-shek, the bankers, and the industrial bourgeoisie have all divorced themselves from the revolution. There are three points here that need discussion: first, whether the liberal bourgeoisie has not yet completely left the revolution; second, whether the defeat in Shanghai was caused by the participation of the bourgeoisie; third, the view of Borodin, or his northwest theory.

6. Military Force and the Force of Revolutionary Society

This is a very complex problem. I cannot give a detailed summary in this report. At present, the military forces are not from the revolutionary masses, but from the rank and file of the old warlords. At present, we do not have a military force of the masses. We are talking about the old military forces. The source of soldiers is first the honest peasant (there are many peasants in the National Army) and then the urban unemployed. Soldiers come from different classes, and thus their fighting ability differs. Most of the generals are from the landlord class, so they must undergo very effective reforms. If we want to revolutionize the military, we must reduce the number of vagrant proletariat and landlords in the military. If our troops waver, this is not because our political work in the military is not done well, but because of the complex class relations. The military is incapable of fighting for the interests of the workers and peasants. It is liable to accept patriotic theories of a bourgeois nature. The vacillation of the military is a reflection of its social composition. Therefore, from now on, we need to increase greatly our efforts to use proletarian elements in supplementing our work in the military.

7. The Base of Revolution and the Northwest Theory

This theoretical approach is Borodin's. He believes that the southeast is an imperialists' fortress. He uses the Taiping movement as an example to validate his theory.

He says that the Taiping movement failed because it wanted to occupy Shanghai. The Chinese revolution should develop in the northwest, first, because the imperialists' influence there is relatively weak and, second, because a closer relationship can be established there with Soviet Russia. Now, we should discuss this issue. Yesterday a representative¹³² of the ECCI said: we insist on neither the northwest nor the southeast approach; where the GMD regime exists, there we will stay and strengthen our work. This is wrong. The result is that we have no guiding principle on this question. The result is that we have almost become the GMD's tail. The representative thinks that the revolution is the GMD's revolution, and not ours. The Chinese revolution is now our revolution. At least we should work jointly with the GMD. This view [of the representative] is incorrect.

8. The Question of the GMD

Several points should be raised on this question in my report. We must answer the question of what the GMD is. If we do not understand what the GMD is, we cannot explain the many mistakes we have made. At the beginning when we joined the GMD, many comrades said: the GMD is a bourgeois party; if the proletariat joins the GMD, it will betray the working class. Now these comrades are saying: the GMD is a party of the petty bourgeoisie. In fact, the GMD is a multiclass party; it has workers, peasants, and the petty bourgeoisie as well as landlords and warlords. The petty bourgeoisie, particularly intellectuals, comprises the majority of the GMD. Most of its theories are those of the bourgeoisie. Many GMD members interpret Sun Yat-sen's Three Principles in line with the theories of the bourgeoisie. In fact, what they see is only part, not the whole, of the problem. In fact, they do not understand the Chinese revolution. The GMD is a revolutionary alliance of all classes. If the GMD were a party of the pure bourgeoisie or petty bourgeoisie, we would not have joined. In Dai Jitao's view, we should have cooperated with the GMD from outside.

Because the GMD is not a party of the bourgeoisie, or a party of the petty bourgeoisie, but a revolutionary alliance of all classes, we should join the GMD as a member of this alliance. It was precisely on the basis of this theory that we joined the GMD. Now we should ask the questions of what the GMD is and whether it is a revolutionary alliance of all classes. We answer positively: the GMD is a revolutionary alliance of the proletariat, peasantry, and the petty bourgeoisie, even though it has a small number of bourgeois elements. If the part that is composed of the bourgeoisie is counterrevolutionary, we should expel it from the party. Since the proletariat, the peasantry, and the petty bourgeoisie have united in an alliance of revolutionary classes, how can this alliance exist if the proletariat refuses to join the GMD? Previously, we thought that the GMD was a party of the bourgeoisie and the petty bourgeoisie, but now we think it is a joint party of the proletariat, the peasantry, and the petty bourgeoisie. If the bourgeoisie headed by Chiang Kai-shek remains in the ranks of the GMD, this alliance cannot be a secure one. Whether this alliance will be solid in the future depends on the following conditions: (a) whether the GMD is willing to let the bourgeoisie remain among its ranks; (b) whether the GMD will gain the support of the peasantry and the petty bourgeoisie. Under the leadership of the proletariat, the peasantry and the petty bourgeoisie can become allies of the GMD; the bourgeoisie cannot; (c) the GMD cannot become a secure party if no peasants join it and it is composed only of the petty bourgeoisie. This is because under the flag of the Nationalist government and the GMD Party Center, there is only a small group of businessmen, while the majority of workers and peasants are under our control. Such a union cannot be consolidated.

9. The Question of Reforming the Military

[[We must change the social composition of the military to revolutionize it. More workers and peasants must join and officers should not be selected from the officer class.]]

10. Establish a Revolutionary Democratic Regime

[[A revolutionary democratic regime must be set up in areas occupied by the national government. If imperialist and warlord interference declines, we should set up such a regime in Hunan, Hubei, and Jiangxi. Within the territories governed by warlords, we must first start the revolution and then consider setting up a revolutionary democratic regime. Only after Wang Jingwei's return to this country did the government begin to become an alliance between the proletariat and the GMD-left. It would be a mistake to consider this government a democratic dictatorship of workers, peasants, and the petty bourgeoisie. It merely tends in that direction.]]

11. Financial and Economic Policies

[[We need a new financial and economic policy to replace the feudal warlord system. Without this, we will not be able to seize and hold political power. If we cannot correctly solve the problem of economic policy, we will lose every revolutionary center.]]

Report on the Inner-Party Situation

Since the Fourth Party Congress, our party has expanded together with the revolutionary movement, and party work has made progress. The number of party members has also increased. Before the Fourth Party Congress, there were only 494 party members; now the number has risen to 57,967. According to March statistics, the social composition of party membership is as follows: workers, 53.8 percent; peasants, 18.7; intellectuals, 19.1; military personnel, 3.1; middle and small merchants, 0.5; and other social categories, 4.2 percent. Women account for 20 percent of the party. The number of party members in each area is as follows: Hunan, 13,000; Hubei, 13,000; Jiangsu (including Shanghai), 13,000; Guangdong, 9,027; the northern district, 3,109; Jiangxi, 3,000; Shangan, 388; Shandong, 1,925; Fujian, 168; Manchuria (including Shenyang), 380; Northern Manchuria, 137; Anhui, 233; Sichuan, 200; the total of the above comes to 57,967 [57,567]. In various districts, there are eight area committees [quwei] directly under the leadership of the Party Center: (a) the Hunan area committee, including Hengyang; (b) the Hubei area committee, including Xiangyang; (c) the Jiang[su]-Zhe[jiang] area committee, including the areas along the railway in Anhui Province; (d) the Guangdong area committee, including Guangxi, Yunnan, Fujian, and Nanyang [the South China Sea]; (e) the Northern area committee, which includes the following provinces: Jilin, Shanxi, Chahar, Jehol, and Suiyuan; (f) the Jiangxi area committee; (g) the Henan area committee; (h) the Shangan area committee. There are six district committees [diwei]: (a) Shandong, (b) Fujian, (c) South Manchuria, (d) North Manchuria, (e) Anhui, and (f) Sichuan. There are four couriers who are stationed in Moscow, Vladivostok, Paris, and Japan. There are an estimated 2.8 million labor union members in the mass organizations led by the party. At the time of the Fourth Party Congress, only a minority of railway workers and miners in Tangshan and Shanghai were under our leadership. Now we have 9.72 million members in peasant associations. At the time of the Fourth Party Congress, only 200,000 organized peasants in Guangdong were under our leadership. There are nearly 420 student unions. At the time of the Fourth Party Congress, the number of student unions led by the CYL was only sixty. Now we have 35,000 CYL members; at the time of the Fourth Party Congress, the number was only 2,365.

Now let me talk about the political situation of individual areas. (a) The areas under the rule of the GMD-left are: Hunan, Hubei, Jiangxi, Shanxi (in the north-west), and Gansu. In these areas, the workers' and peasant movement can develop freely. (b) The areas under the rule of the GMD-right are: Jiangsu, Zhejiang, Anhui, Fujian, Guangdong, and Sichuan. In these provinces, the mass movement has been extinguished, and fascism reigns. (c) The areas controlled by the Fengtian clique are the north, Henan, and Shandong, as well as north and south Manchuria. In these areas, the mass movement has met with repression. Our work is still continuing, and nine CC members are not enough. What makes the work of the Party Center even more difficult is that the nine CC members are often unable to work together. Only two or three CC members work together in the Party Center, and sometimes there is only one. Thus the phenomenon of one-person rule has occurred at the Party Center. The best work the Party Center has done is in propaganda; the worst is in organization. Representatives to the Fourth Party Congress criticized the work of the Organization Department. After the Fourth Party Congress, I took charge of the Organization Department. Later, the Organization Department ceased to exist in reality, because neither I nor anybody else worked inside the Organization Department. Not too long ago the Party Center appointed Zhou Enlai to take over the Organization Department, but then the Shanghai incident happened, so Comrade Zhou took over military responsibility. As a result, organization work stopped again. Comrade Li Lisan can be counted as one of the members of the workers' committee, but in fact he did not participate in any work. Mao Zedong and other members of the peasant committee divided up their own areas but, at first, they did no work. However, now they are all concentrated in Wuhan and have begun to work. They have discussed the land program. Propaganda work is done relatively well, but in practice, they have mainly worked on publications. The CC newspaper is published on time, and over ten books have been published. The military committee only did technical work. The women's committee only increased the number of announcements, which is not bad. The workers' committee and the peasant committee did not even issue a single announcement. In general, the Party Center is not very complete. At present, our party does not have a perfect organization, but rather is composed of individual communist groups. Local organizations are better than the Party Center. If this situation does not change, we will have only provincial parties. At this Party Congress we must appoint many more comrades to work in the Party Center; otherwise, we will face dangers. In terms of organizational work, it is most important to make the Party Center strong and effective. If the situation continues like this, which is to say that the leading organ of the party cannot become a stronger and more effective institution, the situation in lower-level organizations will be very bad.

If we only rely on district and area committees to lead all work, our party's situation will resemble that of the Korean party. Now, the role played by the branches is not great. In factories and schools, the branch is not the center of our work; it only calls meetings and organizes reports. Therefore, the branch is an organization that only relays views and commands of superior agencies, but is not a working institution. At this Party Congress, we must decide to strengthen the Party Center and turn the branch into a real working organization. In our party's work, we must raise these two issues. Work by the Propaganda Department over the past two years cannot be called propaganda work. In reality, it only carried out publishing work. Thus, our party's newspaper, the Guide Weekly, is published on time no matter what, and its number [published] is gradually increasing. At the time of the Fourth Party Congress, the number published was only 7,000. At the beginning of the Northern Expedition, it increased to 50,000.

[[New Youth was published five times, and sixteen books have been translated.]]

As can be seen, the main work of the Propaganda Department has been publishing, not propaganda and agitation. The Propaganda Department does not have a work plan; nor does it give notices to local committees; nor does it report to the Party Center about its work. Very few propaganda materials have been published, but there are many materials for agitation. For example, in Jiangsu, Hunan, Guangdong, and Zhejiang Provinces, we have published many pamphlets; the number has increased from 90,000 to 400,000. However, these printed materials were not well distributed. For example, we have 100,000 copies of appeals, but people read fewer than 50,000 copies. Numerically speaking, there are many materials for agitation, but they are not well utilized. Sometimes in Shanghai books are piled up without anybody reading them. The distribution of materials and printed matter is very bad, with the result that propaganda and agitation work has not been fulfilled properly. Internal education in the party has fallen behind the development of the party. From now on, the Propaganda Department should do the following: (a) strengthen the central Propaganda Department and make it more effective; (b) establish close relations between local propaganda committees and the central Propaganda Department; (c) expand our translation work; (d) improve the distribution of books and materials; (e) [resolve] the question of the party school. Now our party needs to establish a party school. There are two views on this issue: first, the Party Center wants to establish a party school and, second, all localities also want to establish party schools. If the Party Center founds a party school, its lecturers will be better; if all localities establish party schools, that will be more convenient. In my opinion, the first view is better. The Party Center has a plan to found a party school with two departments and 500 people. In general, this work now is very important. If we can defend Wuhan resolutely and remain there, we will establish our party school there. We must publish a party daily newspaper. After the Party Congress, we will start publishing this type of newspaper.

Now let me talk about the labor movement in China. Although the Party Center's workers' committee is not strong, several localities have paid a great deal of attention to this kind of work. The best achievement is the general strike in Hong Kong. Further, we also gained great results in Shanghai, Hubei, and Hunan, especially in Hunan. The shortcoming is that the Party Center's workers' committee lacks a unified leadership, so that the national labor movement has no unified plan. After the Party Congress, we should correct our mistakes. No matter whether it is in the Center's workers' committee or the party and league groups in labor unions, they should all have unified leadership. At the First National Labor Congress, we had 290,000 organized workers. At the Second National Labor Congress, we had 540,000. When the Third Congress convened on May Day last year, we had 1.25 million organized workers. The current number of organized workers in various areas is given below: Jiangsu and Zhejiang, 1.3 million; Hubei, 400,000; Hunan, 393,791; Canton, 520,000; north, 10,000; Shandong, 5,000; Jiangxi, 130,000; sailors, 80,000. Altogether there are 2,838,791 workers.

This year the number of organized workers has increased 100 percent over last year. The labor movement has also been growing gradually and becoming stronger. This is the result of strengthening this work by our party's organizations everywhere. Now we need a unified policy and work plan for the labor unions. This is the first priority of our Party Congress. Our comrades worked in the labor movement long before our party was founded. Our own labor movement has a history of five years.

The Peasant Movement

Our comrades were already working among the peasantry a long time ago. For example, Comrade Peng Pai worked among the peasant masses in Guangdong many years ago. The party's work directed at the peasantry has been going on for two years. According to available statistics, the number of organized peasants is as follows: Hunan, 5,204,112; Hubei, 1,714,000; Jiangsu and Zhejiang, 230,000; Guangdong, 1.2 million; north, 20,000; Jiangxi, 300,000; Henan, 1 million; Shangan, 116,000; Anhui, 8,300; Sichuan, 37,000. This totals 9,829,412. The number of organized peasants is larger than that of organized workers. From now on, we should expand the peasant movement and increase the number of members in peasant associations.

The Youth Movement

At the time of the Fourth Party Congress, there were more members of the Youth League than party members; but now there are more party than League members. There are fewer organized young people than organized people in the older generation because, first, the Center of the CYL is not very strong and, second, we have removed many personnel from the CYL to do party work. This reduced the number of cadres in the League. At present, not all the people in the league are young. Even some of the Young Pioneers are over the age limit. Thus, the youth league should work among the young. The Youth League must become younger, as must the Young Pioneers. If all League members are young, it will be impossible for the party to snatch away personnel from them. However, in the past the party paid little attention to the League. The party is to blame for this. Both the party and the League are afraid that the other will steal the other's personnel.

B.26 Resolution on the Land Question (May 1927)¹³³

1. The Significance of the Land Question

a) Economic life in the Chinese countryside is based primarily on feudal relationships. Most of the land (about 66 percent) is owned by large rentier landlords. Tenants and semitenants farm the land, but do not enjoy landownership. The form of rent is not definitive; even tenancy rights cannot be enjoyed forever. The rent accounts for almost 50 percent of the peasants' total income. Moreover, peasants also have to pay all kinds of taxes and levies to the landlord class and warlord rulers who control political power.

Only 34 percent of the land in China belongs to the peasantry. Large-scale capitalist agriculture is virtually nonexistent except in some northern provinces such as Shandong and Manchuria. However, the arable land owned by monasteries and temples is quite considerable. The system of public land disappeared a long time ago, but the system of management of public land still remains in the countryside as the basis for the traditional clan-based political power. Ownership rights of such land have already been usurped by the gentry: the tiller has lost the rights of ownership, while the gentry-turned-landlords use such rights to exercise the traditional authority and rule of a clan-based society.

Warlord rule is also built on such land relations, since the power of the landlord class really enables the feudal political system to maintain the crucial characteristics of its economic and political organizations as well as its administrative system.

b) At the same time, capitalist exploitation in its early stage has already penetrated the rural economy. Therefore, the Chinese peasantry suffers two kinds of exploitation simultaneously: one is precapitalist (feudal) exploitation; the other is capitalist exploitation. As a result, the Chinese peasants are increasingly impoverished, and the national economic system is particularly backward.

Rent extracted by the landlord class is particularly high, so high that the tillers do not have a surplus after the harvest. What they get is not enough to meet their daily needs. This is exploitation by capitalism in its early stage. With such exploitation, the peasantry cannot improve its production methods, with the result that Chinese agriculture has remained in its primitive state. In fact, it is equivalent to the slave system. The peasants produced only for consumption, with the rest going into the landlord's pocket.

Capitalist exploitation is built on this feudal relationship. The rents collected by the landlords mostly consist of grains (also a legacy of the feudal system); most of the surplus of agricultural products ends up in the hands of the landlords. The landlords thus become commercial capitalists, although the primitive nature of feudalism hampers the tendency toward full-fledged capitalism. The assets accumulated through the primitive methods of exploitation fail to be converted into productive capital, and instead are mainly used to buy land and for speculative activities such as usury.

Economic backwardness obstructs the construction of new transportation mechanisms. Economic fragmentation exists throughout the entire country; it divides the country into many isolated markets, which are controlled by the landlords who plunder surplus agricultural goods. In this situation, the landlord class can use coercion to raise prices. Not only the peasantry, but also the urban petty bourgeoisie and the proletariat are victims of plunder. The proletariat, earning the lowest wages, has to pay the highest price for food; even small merchants have become victims of the monopoly and speculation of the landlord class.

The usury system developed quickly under such complex and primitive forms of exploitation. This is the only trading system and the only capitalist method of accumulation. However, the capital of the usurers cannot promote commerce or industry, but is consistently used for land speculation. This cruel collection of land rent and other forms of feudal oppression, capitalist exploitation through high interest rates, and the extraction by the warlord administrations have trapped the peasantry in a situation of perpetual starvation.

Warlords control supreme power in most provinces. Their ruling organs exploit ordinary peasants via a variety of forms. The most effective are as follows:

- i) Formal taxes and cruel taxes (collection of money and grain ahead of time).
- ii) Military supplies (rice, food, shoes, boots, horses, etc.).
- iii) Cruel requisition during wartime.
- iv) Corvée labor (to transport military supplies).
- v) Irresponsible printing of worthless paper currency (military coupons).
- vi) Collection of levies.

c) Imperialist rule obstructs the development of the Chinese economy. Consequently, Chinese manufacturing industries are particularly backward, which in turn results in excess population in the countryside. Moreover, the phenomenon of excess rural population is sufficient to prolong the survival of the system of exploitation by feudal warlords. It is clear that imperialist aggression is closely connected with the problem of the peasantry in China.

The imperialists pursue colonial expansion to look for cheap raw materials for the industries in their countries, and to find markets for their goods. Labor is the most valuable material. Colonial and semicolonial countries are full of armies of reserve labor who certainly form the basis for manufacturing industries in the imperialist countries. As a result, imperialist rule has caused the industries in colonial countries to become backward. Thus, the colonial countries remain in a permanent state of primitive agricultural production. Therefore, modern industrial development is thwarted and rural labor cannot move into the cities. Such a regressive phenomenon has caused an excessive surplus of rural residents and perpetuated feudal economic life. If this were not the case, the development of modern industry would have smashed them [feudal lords] a long time ago.

The excessive surplus of rural population caused by the imperialists prolongs the feudal system and its exploitation. The continuous increase in bankrupt peasants swells the ranks of the troops, forcing laborers' wages down to the minimum. The foundation of imperialism is thus much strengthened. The combination of these factors causes extreme poverty and desolation among the peasantry. Unemployed peasants, a labor force that cannot find an outlet for its productive capacity, become bandits and mercenary soldiers. The Chinese warlords are indeed a unique social phenomenon. Their origins lie in the incompleteness and fragmentation of the national economy. Warlords are a violent manifestation of feudal forces and tools of the imperialists. These warlords will ally with compradores, landlords, the gentry, and usurers to form a huge machine to forge the reactionary feudal exploitation and primitive capitalist exploitation into steel that is used to squeeze the peasantry. This machine sucks out the blood and sweat of the peasantry. On this basis, the imperialists can perfect their capitalist plunder.

Economic bankruptcy forces the peasantry into the iron grip of the usurers; the rising interest rates forever trap the peasantry in debt and finally compel them to sell or pawn their land. Gradually, land is concentrated in the hands of the usurers. Moreover, the imperialists, compradores, and local tyrants seize this advantage to monopolize raw materials. For example, they make loans to the peasantry and force them to pay with raw materials at a very cheap price. This is also a form of very cruel exploitation. At the same time, the imperialists, like the Christian Church and agricultural companies, purchase land directly at very cheap prices. Moreover, this form of exploitation is a manifestation of the imperialists' colonial policy.

d) The Chinese warlords suck out the nation's lifeblood. Foreign imperialists obstruct the development of Chinese politics and the economy. Both have their base in the feudal organizations in the countryside. Therefore, for the Chinese people to overthrow the warlords and imperialists, the fundamental condition is to get rid of the remnant feudal forces and traditional political regimes in the countryside. The only principle of the national revolution is to change the system of landownership drastically. Otherwise, the war of freedom fought for the genuine rights of the people will stagnate. In order to eliminate the organizations of the warlords and imperialists at the top, one must first destroy their foundations.

e) The Chinese peasantry accounts for the absolute majority of China's population. Without its spontaneous and conscious participation, the national revolution will not succeed. The energies of the peasantry will certainly contribute to the national revolution—if the extractive mechanisms oppressing the peasantry can be thoroughly removed. The peasant revolution—with the destruction of the feudal system—is inseparable from a revolution that establishes a system of democracy. In the conventional development of society, the bourgeoisie can help the peasantry to smash the chains of feudalism. However, such conventional social evolution has been disrupted by imperialist aggression in China. The Chinese bourgeoisie has not yet become an antifeudal element. Since the bourgeoisie emerged from the landlord class, it still maintains close connections with the landlord class and even becomes the imperialists' tool for dominating the Chinese people (such as compradores). Under these two circumstances, the Chinese bourgeoisie has intimate ties with the forces that exploit the peasantry. Therefore, it is incapable of becoming a fighter in the peasant revolution. The Chinese bourgeoisie is hostile to the peasant revolution. It is not only incapable of fighting for democracy, but has become the enemy of democracy and freedom (the splintering of Chiang Kai-shek from the revolution is one example).

Peasants will be supported by the proletariat (they will also have the petty bourgeoisie as their assistants) in participating in this historic war to destroy the feudal forces and their followers.

The Chinese national bourgeoisie objectively opposes the imperialists' attempts to attain economic monopoly in China. The imperialists' monopoly is the primary cause maintaining feudal relations in the countryside. However, the national bourgeoisie maintains a close relationship with the feudal forces. Even though it benefits the class, it is incapable of fulfilling the land revolution in order to promote the struggle against imperialism.

f) The ways in which an economy is affected by feudal forms of exploitation during the early stage of capitalism include rising food prices and stagnation in commerce. These two effects are felt both by the proletariat and the petty bourgeoisie. Therefore, these two classes oppose exploitation of the peasantry. Drastic reform in the countryside returns the land to the tiller; not only peasants benefit; all the people benefit. The rise in the standard of living for the masses of peasants will boost the development of commerce enormously. If the tillers can enjoy the surplus of their products, the iron grip of the creditors will be weakened. Peasants can use the capital accumulated from [the sale of] agricultural products to improve farming methods and tools. Consequently, the nation's total agricultural output will certainly result in a free market and lower retail prices. Finally, thanks to the abolition of the system of feudal rent, state taxes can open up new sources.

g) Only by returning land to the tiller unconditionally can the abolition of feudal exploitation be accomplished. The gentry's right to manage the land of the so-called public temples and churches must be annulled in order to destroy the political power of rural traditional society. To guarantee the implementation of the drastic rural reforms, peasants must control political power in the villages; the armed forces in the countryside must be transferred back to the peasantry from the control of the gentry. After the unemployed peasants obtain land or engage in productive work, the disease of warlords will no longer exist in China. The phenomenon of usury will also be eliminated because of the destruction of its economic foundation. The establishment of the state agricultural bank and credit unions will certainly deprive usurers of any effectiveness. This kind of struggle to overthrow exploitation through high interest rates is also an important revolutionary enterprise in the countryside. All these efforts are mutually related and cannot be separated. Only by engaging in these efforts to liberate the masses of peasants from the exploitation of feudal tradition can the success of the revolution be guaranteed.

The CCP's Fifth Congress believes that the land problem can only be solved through a thorough redistribution of land under the principle of equal rights of land usage. In order to attain this goal, land must be nationalized. The CCP will lead the peasantry in struggles for equal land rights and work hard toward the nationalization of land and abolition of the system of private ownership of land. On the land question, nationalization is the fundamental principle of the CCP's political program.

2. The Tendencies in the Chinese Peasant Movement

a) According to the experiences in Guangdong, Hunan, and Jiangxi, the backbone of the Chinese peasant movement is primarily poor peasants (tenants, semi-tenants, hired hands, and self-tilling peasants owning a little land). This social basis of the peasant movement clearly indicates that the future of the peasant movement will certainly be a land revolution. At present, the most pressing tendency of the movement is to abolish the political power of traditional feudalism and replace it with the political power of the peasantry. Naturally, the question of an armed peasant force in this struggle is a very important one. In line with this general tendency, several areas have already progressed to the point of beginning to solve the land problem.

b) There are now many differences in the stage of development of the peasant movement in various provinces. In the northern provinces, under the warlords' ruthless oppression and exploitation, peasant associations are still being organized secretly, and have not expanded greatly. In Jiangsu, Anhui, Zhejiang, and Fujian, the peasant movement is still in the embryonic stage; the struggles to reduce rent, resist taxes, oppose exploitation through usurious interests, and fight local tyrants and the gentry have begun. However, it has encountered Chiang Kai-shek's reactionary oppression. The peasant movement in Guangdong was the first to develop. However, although objectively the peasants have progressed long ago from the slogan of rent-reduction to demands for political power and an armed force, or even land, our party did not have a definitive and consistent policy to lead the Guangdong peasants during their two years of fierce struggle. The reaction by Li Jishen has now placed the Guangdong peasantry under enormous oppression; the counterattack by local tyrants and the evil gentry has become more vicious. Jiangxi, Hunan, and Hubei are under the revolutionary national government. Although the peasants in Jiangxi have already begun the initial struggles for rent reduction, generally speaking, they are still in the stage of organization and concentration of power. This is because Jiangxi was under the rule of Chiang Kai-shek's forces for a long time and experienced two struggles of power transition between leftist and rightist regimes. At the moment, the stage of the development of the peasant movement can be said to be at its highest in Hunan and Hubei, particularly in Hunan. In Hunan, not only have the peasants virtually overthrown the political control of local tyrants and the gentry, but they have also shaken their power. Moreover, they are going to establish their own political power; in some places, peasants have even joined the county government. In addition, the struggle by the Hunan and Hubei peasants has begun to solve the land problem—by confiscating the land of local tyrants and the evil gentry, as well as through the movement for land redistribution.

c) The peasant movement in China is mostly under the guidance of the proletariat; without the leadership of the proletariat, it cannot develop in the correct revolutionary direction. However, the Red Spear Society, Hard Belly Society, and others are also another form of the peasant movement. These are medieval organizations and forms of struggle. In places where class lines are not distinct enough, as in Henan, they often have landlords and local tyrants as their leaders; some are even used by the counterrevolutionaries. However, when they resist warlords, resist levies and taxes, and oppose county governors in the interest of the small peasantry, these [societies] are truly revolutionary.

d) When the peasant movement is developing, naturally the reactionary political power of traditional feudalism (the so-called local tyrants, the evil gentry, and corrupt officials) does all it can to oppress it. They connive with warlords and use their own armed forces (like the local police and militia) and bandits to attack and slaughter the peasants in an attempt to repress the peasant movement. However, under the revolutionary regime of the national government, the peasant movement can gain considerable freedom. Therefore, when, under certain conditions, the peasant movement develops quickly and becomes a major force, the forces of the local tyrants and the gentry are weakened enormously. As a result, they put up passive resistance and conspired to undermine the movement, such as transporting rice out of the local areas, refusing to make loans, or pretending to be peasants and organizing false peasant associations. Under the reactionary forces of the Chiang Kai-shek clique, only this kind of so-called peasant association organized by the local tyrants and gentry can exist. Even under the national government, local tyrants and the gentry ally with the feudal elements among the military and conspire to counterattack the peasants. Therefore, at present, the struggle in the country is indeed very fierce.

e) Initially, the peasant struggle generally consists of rent-reduction, tax strikes, reduction of interest, and other forms of struggle against the gentry's oppression. However, the subsequent development of the peasant movement often immediately progresses to the point of overthrowing the political power of the local tyrants and gentry and seizing armed forces, and even to the point of armed conflict. During wartime, from the very beginning, the peasant struggle becomes a political force for the overthrow of the local tyrants and gentry. This is because the peasantry must have its own armed forces and political power in order to gain land and enforce rent-reduction. Therefore, the peasantry's struggle must pass through a period of fierce attack on traditional feudal forces. In the course of such violent revolutionary struggles, the poor peasants are always the backbone. In fact, the peasants' revolutionary regime must have poor peasants as leaders. This kind of movement to overthrow feudal political power and establish the peasants' own political power, objectively speaking, begins with solution of the land problem as its goal. The Chinese peasants, particularly poor peasants, feel deeply the scarcity of land and exploitation in the form of rent and levies. Their goal in carrying out revolutionary struggles is to control political power themselves and to take back the larger share of their income expropriated by the landlords—from reducing rent to giving the land to the tiller and equal landownership.

f) During the current stage of the revolution, the peasant movement—the class struggle by the rural peasants against the local tyrants and gentry—experiences great disparity in terms of its development nationwide. However, the general tendency now is that it is the period for the destruction of traditional feudal political power and the beginning of the solution to the land problem. This is the principal characteristic of the new stage of the Chinese Revolution. Now, the expansion of class struggle in the countryside and the deepening of the peasant revolution will not only completely exterminate the tools of imperialist rule, but also severely undermine the economic basis of the reactionary feudal elements and the big bourgeoisie, thus depriving the imperialists of the basis on which to organize a counter-revolutionary movement. This is to say that the current tendency of the revolutionary movement is to overthrow the political power of the local tyrants and gentry, confiscate the land of the big landlords and counterrevolutionaries, use the poor peasants as the backbone to establish the political power of the peasantry, improve the economic status of the peasantry, and redistribute the land.

3. The Peasant Program in the National Revolution

Following the above analysis, the objective conditions for the peasant movement and its subjective strength can be discerned. The CCP's Fifth Congress resolves that during the current stage of the revolution, the following strategies are needed [to solve] the peasant question:

a) Confiscate all so-called public land, buildings, schools, temples, foreign churches, and the land of agricultural corporations; give the land to the peasants; management of the confiscated land should be turned over to the land commission [tudi weiyuanhui]. The land commission determines the form of management of such land—whether to establish state ownership or redistribute it to the peasants.

b) (i) Confiscate, with no compensation, the land rented to peasants by the landlord; authorize the land commission to give the land to the peasants who farm it. (ii) Do not confiscate the land of small landlords. (iii) Do not confiscate the land now owned by revolutionary soldiers. (iv) Landless revolutionary soldiers may receive land to till after the completion of the revolutionary battles.

c) Peasants who till confiscated land do not pay any taxes except for progressive land taxes to the government. The rate of rent on land not yet confiscated should be reduced to the equivalent level of the progressive land tax. Peasants who till land not yet confiscated pay only the determined rent, but no other taxes; they enjoy permanent tenancy rights.

d) Abolish all political power and rights of the landlords and gentry. Establish peasant township and village autonomous governments [nongmin de xiangcun zizhi zhengfu] accountable to all meetings of rural residents organized by all the oppressed classes in the countryside. Peasant associations participate in the creation of democratic county governments.

e) Disband the armed forces of the rural reactionary forces. Organize peasant self-defense corps to safeguard the victory of the autonomous governments and the revolution.

f) Establish a state agricultural bank and peasant consumption, production, and credit cooperatives; improve irrigation.

g) Annul interest on usurious debts. Limit exploitation through high interest rates. Set maximum interest rates.

B.27 Resolution on the Labor Movement (May 1927)¹³⁴

1) The development of the labor movement in the past two years and its current situation

[[The last two years have witnessed a recovery in the labor movement. Economically, working conditions have improved very visibly. The move to participating in politics fully demonstrates the leading role of the proletariat. The dramatic progress of the labor movement has greatly frightened the bourgeoisie, and it has begun to betray the revolution.]]

2) The new policies for the labor movement

The party's political resolution has pointed out that the "Chinese bourgeoisie" has already committed treason and that the Chinese revolution will develop in a non-capitalist future under the coalition political power of the workers, peasants, and petty bourgeoisie.¹³⁵ Under the party's general policy, the labor movement should naturally have new policies. Their chief characteristics are:

First, launch fierce political and economic attacks against the bourgeoisie, including demands for the confiscation of all banks, mines, railways, ships, large enterprises, and large factories, and their nationalization.

Second, demand [workers'] participation in the management and supervision of production in state-owned industries, so that state-owned industries may develop in a noncapitalist direction and avoid bureaucratization.

Third, demand that the government implement a policy favorable to labor, issue laws protecting labor and factory laws, lay down a system of an eight-hour workday and a minimum wage, so that the workers' standard of living will rise. These should be primary objectives of the labor department. Supervisory agencies should be set up to oversee the implementation of these laws.

Fourth, demand a social insurance system—relief for unemployed workers—and construct workers' housing and public cafeterias.

Fifth, demand the establishment of state-owned stores and sell all staple goods (food and fuel) through them; develop cooperatives and other organizations.

Sixth, local labor union federations in all areas should propose general programs for action by workers as the goals for the working-class struggle.

Seventh, develop a nationally consistent political and economic struggle; all national labor unions in different industrial sectors should raise overall economic demands.

The above seven principles constitute the backbone of the labor movement. Within the areas governed by the Nationalist government, we should step up our struggle to speed up their materialization. [In areas] under the Chiang Kai-shek regime (bourgeois regime) and under warlord regimes in the north, [we] should do all we can to propagandize them. Whenever possible, [we] should raise the demands contained in the general programs proposed by labor unions at different levels. (Naturally, [we] should pay special attention to the most pressing needs of the working class at the present time.) Only this can boost the revolutionary courage of the working class and resist the infection of bourgeois reformism. Only this can safeguard the economic development of noncapitalism.

3) Economic struggles

In the past, some places (such as Beijing, Tianjin, and Tangshan during the anti-Fengtian war) overemphasized political struggles and neglected the workers' economic struggles. As a result, this diminished the workers' understanding of and courage for political struggle, as well as negatively affecting organizational development. This is our valuable experience. Therefore, as noted in the Fourth Congress resolution, only by raising the workers' economic demands can we stimulate the workers' courage for political struggle. This is extremely correct. Because economic struggles form the daily life of labor unions, only they can attract the majority of the masses and strengthen the organizations of the masses. In future operations, this deserves our special attention. Under Chiang Kai-shek's rule, there is a tendency to organize yellow labor unions to implement reformism. We should do our best to raise the economic demands of the workers and develop economic struggles to attack these yellow labor unions, so that the workers will not be deceived by reformism and our influence among the masses may be increased. Under warlord rule in the north, of course, there is no possibility of organizing [the workers] openly and struggling. Yet we should pay attention to the pressing miseries of the daily life of the workers and develop isolated struggles by the workers. Whenever possible, we still need to launch large-scale struggles to enable the workers to unite during these movements. In terms of propaganda, however, we still must raise general economic demands to attract the masses. The worker masses in Wuhan have been through one economic struggle; but the capitalists continually raise prices, so that the workers' lives have improved very little. There has even been starvation, with the result that some people have developed a negative attitude toward political struggle. This is a huge crisis in the labor movement. The methods for overcoming this crisis are, on the one hand, raise the workers' economic demands and continue the struggle and, on the other hand, demand that the government regulate prices and set up state stores to sell all staple goods. Another crisis is the use of the threat of revolutionary danger to limit the workers' struggle. This will turn the working class into a tool of the other classes. We should do all we can to fight this view.

Since the development of economic strikes, the bourgeoisie and their representatives propose the view of "the strike cycle," with the hope of undermining the working class. Even some of the GMD-left have been swayed by this argument. One must know that inflation is not caused by strikes but has its own fundamental causes—the relationship between supply and demand as well as the effect of politics and war. Therefore, we should carry out extensive propaganda based on facts to fight such views.

The workers' struggles in handicraft factories and shops have become a very important issue today. Many people believe that in order to maintain our alliance with the petty bourgeoisie, such struggles must be stopped. This may overcorrect the problem. The workers' alliance with the petty bourgeoisie and their leadership of the latter can never be achieved through unilateral passive concessions, but through positive measures such as increasing the anti-imperialist movement, by struggling against the big bourgeoisie, and by continuously promoting the interests of the petty bourgeoisie and expanding the demands of ordinary urban residents. Therefore, our attitude toward the workers' struggles in handicraft factories and shops [artisans] is still positive support, so that we can win over these masses. First, the number of the industrial proletariat in China is too small; [our] strength can only be increased by completely uniting artisans and shop clerks around the industrial proletariat. Second, the life of artisans and most shop clerks is extremely miserable. They can be organized only through developing economic struggles. Third, the working relationship of artisans and most of the shop clerks is generally a feudal one of a slave nature. Without struggle, the shackles of feudalism cannot be smashed. In particular, in the nonindustrial areas (counties, municipalities, and towns), although artisans and shop clerks are representatives of the proletariat and should be the leading force in local politics there, they are restrained by the petty bourgeoisie through the use of feudal mentalities and power. We should organize them to become a leading force in the political struggle. Of course, in the struggles of artisans and shop clerks, we should pay attention to the economic ability of the capitalists, and the demands raised should not exceed their ability. In the struggles for collective contracts, considerable concessions are to be made according to objective conditions.

In state-owned industries where labor unions participate in management, there will be a tendency against economic struggle. The origin of this tendency lies in the fact that the elements in the government who represent the bourgeoisie want to develop these state-owned industries according to their interests while restricting the interests of the working class. Also, some people mistakenly think that these state-owned industries are already part of a socialist economy (the working class's own industry). This tendency not only attempts to lower the standard of living of the working class, but will also affect the development of the future of the noncapitalist economy. We should do our utmost to fight this tendency. Only when the standard of living for the working class rises with the development of the state-owned industries can the future of the noncapitalist economy be guaranteed. Therefore, in the labor unions within these state-owned industries, we should pay attention to the development of these industries and work hard to raise the economic demands of the progressive workers.

After the publication of the Labor Protection Law [Laodong baohu fa], monitoring of the enforcement of this law will become one of the main responsibilities of the labor union. The union should beware of the capitalists' deception aimed at the workers and lodge protests, on the workers' behalf, to the supervisory agencies at any time, so that the life of the working class may be truly protected and improved by such laws.

4) Organizational questions

At present, labor union organization has several critical weaknesses: first, it is dispersed and disorganized both vertically (industry-wide unions) and horizontally (local unions). Until now, there are only some nationwide general sectoral unions such as for sailors, railway workers, and postal workers, and they have no strength. The Chinese Federation of Labor Unions has completely failed in its responsibility of leading the subordinate unions; it even has no relations with them. Although power is relatively centralized in local federations of labor unions in various areas, the organization of these unions is also extremely loose. Therefore, the first organizational responsibility of the labor movement is to strengthen the Chinese Federation of Labor Unions and to consolidate and establish all kinds of general sectoral labor unions by merging many small unions into powerful sectoral unions. Second, many unions have strong guild characteristics; some have merely replaced the guild organization with the sign of a labor union. Thus, we should work hard to fight such guild-tainted unions. We should restrict applications from owners of handicraft factories, shop owners, and foremen to join the union. Third, in order to prepare for participation in the management of production, we must organize and strengthen factory committees. In the past, although labor unions in many places had organizations similar to factory committees (one committee for every factory), in reality they only did routine labor union work. The future factory committees, in addition to routine labor union work, should pay attention to the investigation and accounting of all economic conditions in the factory. Only this can fulfill responsibility for supervising production in the future. Fourth, in Guangdong, Shanghai, etc., yellow labor unions have already emerged. We should unite these unions. We can develop our influence and raise the workers' economic demands only among the masses under these unions. We must never exclusively deal with the few leaders of these unions in the hope of forming an upper-level unification. Fifth, in many areas, the organizations of artisans and shop clerks (particularly in counties and municipalities) are formed by using the same method as used in organizing industrial sectors. This is impossible. We should organize these workers according to the principle of their professions and previous organizational habits. The Chinese Federation of Labor Unions should immediately issue a general outline on organizing artisans and shop clerks as the criteria for all areas. Sixth, railway workers were the first to work for the party and have fought great battles. However, because of extremism in party policies over the past few years and our neglect of this movement, [they] have been almost entirely abandoned. This is an immense mistake by our party. From now on, we should pay special attention to railway workers, strengthen the General Railway Union, organize secret labor unions on different railway routes, and dispatch special officials from the General Railway Union to work on different routes, so as to establish the systematic character of the railway labor unions and, at the same time, establish close relations between the party and the unions under the leadership of the party branches in all areas. Seventh, after the Fourth Congress, the sailors came under the guidance of our party; this is a great achievement. Our party should continue to step up our work among the sailors. In working on the union movement among the sailors, [we] gradually set up branch organizations on each ship, with the organizations on Guangdong and Hong Kong ships being the most successful. However, the sailors from Ningbo have not yet been completely organized under the sailors' union. The union of river ships tends to ignore modern ships and turns to organizing only wooden ships and junks. This should be corrected. Eighth, in the past two years, the miners' movement developed only once in Tangshan, and the party has been quite indifferent to the miners. For example, the north and Manchuria have most of the mines, but we have paid attention only to the labor movement in the cities and have not given much attention to the miners. In the future, our party should actively work among the miners in Wushun, Kailuan, Shanxi, Shandong, and Jiaozuo, in order to build the basis for the miners' movement. Ninth, previously we paid very little attention to workers in heavy industries. For example, we have several thousand comrades in Shanghai's light industries, but [only a small number] in heavy industries, just a few comrades in a shipyard. It can be shown that this is an enormous weakness. The workers in heavy industries should occupy an important position in the labor movement; they are also very numerous. If we do not have a plan to step up our efforts among the miners, the heavy industrial workers, influenced by the Guangdong Machinists Union, will be easily won over by the yellow unions.

The danger of bureaucratization of the workers' leaders is a serious issue at the moment because the majority of workers lack complete organization and sufficient training. There are too few talented cadres in the labor unions; our party's expansion fails to catch up with the development of the labor movement, so that labor unions are controlled by a minority of leaders, who are separated from the supervision of the masses or the guidance of the party. Thus, they develop a tendency toward bureaucratization. To mitigate this danger, [we] should genuinely carry out the work of "democratization of labor unions," and the work of labor unions should, and must, be determined by the meetings of workers, their representatives, and executive committees. Through such efforts, the organization of labor unions should be improved, masses of workers should be trained, skills for working in the labor movement should be taught, and leaders for the labor movement should be produced. We must do this to mitigate the danger of bureaucratization.

The GMD should be a political alliance between workers, peasants, and the petty bourgeoisie, with the proletariat as the leading political party. Therefore, guiding countless workers to join the GMD and strengthen it internally can fulfill the role of leading it.

5) The problem of unemployment

[[The number of unemployed workers is growing rapidly, 100,000 in Wuhan alone. The Wuhan government should set up a social insurance system immediately and nationalization should be speeded up.]

6) Child laborers and women employees

Although this problem has been addressed in great detail before, as a rule, labor unions seldom pay attention to the interests of child laborers and women employees. In the future, labor unions should actively support their interests. This will encourage them to join the unions. In the future, all labor unions must establish committees for child labor.

7) Propaganda and education

Propaganda is very important, but little attention has been paid to it. Propaganda teams in all unions must be promoted. Greater attention should be paid to publications. Educational efforts must concentrate on raising the cultural level of the working class.]]

8) Workers' picket teams and armed forces

Workers' picket teams should be widely developed in areas where labor unions operate either publicly or secretly. Initially, workers were armed only to defend themselves (against traitors and hoodlums) and maintain order. Now we should regard the workers' picket teams as one of the armed forces to protect workers, peasants, and the democratic regime of the petty bourgeoisie. Therefore, in areas where there are labor unions, whether secret or open, there should be such organizations. What should be noted is: (a) they should be genuine workers' organizations; no hoodlums are allowed to infiltrate them; nor should there be too many unemployed workers. (b) Picket teams should adopt conscription so that all workers have an opportunity to receive military training. (c) Picket teams should have sizable reserves. (d) The Chinese Federation of Labor Unions should publish a unified organizational system of workers' picket teams and set up a department to administer [the teams].

[[More workers must serve in the military to revolutionize it.]]

9) The relationship between workers and peasants

[[Capitalists use the pretext of rises in workers' wages to raise prices, thus turning the peasantry against the workers. To improve the relationship, the causes of inflation and the miseries inflicted on the workers by the capitalists should be explained. This passive propaganda must be supported by help in organizing the peasantry.

10) Establish close relations with labor unions in other countries

The completion of the Chinese revolution must be accomplished with the help of the international proletariat.]]

11) The relationship between the party and the labor unions

The party and the labor unions did not have a correct relationship in the past; either the labor union became an appendage of the party, or the labor union was completely separated from the party's guidance. In fact, the labor union's struggle should be completely guided by the party, while, at the same time, the labor union should not lose its independence. Specifically, in terms of the party's guidance of the labor unions, first, party branches should play their role among the masses so that they are completely influenced by the party; second, there should be party and youth league organizations in labor union administrations so that the will of the party may be used to influence all the operations of the labor union. Naturally, this will place the administrations and the masses of the labor union completely under the party's guidance. At the same time, the party's policies in each period (such as declarations and proposals) should be discussed as openly as possible within labor unions to increase the masses' understanding of the party.

The CC's labor committee was almost completely inoperative in the past, so that the party was thoroughly devoid of leadership in terms of guiding principles and strategies for the labor movement throughout the entire country. In the future, we should do our best to strengthen the labor committee and enable it to function fully. Previously, many district labor committees were both very weak and timid; [in some places] there were even no such organizations as labor committees (for example, in the north); this is also a big mistake which should be corrected.

At present, in labor unions in various areas, there is a huge shortage of personnel for both upper-level leaders and lower-level cadres; this too can obstruct the development of the labor movement. In training personnel, first, [we] should encourage workers to participate in the work of the labor unions more frequently, so that their experience and capability may be increased. In particular, [we] should pay attention to the establishment and education of the meetings of the workers' representatives. Second, local federations of labor unions should establish short-term training classes for the labor movement. The party should select excellent comrades from among the workers to set up an advance training school for the labor movement in order to train senior personnel.

B.28 Resolution on the Third Revised Constitution of the CCP (1 June 1927)¹³⁶

Chapter One: Membership

1. Members of our party are not distinguished on the basis of nationality or sex. Those who acknowledge our party's programs and Constitution, accept the party resolutions, join and work in certain party organizations, and pay party dues are eligible to become members of our party.

2. To join the party, the applicant must be sponsored by one full member of the party. The applicant may become a probationary or full party member after investigation by the branch secretariat [zhibu ganshihui] and after approval by the branch meeting and by the city [shi] or county committee [xian weiyuanhui].

3. There is no probationary period for laborers (workers, peasants, artisans, shop clerks, soldiers, etc.); nonlaborers (intellectuals and free professionals) have a three-month probationary period¹³⁷; but city and county committees can either lengthen or shorten this period.

4. Probationary members at branch meetings only have the right to speak but not the right to vote, although their duties are the same as those of full members. When necessary, city or county committees can allow them to attend party meetings in the city or county, although they do not have the right to vote.

5. Party members accepted directly by the CC or provincial committees [become members] when the city or county committees in their areas are notified; nonlaborers must also go through the probationary period.

6. To go abroad, party members must receive permission from the Party Center and must have an introduction from the Comintern to become members of the CP of the country to which they go.

7. Those who hold membership of CPs in other countries recognized by the Comintern may become full members of our party after having been investigated by the Party Center.

8. Members must be eighteen years of age or older; all those under twenty years of age who are willing to join the party must pass through the Youth League, though young soldiers are exempt.

9. When a member moves from one party organization [dangbu] in one locality to another party organization in another locality, he or she must register at the new party organization in order to become a party member in that locality. Members who move within a province must receive permission from the provincial committee; those who move to other provinces must receive permission from the Party Center; however, under special circumstances (such as when secret operations are involved), flexible arrangements may be made.

10. A member's request to withdraw from the party must be approved by the relevant city or county committees; party card and other important documents must be returned. Moreover, sponsors must guarantee that he or she will strictly keep all party secrets and, in the event of violation of this commitment, the city or county committee will take appropriate measures.

11. The expulsion of party members must be approved by the resolution of a branch meeting and the provincial supervisory committee, as well as by the provincial committee. The reasons for expulsion must be published in the party's publications; the rights and work of members [being expelled] must be suspended before approval by the provincial committee.

Chapter Two: Party Construction

12. The party's guiding principle is democratic centralism.

13. Based on the principle of democratic centralism, the supreme administration of the party within a certain geographical area is established to manage the relevant party organizations.

In principle, the executive agencies of the party organizations [dangbu zhi zhi-xing weiyuanhui] are elected by party members' meetings or by meetings of representatives of party members, and approved by superior organs. Under special circumstances, however, superior organs may appoint them.

14. Local party organizations have the authority to solve local problems on their own.

15. The supreme local party organ at all levels is: the plenary meeting of all party members and meetings of their representatives.

16. The plenary meeting of all party members and meetings of their representatives at each level select committees at that level. When the plenum is not in session, the committees act as the supreme agency of party power at that level and execute and manage affairs and policies of the party.

17. The organizational system of the party is:

National—National Party Congress—CC

Province—provincial congress—provincial committee

City or county—city or county congress—city or county committee

Area—area congress—area committee

Production unit—plenary meeting of all party branch members—branch secretariat

18. Subordinate organs should adhere to the procedures of the party's organizational structure in reporting and making proposals to superior organs as well as in commanding and guiding subordinate organs.

19. To meet the needs of all kinds of specialized party operations, party organizations at each level should establish special departments to run these operations (such as the organization department, propaganda department, women's department, etc.); individual departments under party organizations are accountable to the organization at that level. The organizational structure of these individual departments under party organizations at each level must be ordered or approved by the Party Center.

20. Party organizations under area committees must be approved by the area committees or retroactively approved by city or county committees; party organizations under city or county committees must be approved by the city or county committee; party organizations under provincial committees must be approved by the provincial committee; the composition of provincial committees must be approved by the CC.

The selection and dismissal of executive bodies of party organizations at each level (from provincial committee to branch secretariats or secretary) must be approved by superior organs.

Chapter Three: Central Organization of the Party

21. The party's supreme organ is the National Party Congress. The National Party Congress is convened by the CC once a year. When the CC deems it necessary, or at the request of one-third of the party members and party organizations in one-third of the provinces, an unscheduled National Party Congress may be convened. When the CC decides, or when one-third of the party members and party organizations in one-third of the provinces request the convocation of an unscheduled congress, the CC must convene it within two months. The convocation of the National Party Congress and its agenda must be announced by the CC a month and a half before the congress convenes. The congress is legitimate only when over half of the total party members are represented. The percentage of total representatives is determined by the CC.

22. The work of the National Party Congress is to:

- a) Discuss and approve the reports on the work of the CC, the Central Supervisory Committee [zhongyang jiancha weiyuanhui], and the other CC departments.
- b) Study and revise the party programs and constitution.
- c) Make decisions on the guiding principles for all the important issues and policies.
- d) Reelect the CC, the Supervisory Committee, and other committees.

23. The congress decides on the size of the CC and the Central Supervisory Committee. When members of the CEC [zhongyang zhixing weiyuanhui] or the Central Supervisory Committee leave their positions, alternate members fill the vacancies in order of ranking.

24. The CC must represent the party in developing contacts with other political parties and agencies. It should organize all the party organs and guide their actions; it should guide and supervise the CC newspaper and appoint the editor of the CC newspaper; it should allocate the personnel and distribute the party funds.

25. Through party factions [dangtuan], the CC guides the work of the government and other social organizations.

26. The CC must meet in plenary session once every three months; when necessary, unscheduled meetings of the CC or enlarged CC meetings may be convened. Alternate CC members may attend the CC meetings, but they have only the right to speak, not the right to vote. However, when CC members are absent, alternate members may take their place and have the right to vote.

27. The CC elects one full member to be general secretary and several full members to form the Politburo to guide all political work throughout the country. It also elects several members of the CEC to be alternate members of the Politburo. When alternate Politburo members attend Politburo meetings, they have only the right to speak, not the right to vote. When full Politburo members leave their positions, alternate Politburo members may fill the vacancies in order of ranking. The CC plenary meeting may reorganize the Politburo; the Politburo selects several people to form the Central Standing Committee [zhongyang changwu weiyuanhui]¹³⁸ to handle the party's daily affairs.

28. At least once every two months, the CC must provide the provincial committees with written reports on the work of the CEC.

Chapter Four: Provincial Organization

29. If a province has more than two city or county committees and when the CC deems it necessary to organize a provincial committee, it will send personnel to the province to convene a delegates' congress. The congress is to elect the provincial committee.

30. The number of the full and alternate members of the provincial committee is determined by the provincial delegates' congress. However, it must be also approved by the CC. For example, when full members are absent, they may be replaced by alternate members.

31. The jurisdiction of the province is determined by the CC and is subject to constant change.

32. When necessary, the CC may entrust a city committee to exercise temporarily the powers of the provincial committee.

33. For those party organizations unable to form a provincial committee, the CC may assign them to neighboring provincial committees or place them directly under the CC.

34. Provincial committees may select several members to form a standing committee [changwu weiyuanhui] to handle daily affairs.

35. Provincial committees govern all organs under the provincial committee; it guides and supervises the provincial committee's newspaper and appoints its director. It allocates personnel and distributes the provincial committee's funds; through party fractions, it guides the work of the provincial government and other social organizations.

36. Every six months, provincial committees convene a delegates' meeting to report on the work of the provincial committee and reelect the provincial committee.

37. At least once every two months, provincial committees must provide the CC and city or county committees with a written work report.

Chapter Five: City and County Organization

38. If a city or county has more than two district committees or more than five branches, and after recognition by the provincial committee, the provincial committee will send personnel to the city or county to call a delegates' meeting. The meeting elects the city or county committee.

39. City or county committees are under the jurisdiction of the provincial committee.

40. In the city where the provincial committee is located, no separate city committee will be formed. The city's area committees [qu weiyuanhui] answer directly to the provincial committee.

41. The number of full and alternate members of city or county committees are determined by city or county delegates' meetings. The number must be approved by the provincial committee. When full members are absent, they are replaced by alternate members.

42. In places where city or county committees cannot be formed, the organizations of the city or county, on the decision of the provincial committee, are placed under the jurisdiction of neighboring city or county committees or directly under the provincial committee.

43. City or county committees may select three to five members to form a standing committee to handle unexpected matters.

44. City and county committees must guide all organs under the city or county executive committees; they must guide and supervise city or county committee's newspapers; they must appoint editors of the newspapers of city or county committees. Through party fractions, they should guide the work of city or county governments and social organizations; they should allocate personnel and distribute the funds of city or county committees.

45. City or county committees convene a meeting of city or county delegates or a meeting of all party members every three months to report on the work of the city or county committee or reelect the city or county committee.

46. The division of cities or counties is decided by the provincial executive committee.

Chapter Six: Area Organization

47. If an area has more than two branches, city or county committees, when necessary, can send personnel to the area to call a party members' meeting to elect the area committee.

48. The number of members of the area committee is determined by the party members' meeting, and must be approved by the city or county committee.

49. In localities where area committees cannot be formed, party branches may be turned over to the jurisdiction of neighboring area committees depending on the decision of the area, city, or county committee, or they may answer directly to the city or county committee.

50. The division of the area is determined by the city or county committee.

51. Area committees are reelected once every three months.

Chapter Seven: Party Branches

52. Branches are the party's basic organization. In each factory; on every railway; in every mine, village, barracks, school, neighborhood; or organ, a branch may be formed when there are more than three party members, contingent on approval by the district or county committees.

53. Branches are the party organizations in direct contact with the masses. The responsibilities of the branch are:

- a) to work actively in factories and lead the masses there to wage daily struggles to expand the influence of the party;
- b) to implement the party's slogans among the masses;
- c) to recruit new party members;
- d) to obey local party organizations and engage in organizational and propaganda work;
- e) to participate actively in local political and economic struggles;
- f) to discuss the important issues of the party as much as possible.

54. Each branch elects one secretary or three persons to form the branch secretariat; it comes under the jurisdiction of the district committee; in places without a district committee, branches answer directly to the county or city committees.

55. In industrial production units with many party members, subbranches [zhifenbu] may be organized; subbranches may also form secretariats; in branches with many party members which cannot form subbranches, cells [xiaozu] may be formed; cells may also be formed under subbranches; each cell elects one head who is responsible to the branch secretariat or the subbranch secretariat.

56. When the number of party members is less than three, a correspondent [tongxunyuan] may be chosen to be responsible to the nearest area committee or city or county committee.

57. At least once a fortnight, the branch secretariat should convene a meeting of members to report on secretariat work and discuss all issues of practical political and economic struggles in the organs or areas in which the branch is located.

58. The branch secretariat is reelected every three months.

59. Branches in the military are managed by the Military Affairs Department; the work on political propaganda, education, and training is done by the Propaganda Department and the Organization Department through the Military Affairs Department.

60. The dismissal of a branch secretary must be approved by a meeting of all the branch party members and by the district or county and city committees.

Chapter Eight: The Central Supervisory Committee

61. To consolidate party unity and authority, the national and provincial congresses elect a central and provincial supervisory committees respectively.

62. Central and provincial supervisory committee members should not concurrently serve as CC or provincial committee members.

63. Central and provincial supervisory committee members should attend CC or provincial committee meetings, but they only have the right of speech but not the right to vote. When necessary, they should participate in all kinds of meetings of party organizations at the same level.

64. The CC and provincial committees must not cancel central or provincial supervisory committee decisions, but decisions of the central and provincial supervisory committees must be approved by the CC or provincial committee, and then they become effective for implementation. When the opinions of the central or provincial supervisory committee are different from those of the CC or the provincial committee, the issue in dispute should be turned over to a joint meeting of the central or provincial supervisory committee and the CC or provincial committee. If the joint meeting is still unable to resolve the issue, it should be turned over to the National Congress or the highest-level supervisory committee for resolution.

Chapter Nine: Discipline

65. Strict party discipline is the first and most important duty of all party members and organizations. Decisions by organs of party organizations must be quickly and correctly implemented. However, with respect to differences within the party before a decision has been made, there can be completely free discussion.

66. Nonimplementation of decisions by higher party organs and other actions to disrupt the party go against the party's common will and are punishable. Formal punishments are as follows:

- a) If it concerns an entire party organization, a warning may be issued, it can be reformed, or a new general registration may be held (disband the organization).
- b) If it concerns an individual party member, a warning or a public warning inside the party may be issued; his or her work in the party, the GMD, the national government, and other tasks should be temporarily suspended. He or she can remain in the party and be closely monitored or expelled.

67. Party decisions are made by the majority; the minority must resolutely obey the majority. If a party member or a subordinate organ does not agree with the decision of a superior organ, with the support of a simple majority of party members from the relevant organization, a protest can be lodged with the superior organ. However, during the period between the time the protest is lodged and when a decision is made, the orders of the superior organ must be implemented.

68. Without permission from the party, members may not join political groups. When somebody joins our party who formally came under the jurisdiction of another political group, he will be formally considered to have left that group if no permission is given by the party.

69. Without the party's agreement, party members cannot carry out any duties in government organs.

70. Actions that violate party discipline must be investigated in accordance with legal procedures by the party committee, by a meeting of party members, or by the supervisory committee.

Chapter Ten: Party Fractions

71. In all nonparty mass organizations or executive organs (such as the Workers' Committee of the Peasant Association of the GMD national government), where there are more than three party members, a party fraction should be organized. The objective of the party fraction is to intensify the party's influence in all aspects and to implement party policy among the nonparty masses.

72. When questions related to the party fractions are being discussed in a party executive committee, the fraction should send a representative to participate in the discussion. However, the representative will only have the right of speech, not the right to vote.

73. To carry out the daily work of the party fraction, a party fraction executive committee or secretariat should be appointed.

74. Party fractions at all levels come under the jurisdiction of the party committees at the relevant level. Party fractions should strictly and correctly implement resolutions made by the party on all problems. Party committees may add or withdraw members from the party fractions, but should give an explanation to the party fractions.

75. Party fractions may solve, on their own, their daily problems. When there is a difference of opinion between the party fraction and the party committee, the party committee should call a full meeting of the party fraction to rediscuss [the issue] and reach a final decision. Party fractions must implement the final decision swiftly.

76. Candidates for important positions in the agencies or organizations in which party fractions are located should be determined jointly by the party fractions and their superior party organizations. The transfer of positions should also be handled in accordance with the above method.

77. Superior party organizations must send representatives to participate in the discussion of political issues by the party fractions.

78. Whenever an important issue needs to be resolved among the nonparty masses and organizations, the party fraction must discuss it beforehand at the party fraction meeting or at a meeting of the secretariat of the party fraction and come to a decision.

79. When decisions are put to vote in meetings of nonparty organizations, all party members present (or elements of the party fraction) must be penalized according to party discipline if they violate party resolutions.

Chapter Eleven: Funding

80. The revenues of our party come from the following sources:

a) Party dues. Party members whose monthly income is under 30 yuan pay 20 cents per month; those without income or whose monthly income is less than 20 yuan may have their dues reduced or exempted according to circumstances by the city or county committee; those whose monthly income is between 30 and 60 yuan pay one yuan; those whose monthly income is between 60 and 80 yuan pay three percent of their income; special levies are imposed on those whose income is above 80 yuan. Party dues are waived for unemployed workers, imprisoned party members, and members working in the youth league.

b) Contributions from within the party. These shall be determined by the local party committees, taking into account local finances and the party's economic conditions.

c) Support sources from outside the party.

81. The dues of the party members in the military are collected by the military departments in the areas where they are stationed and turned over to the accounting department of the party organization.

82. All the revenues and expenditures of the party are to be disposed of by the CC.

Chapter Twelve: Relations with the Youth League

83. The CC of the Youth League should send representatives to meetings of the Politburo of the CC; League organizations at all levels should also send representatives to attend standing committee meetings of the organs of the party organizations at the relevant levels; representatives of the Youth League have voting rights.

84. The party's CC should appoint one of its members to the CEC of the Youth League; secretaries of Youth League executive committees at all levels should be members of the party committee in the same area.

85. Organs of party organizations should send representatives to attend the meetings of organs of the League organizations at all levels.

13. The nine CEC members were Chen Duxiu, Li Dazhao, Cai Hesen, Zhang Guotao, Xiang Ying, Qu Qiubai, Peng Shuzhi, Tan Pingshan, and Li Weiham. The five alternates were Deng Pei, Wang Hebo, Luo Zhanglong, Zhang Tailei, and Zhu Miantang. Wang Jianying (ed.), Zhongguo gongchandang, pp. 30–31.

14. This was set up on 1 June and was chaired by Li Lisan.

16. This meeting was held in Beijing, and its precise date is unclear. The documents concerning the meeting included in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 459–508, give the date of October. This is the same date as used in Wilbur and How, Documents on Communism, p. 92 and passim. Two recent party histories published in the PRC give a date of September but do not indicate any sources for this change. Research Department on Party History of the CCP, Zhonggong dangshi, p. 39, and Zhao Shenghui, Zhongguo gongchandang zuzhishi gangyao, pp. 37–38. One probable source is Chen Duxiu’s report to the Fifth Party Congress in April 1927. Here, Chen mentions the “second plenum” held in September 1925. See Doc. B.25, section 1, subsection “Party strategy in these periods.”

17. This was in line with the analysis adopted by the May 1924 meeting of the CCP CEC (Doc. B.2).

18. This was part of a general process of tightening up on the work of the localities by the Party Center. It announced that it would send a number of commissioners to the districts and area committees. See “The Resolution on the Question of Organization,” Doc. B.11. For the resolution on the Guangdong report, see “Yuequ baogao yijuean,” in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, p. 498.

21. Among those attending were Li Dazhao, Qu Qiubai, Xiang Ying, Zhang Guotao, Peng Shuzhi, Tan Pingshan, Ren Bishi, Chen Yannian, Luo Yinong, Zhao Shiyan, and Chen Qiaonian. Wang Jianying (ed.), Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 34. Chen Yannian and Chen Qiaonian were sons of Chen Duxiu. Information about the special meeting was disseminated throughout the party in Central Circular Number 79 (14 March). For the text of this circular see the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 80–84.

22. Initially, the question of the Northern Expedition had been a cause of differences between Chen Duxiu and Borodin. While Chen supported it, Borodin was opposed. According to Chen, Borodin opposed the expedition to support Moscow's line. See below, Chen Duxiu, “Report to the Fifth Party Congress,” Doc. B.25.

23. See “Zhongyang dizhi wenti” (The Question of the Location of the Party Center), in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 58–59. The Guomin jun (National People's Army) was under Feng Yuxiang's command. In October 1924, Feng had acted in concert with Zhili clique members to oust Cao Kun from power in Beijing. In April 1925 Feng was forced out of Beijing and he formed an alliance with the Northern Expedition forces.

26. The meeting was attended by, among others, Chen Duxiu, Li Dazhao, Qu Qiubai, Zhang Guotao, Peng Shuzhi, Tan Pingshan, Xiang Ying, Li Weiham, Wang Hebo, Luo Zhanglong, Zhang Tailei, Chen Yannian, Luo Yinong, and Zhao Shiyan.

27. In the version of this report translated by Wilbur and How, the comment is made that, in the later stages, the movement in Shanghai was led by the Chamber of Commerce and not the General Labor Union. 30. Wang Jingwei had declared his retirement from politics in late March 1926 and a couple of months later left for Europe.

31. I am grateful to Professor Wilbur for pointing out the significance of this to me.

32. This was a joint meeting of the Central Bureau and the representatives of the Comintern attended by, among others, Chen Duxiu, Zhang Guotao, Qu Qiubai, Peng Shuzhi, Borodin, and Voitinsky. Wang Jianying (ed.), Zhongguo Gongchandang, p. 34.

35. Wang had returned to Shanghai from Germany on 1 April.

36. The joint statement was published in the National News Weekly, vol. 4, no. 16 (May 1, 1927), and can be found in W. Kuo, Analytical History of the Chinese Communist Party, book 1, pp. 307–9.

37. These details are taken from C.M. Wilbur, The Nationalist Revolution in China, 1923–1928, pp. 110–12.

38. The party organization had also been broken in Beijing. On 6 April, forces of Zhang Zuolin broke into the Soviet Embassy compound seizing many documents and arresting thirty-eight people. On 28 April, twenty of them were executed including Li Dazhao.

39. Eighty delegates attended, representing 57,967 party members. The most important of the Comintern representatives attending the Congress was the Indian communist M.N. Roy.

40. Apart from this view, which won the day, two other policies for the peasant movement were put forward at the Congress. The most radical suggestion was that all land, without exception, be confiscated, while a more moderate view was presented that only land belonging to the enemies of the GMD should be confiscated. See J.P. Harrison, The Long March to Power, p. 107.

42. Wang Jianying (ed.), Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 60. On 30 June, it appears that Qu Qiubai and Li Wei-han were replaced on the Standing Committee by Tan Pingshan and Deng Zhongxia. Zhao Shenghui, Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 57. The additional members of the Politburo were Li Lisan and Tan Pingshan; Su Zhaozheng, Zhang Tailei, Chen Yannian, and Zhou Enlai were elected alternate members of the Politburo.

43. See "Resolution of the Eighth ECCI Plenum on the China Question," in Degras (ed.), The Communist International, vol. 2, pp. 384-90.

44. As a result, Tan Pingshan and Su Zhaozheng gave up their posts as ministers of agriculture and labor respectively.

45. See "Guogong liangdang guanxi jueyan" (CCP Resolution on Relations Between the Two Parties); the most important measures are contained in "Zhongguo gongchandang zhongyang zhixing weiyuanhui gao quandang dangyuan shu" (Letter from the CCP CEC to All Party Members), below, Doc. C.2.

47. According to Zhang Guotao, Chen handed in a letter of resignation on 15 July 1927. His reason for withdrawing was said to be that the Comintern's insistence that the CCP develop its own policies combined with its insistence that the CCP not withdraw from the GMD made work impossible. Chang Kuo-t'ao, The Rise of the Chinese Communist Party, 1921-1927, vol. 1, pp. 655 and 715. However, this is not quite accurate as, in accordance with Comintern instructions, the CCP central authorities were reorganized and Chen's leadership stopped on 12 July 1927. See Research Department on Party History, Zhonggong dangshi dashi nianbiao, pp. 57-58.

48. The members were Zhang Guotao, Zhou Enlai, Li Wei-han, Li Lisan, and Zhang Tailei. Wang Jianying (ed.), Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 67, and Zhao Shenghui, Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 61.

49. "Gongchandang zai guomindang nei de gongzuo wenti yijuean," in Dangbao, no. 3 (20 May 1924): 1-3. This resolution was adopted by the Enlarged Meeting of the CCP CEC held from 14 to 16 May 1924 in Shanghai.

50. Minquan zhuyi—the principle of the people's rights or democracy—was one of Sun Yat-sen's Three Principles of the People.

51. This manifesto was adopted by the GMD's First National Congress (January 1924) and pledged the party to fight against imperialism and feudalism as its main tasks. It was based on the ECCI resolution of 28 November 1923, which Borodin had first seen in Shanghai and which was translated into Chinese by Zhang Tailei. 52. "Zhongyang tonggao di shiwuhao," in the Party Central Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 223-24. It is subtitled "The Struggle Against the GMD-Right."

53. In August 1924 the Second Plenum of the GMD CEC met. The decisions made reflected the views of the left wing of the party. In particular, the CCP was recognized as having a special responsibility for the proletariat and called on all GMD members to cooperate to achieve the goals of the national revolution. For details see Geming wenxian [Documents of the Revolution], vol. 16: 2773–76.

54. “Gonghui yundong wenti yijuean,” in Dangbao, no. 3 (20 May 1924): 3–5. This resolution was adopted at the Enlarged CCP CEC meeting held in Shanghai from 14 to 16 May 1924.

55. This was set up following a decision made at the Fourth Party Congress on 22 January 1925. Its secretary was Zhang Guotao, and Li Lisan and Liu Shaoqi acted as deputy secretaries.

56. “Shanghai difang baogao,” in Dangbao, no. 4 (1 June 1924): 2–4. This report was delivered to the Enlarged Meeting of the CCP CEC held in Shanghai from 14 to 16 May 1924. The report consists of three parts, but only the third part concerning the labor movement is translated here in full.

57. This probably refers to the strikes of November 1922 at the Japanese cotton mills, the British and American Tobacco Company, and in the goldsmiths’ and silversmiths’ workshops. They were crushed by the Chinese authorities in Shanghai led by General He Fenglin.

58. This Federation was founded in Shanghai in 1924. It drew in some thirty semi-working-class associations and societies for industrial advance as well as regional societies, trade associations for skilled workers, and clubs run by companies. It had good relations with both foreign and Chinese employers in Shanghai. See J. Chesneaux, The Chinese Labor Movement, 1919–1927, pp. 223–24.

59. “Duiyu zhongyang zhixing weiyuanhui baogao zhi yijuean.” This translation is taken from the version of the resolution republished in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 326–28. The resolution was passed by the CCP’s Fourth Congress held in Shanghai from 11 to 22 January 1925. It was originally published in Zhongguo gongchandang disici quanguo dahui yijuean ji xuanyan (The Resolutions and Manifesto of the CCP’s Fourth Congress), February 1925.

60. In October 1924, Feng Yuxiang refused to obey Wu Peifu’s orders to march against the northeastern warlord Zhang Zuolin. He formed an alliance together with Zhang and they seized power in Beijing, thus bringing to an end the rule of the Zhili clique.

61. This was because the Japanese were interpreted as supporters of Zhang Zuolin while the Americans and British were seen as supporters of Wu Peifu.

62. Organizational changes adopted at the May 1924 CEC meeting were not implemented until August, and the CEC was slow in acting on new policies for the workers’ and peasants’ movements.

63. “Guanyu minzu geming yundong zhi yijuean.” This translation is taken from the version of the resolution republished in The Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 329–41. The resolution was passed by the CCP’s Fourth Congress held in Shanghai from 11 to 22 January 1925. It was originally published in Zhongguo gongchandang disici quanguo dahui yijuean ji xuanyuan.

64. The Shamian strike. The island of Shamian is in the center of Canton. Following the attempted assassination of Governor-General M. Merlin by a Vietnamese revolutionary, police regulations were introduced to control all Chinese entering or leaving the island. On 16 June all Chinese working on the island went on strike to demand that the regulations be repealed and that an apology be made. The strike quickly adopted an anti-imperialist tone, and on 13 August the authorities were forced to agree to reinstate all the dismissed strikers and abolish the regulations introduced in June.

65. Presumably this refers to the incident with the “Merchant Volunteers.” In 1923, the Canton Chamber of Commerce set up a “Merchant Volunteer” corps that was opposed to Sun Yat-sen and that sought to maintain order for the purpose of trade. Conflict between Sun and the GMD-left, on the one hand, and the corps, on the other, came to a head in August 1924 when the Canton government seized a shipment of arms intended for the corps. To help protect Sun's government, a "Labor Organizations' Army" was set up. On 9 October, the corps demanded that Sun hand over all the confiscated arms, but the corps was defeated by regular troops and some Whampoa cadets with the "Labor Organizations' Army" in clashes that followed the National Day demonstrations (10 October). This was rightly seen as a victory for the GMD-left. For an incomplete account that exaggerates the role of the "Labor Organization Army," see Chesneaux, The Chinese Labor Movement, pp. 249–50.

66. "Duiyu zhigong yundong zhi yijuean," in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 342–57. This resolution was passed by the CCP's Fourth Congress held in Shanghai from 11 to 22 January 1925. It was originally published in Zhongguo gongchandang disici quanguo dahui yijuean ji xuanyan.

67. The labor committee was set up following the Congress and was headed by Zhang Guotao.

68. "Guanyu nongmin yundong zhi yijuean," in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 358–64. This resolution was passed by the CCP's Fourth Congress held in Shanghai from 11 to 22 January 1925. It was originally published in Zhongguo gongchandang disici quanguo dahui yijuean ji xuanyan.

69. The following points are taken from "Nongmin bingshi jian de gongzuo wenti yijuean" (Resolution on the Question of Work Among the Peasantry and Soldiers), in Dangbao, no. 3 (20 May 1924): 7–8. The resolution was adopted at the enlarged CEC meeting of May 1924.

70. This refers to the common practice of collecting taxes and rent in advance.

71. "Zhongguo gongchandang dierci xiuzheng zhangcheng," in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 383–89. The revisions to the Constitution were passed by the CCP's Fourth Congress held in Shanghai from 11 to 22 January 1925. It was originally published in Zhongguo gongchandang disici quanguo dahui yijuean ji xuanyan.

72. The June 1923 Constitution used the term cell [xiaozu]. See Doc. A.24, article 5.

73. This power was with the area executive committee in the June 1923 Constitution. See Doc. A.24, article 4.

74. "Zhongguo xianshi de zhengju yu gongchandang de zhiren yijuean," in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 459–71. This resolution was adopted at the enlarged meeting of the CEC held in Beijing in October 1925.

75. The National People's Army was under the command of the Christian General, Feng Yuxiang. In October 1924, Feng had acted in concert with Zhili clique members to oust Cao Kun from the Beijing government. The National People's Army was set up with Feng as its head. In April 1925, Feng was forced to retreat to the northwest. He united with the GMD and CCP forces of the Northern Expedition in September 1926.

76. A military department was set up under the CEC at the end of 1925 led by Zhang Guotao, and in November 1926 it was reorganized into the military committee with Zhou Enlai as its secretary.

77. Guomin geming yu Zhongguo guomindang was published in Shanghai in August 1925. It was completed on 23 July and created a stir in communist circles. Dai attacked the presence of CCP members within the GMD and called for stronger GMD unity as a way of resisting communist infiltration. The CCP launched an immediate attack with articles by Chen Duxiu, Qu Qiubai, and Yun Daiying. Chen Duxiu accused Dai of only seeing the need for the nationalist struggle and not class struggle. According to Chen, CCP participation in the GMD was a source of great help rather than a hindrance. Chen Duxiu, "Gei Dai Jitao de yifengxin" (A Letter to Dai Jitao), written on 30 August and published in Xiangdao zhoubao, nos. 129, 130 (11 September 1925): 1196–97.

78. Chen Duxiu had proposed to the meeting that the CCP prepare to withdraw from the GMD and become independent. This was resisted by the Comintern representative and other CEC members. See “A Letter to All Comrades of the Party,” Shanghai, 10 December 1929, in Chinese Studies in History (spring 1970): 227–28.

79. “Zuzhi wenti yijuean,” in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 472–77. This resolution was adopted by the enlarged CEC meeting held in Beijing in October 1925. The text is essentially identical to that translated by Wilbur and How with the exception of the last paragraph in section 9, which is missing from their translation. The Wilbur and How translation is based on a copy of the original Chinese text made by the Japanese in Beijing and sent with a covering letter to the Japanese vice minister of war on 26 May 1927. See Wilbur and How, Missionaries of Revolution, pp. 530–32.

80. The labor committee had been decided on by the Fourth Party Congress in January 1925; the peasant committee was formally set up in November 1926 with Mao Zedong as its secretary; and the military department was set up at the end of 1925 headed by Zhang Guotao. Wang Jianying (ed.), Zhongguo gongchandang, pp. 31–32.

81. The SYL changed its name to CYL at its third congress held in Shanghai from 26 to 30 January 1925.

82. “Zhongguo gongchandang yu Zhongguo guomindang guanxi yijuean,” in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 487–91. This resolution was adopted by the enlarged CEC meeting held in Beijing in October 1925. This version is virtually identical with that translated in Wilbur and How. The most important difference is that the version in Wilbur and How has an extra subsection under section 5. The Wilbur and How translation is taken from a copy of an original Chinese document sent by the Japanese military attaché in Beijing to Tokyo on 26 May 1927. See Wilbur and How, Missionaries of Revolution, pp. 533–35.

83. The version of this document translated by Wilbur and How has an extra subsection here that states, “Where we do not have any masses, we should not help the KMT [GMD] to establish or develop its organization, particularly in Central and South China.” As Wilbur and How note, this subsection is crossed out in pencil, but they remark that it is unclear whether the mark was made by the Japanese or was in the original. Its absence in this version suggests that it was removed from the resolution by the CCP meeting.

84. In the version translated by Wilbur and How this section is subsection f of section 5.

85. “Gao nongmin shu,” in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 1, pp. 432–39. This proclamation was passed by the CCP CEC at the October 1925 enlarged meeting.

86. The Second National Labor Congress and the First Congress of the Guangdong Peasant Representatives were held in Canton from 1 to 9 May 1925.

87. “Guanyu xianshi zhengju yu gongchandang de zhuyao zhiren yijuean,” in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 53–57. This resolution was adopted by the special meeting of the CEC held in Beijing from 21 to 24 February 1926.

88. In 1921–22 the Washington Conference treaties and resolutions called for conferences on tariff autonomy and extraterritoriality. It is not clear what is meant here, and there may be a misprint in the original Chinese text. In any case, China recovered full autonomy with respect to customs only in 1933.

89. “Zhongyang zhengzhi baogao” was originally published in a mimeographed pamphlet issued by the CEC CCP in September 1926, Zhongguo gongchandang disanci zhongyang kuangda zhixing weiyuanhui yijuean (Resolutions of the Third Enlarged Meeting of the CCP CEC), and is reprinted in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 163–73. With the exception of section 3, this version is virtually identical to that translated by Wilbur and How from the collection of documents seized during the raid of the Soviet Embassy in Beijing in 1927. The section 3 translated here differs substantially. See Wilbur and How, Missionaries of Revolution, pp. 723–29. The report was delivered by Chen Duxiu to the enlarged CEC meeting held in Shanghai between 12 and 18 July 1926.

90. This was the attempt to overthrow the head of the Fengtian clique, Zhang Zuolin.

91. The version translated by Wilbur and How contains the sentence “As we look back now, there was not a single mistake in our past policy.”

92. The version translated by Wilbur and How contains a much stronger comment concerning the bourgeoisie and the May 30 Movement. It states, “The May Thirtieth Movement in Shanghai was in reality led by the General Chamber of Commerce and not the General Labor Union (with reference to the later stage).” Wilbur and How, Missionaries of Revolution, p. 724. It may be that when the report was disseminated in the party, this assessment was considered too sensitive and was thus rewritten for the party at large.

93. The Dawes plan of April 1924 tried to facilitate German payment of war reparations.

94. “Zhongguo gongchandang yu guomindang guanxi wenti yijuean” was originally published in a mimeographed publication issued by the CCP CEC in September 1926, Zhongguo gongchandang disanci zhongyang kuangda zhixing weiyuanhui yijuean. It is reprinted in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 174–78. It is the same as the version translated in Wilbur and How, Missionaries of Revolution, pp. 727–29.

95. “Zuzhi wenti yijuean” was originally published in a mimeographed pamphlet issued by the CCP CEC in September 1926, Zhongguo gongchandang disanci zhongyang kuangda zhixing weiyuanhui yijuean. It is reprinted in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 179–87. This version is the same as that translated in Wilbur and How, Missionaries of Revolution, pp. 730–34.

96. “Duiyu Guangdong nongmin yundong yijuean” was originally published in a pamphlet, Guangdong nongmin yundong baogao (Report on the Peasant Movement in Guangdong), in Canton in October 1926. It had the original title of “Resolution of the Second Enlarged Meeting of the CEC on the Movement in Guangdong.” The pamphlet also contains the long and interesting report on the Guangdong peasant movement delivered to the Second Guangdong Provincial Congress of Peasant Representatives (May 1926). The resolution on the Guangdong report is reprinted in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 163–79. It was adopted at the July 1926 CEC meeting.

97. The civil corps [mintuan] were local armed forces organized primarily by the landlords.

98. This was an administrative unit larger than a township but smaller than a county.

99. The Plow began publication in Canton on 25 January 1926 as the organ of the Guangdong Peasant Association. Initially, it was published every ten days but was changed to a weekly. Its last issue (no. 23) appeared on 7 January 1927. Its general orientation was pro-CCP.

100. The central peasant department of the GMD began publishing The Chinese Peasant in Canton on 1 January 1926 as a monthly. Its general editor was CCP member Mao Zedong. In December 1926, it temporarily ceased publication but it began again briefly in Hankou in July 1927.

101. Month-long courses were given at the Peasant Movement Training Institute in Canton. The institute was founded on 3 July 1924 following a decision by the GMD’s CEC on 30 June. This was the first government-sponsored training institute for rural political activists. Its first director was CCP member Peng Pai. For an interesting collection of materials on the institute see Guangzhou nongmin yundong jiangxi suo ziliao xuanbian [Selected Materials on the Canton Peasant Movement Training Institute]. For an account of its founding see F. Galbiati, P’eng P’ai and the Hai-Lu-Feng Soviet, pp. 176–82.

102. “Shanghai gongzuo jihua jueyan,” in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 259–63. This resolution was adopted by the enlarged CCP CEC meeting held in Shanghai in July 1926. It was originally published in Jiaoyu zazhi (Education Magazine), no. 1 (5 October 1926). It was published by the Shanghai area committee of the CCP.

103. The Society for the Study of Sun Wenism was a conservative organization set up by GMD members opposed to cooperation with the CCP. The original organization was formally founded in Canton on 29 December 1925, and through the winter, branches were set up in other major centers including Shanghai. See Wilbur and How, Missionaries of Revolution, pp. 166 and 192–93. There is some evidence to suggest that the Society originated in the Whampoa Military Academy in Canton as early as April 1925. The organization was disbanded in April 1926. Li Yutian, Li Gong, and Xu Jianguo (eds.), Zhongguo gemingshi jianming cidian, pp. 158–59.

104. “Hunan nongmin yundong kaocha baogao.” The first two sections of this report are based on the translation in C. Brandt, B. Schwartz, and J.K. Fairbank, A Documentary History of Chinese Communism, pp. 80–89. These two sections have been checked against the version in Mao Zedong ji, vol. 1, pp. 207–49. Section three is based on the excellent translation made by M.H. Day from the same source. The Chinese text used in Mao Zedong ji was taken from Mao Zedong xuanji xubian (Sequel to the Selected Works of Mao Zedong), published in 1947. In turn the editors of this 1947 work took the version of Mao’s report published in the weekly supplement of the GMD organ Zhongyang fukan (Central Committee Periodical), no. 7 (28 March 1927).

105. General Tang Shengzhi, who was a militarist supporter of the Wuhan government.

106. These are the qualities of Confucius as quoted by one of his disciples in the Analects.

107. The eight characters refer to the cyclical characters for the year, month, day, and hour of one’s birth. These were said to determine one’s fate.

108. Hezuo is a normal term for cooperation and is used in the word for cooperative, hezuoshe. Hehuo means to form a partnership in some enterprise and thus had a more immediate meaning for those in the countryside.

109. Liu was the head of the peasant department of the GMD Hunan provincial headquarters. In February 1927 he was expelled from the GMD, only to return later.

110. She Gong loved all dragons except real ones.

111. “Yue qu duiyu zuopai wenti zhi taolun.” This document was appended to Chen Duxiu’s speech to the Politburo meeting of 4–5 November 1926 (Doc. B.22). The dating of the document is approximate. Clearly, it preceded the meeting and formed the basis of Chen’s comments, and thus the date of October is given. The Chinese text is taken from the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji (neibu ben), vol. 2, pp. 284–88.

112. Clearly, this should read “rightist political tendencies.”

113. “C tongzhi guanyu G.M.D. wenti baogao.” This document was included in the mimeographed collection Guomindang wenti taolunji (Discussions on the Question of the GMD), vol. 3. The Chinese text translated here is from the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 422–30. This was a report delivered by Chen Duxiu to a meeting of the Politburo held on 4 and 5 November 1926.

114. The statista take their name from the Chinese Statist Youth League (Zhongguo guojia zhuyi qingnian tuan), also referred to as the Chinese Youth Party (Zhongguo qingnian dang). The party was set up in December 1923 in Paris and transferred its main activities to China in the autumn of 1924. It had a strong anticommunist sentiment and in 1929 declared its support of the GMD’s anticommunist suppression campaigns. It participated in the 1946 meeting of the GMD’s National Assembly, and in 1949 the organization fled to Taiwan.

115. In Wang Jingwei’s absence, Tan Yankai had taken over as chair of the national government in Canton. Tan was one of the most powerful military figures in the GMD. Tang Shengzhi headed the Eighth Corps of the National Revolutionary Army during the Northern Expedition.

116. Guangning was an isolated county in the northwest of Guangdong Province. Under Peng Pai, the CP had achieved major successes in organizing the peasantry in struggles to reduce rent, etc. The local peasant associations were set up amid much opposition from the local landlords and became models for other areas. By the spring of 1927, however, most of the associations had been suppressed.

117. Hua County was on a fertile plain some 50 kilometers outside of Canton. From spring 1926 there had been bitter fighting there, with numerous attacks on peasant association members. This culminated in August–September 1926 when GMD troops reasserted control over the area.

118. “Zhengzhi baogao” was a report delivered by Chen Duxiu on 13 December 1926 to a Special Meeting of the Party Center also attended by Comintern representatives Borodin and Voitinsky. The meeting was held in Hankou. The text translated here is taken from the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 2, pp. 559–68.

119. During the Northern Expedition, Jiujiang was captured on 5 November and Nanchang on 8 November 1926.

120. This refers to the plenary meeting of the GMD CEC that was held between 15 and 22 May 1926 in Canton. At the meeting, severe restrictions on CCP activities within the GMD were approved.

121. In November 1925 a group of GMD right-wing members met at the Western Hills near Beijing. They were worried about the rise in influence of CCP members in the GMD and proposed their expulsion.

123. The Society was founded in Hawaii in November 1894 and was the first of a series of organizations that were the forerunners of the GMD. Shortly after its founding, it transferred its operations to China. The Society was not successful in meeting its goal of overthrowing the dynasty and creating a republican government.

124. “Chen Duxiu zai Zhongguo gongchandang diwuci quanguo daibiao dahui shang de baogao” is translated from the Chinese text in Zhonggong dangshi ziliao (Materials on CCP History), no. 3, pp. 26–59. The complete report consists of eleven numbered sections and one section on the inner-party situation. The Chinese version is translated from a Russian translation made in the twenties. The Russian translation was found among the documents of the Chinese Mission to the Comintern.

125. This is probably a mistake in the Russian, as Sun went to Beijing to meet with Duan Qirui.

126. In fact, the resolution adopted in October 1925 specifically warns against severing relations with the GMD (see Doc. B.10, section 7, point e).

127. In fact, the “Resolution on the Current Political Situation and the Tasks of the CP,” adopted in October 1925, counseled against withdrawing from the GMD and called for a suitable form of alliance to be found. See above, Doc. B.10. The “Resolution on the Relations Between the CCP and the GMD” stated that current policy was opposition to the GMD-right while forming a close alliance with the left. See above, Doc. B.12.

128. This figure is drawn from Mao Zedong’s March 1927 report on the peasant movement in Hunan. Here, Mao mentions that peasant association membership had risen to 2 million and he calculates that as a result some 10 million peasants were directly under the influence of the associations. See above, Doc. B.20, section 2. In June 1927, membership had risen to 4.5 million with 9.15 million in associations nationwide.

129. General Li Jishen favored placing tighter restrictions on the labor movement, and in January 1927 he took over as head of the labor department of the Guangdong branch of the GMD. Almost immediately, he undertook actions to defend employers’ traditional practices. On 15 April 1927, he moved against the left-wing unions and their leaders in Canton.

138. The Chinese text puts the English word “Secretariat” in brackets after the Chinese term. However, “Standing Committee” is preferred here not just because this has become the standard translation but also to avoid confusion with the zhongyang mishuchu (or mishuting) (Central Secretariat) that had been headed by Wang Ruofei.

Commentary C

The Sixth Party Congress and the Upsurge of Communist Rebellions, July 1927–1930

The events of summer 1927 seemed to make a mockery of the CCP leadership and its policy of a united front with the GMD. The Communists suffered one blow after another as group after group of Nationalist generals and politicians “betrayed the revolution.” With the breakdown in the united front, it was clear that a new strategy was needed. The initial period after this breakdown was marked by a number of armed insurrections organized by the CCP in response to GMD suppression. These insurrections were seen by Qu Qiubai and the Party Center as an attempt to regain the initiative for the Communists by sparking off a nationwide revolution. In this they failed. The bankruptcy of this “putschist” approach was finally shown with the failure of the Canton Commune in December 1927 and the destruction of the Haifeng and Lufeng Soviets in February 1928. However, these failed attempts did contain the seeds of a new strategy. First, there was the formation of military forces led directly by the CCP. Second, as the vanquished troops retreated from the failed uprisings, a number of territorial base areas were established in remote regions. Finally, there was an increasing recognition of the important role that the peasantry would play in the revolution.

(a) 7 August 1927 Emergency Conference— The Policy of Insurrection

The first policy initiative that followed Chen Duxiu’s dismissal was a radicalization of policy toward the peasantry. Recognition of the important role of the peasantry was reflected in the CC’s announcement of 20 July (Doc. C.1). The announcement claimed that the Chinese revolution had entered a new phase: the phase of the land revolution. It acknowledged that the organizational capacity of the proletariat was insufficient for it to lead the “revolutionary alliance of workers, peasants, and the petty bourgeoisie.” Yet despite all signs to the contrary, the revolution was not in decline but was “actually continuing to rise.” This tendency to ignore reality and to see a new revolutionary tide on every horizon was a feature throughout this period.

On 7 August 1927, an Emergency Conference of the CCP CC was held in Hankou.¹ The intention of the Conference was to evaluate past policy, put forward a new strategy, and elect the new party leadership. The newly arrived Comintern representative, Lominadze, had called for the meeting and together with Qu Qiubai, Li Weiham, and Zhang Tailei set about the preparatory work.² Yet the emergency was already over as far as general political direction and party leadership were concerned. The Conference marked the formal transition from a strategy of cooperation with the GMD to one of opposition. The “Circular Letter” (Doc. C.2) blamed the past disasters on the ideological errors of the former leadership. It denounced the “opportunist” mistakes made in attitude toward the GMD and the mass movement. In line with the circular of 20 July (see Doc. C.1), the letter particularly stressed the failure to support fully the rural revolution. On future strategy it had little to say, emphasizing the sole leadership of the CCP yet still calling for collaboration with GMD leftists. This appeal for continued cooperation derived not only from Stalin’s need to show infallibility in his political struggles with Trotsky³ but also from the situation within China. Significant members of the GMD still supported the CCP, and it was hoped that they could be rallied to the communist cause. In the GMD central leadership there was Song Qingling (Sun Yat-sen’s widow) and Deng Yanda; in the military, He Long and Ye Ting. A number of grass-roots GMD branches and troops also favored the Communists.⁴

The Comintern’s need to place the blame on the CCP leadership is apparent in Lominadze’s speech to the Conference (Doc. C.3). According to Lominadze, far from having been given bad advice, the CCP was at fault for having failed to carry out Comintern instructions among the masses.⁵

Qu Qiubai’s speech on behalf of the Standing Committee of the Politburo (Doc. C.4) outlined the new strategy of rebellions, inciting army mutinies, and initiating peasant uprisings. The former referred to the recent Nanchang Uprising and the latter to the Autumn Harvest Uprising that was in preparation. Mao Zedong’s comments (Doc. C.5) are interesting not because of any startling insights revealed but because of the way in which their vivid tone reflected Mao’s unique personality and political approach. Mao compared the past relationship with the GMD to that of a shy bride being carried into a new house without the determination to become the mistress. Significantly, in stressing the importance of military affairs, Mao noted that “political power grows out of the barrel of a gun.”

Organizationally, the party prepared itself for work underground. The resolution on the organizational question stated that the main task was to “forge strong, secret” organizations.⁶ The need for secrecy also meant that discipline had to be tightened, as infringements could lead to destruction of the organization. While working underground, the maintenance of party organizations in labor unions was given the highest priority. However, the need for secrecy was not to stifle inner-party democracy, as this had contributed to the recent mistakes of “opportunism.”

Finally, the meeting adjusted the party’s central leadership. A new nine-person temporary Politburo was elected to direct party affairs pending the convocation, within six months, of a national congress (in fact, it was not convened until June 1928, and then in Moscow).⁷ This temporary Politburo held its first meeting on 9 August and elected a three-person Standing Committee of Qu Qiubai, Li Wei-han, and Su Zhaozheng. In addition, Qu Qiubai was made responsible for Peasant Affairs, the Propaganda Department, and the editing of the party’s newspaper, Dang-

bao. Li Weihan was put in charge of the Organization Department and the Secretariat, and Su Zhaozheng was placed in charge of the Labor Committee. Further, Zhou Enlai was placed in charge of Military Affairs with Wang Ruofei temporarily his deputy, and Yang Zhihua was placed in charge of the Women's Department.

The insurrectionary policy began with the Autumn Harvest Uprising, which had already been decided on in early August by the three-person Standing Committee (Doc. C.6). The intention was for it to begin simultaneously in the four southern provinces of Hunan, Hubei, Guangdong, and Jiangxi. It was here that the Communists had developed strong ties with the peasantry before and during the Northern Expedition. The general strategy was to use the peasant associations as the basis for revolutionary power in the countryside. The associations were to set up a land committee to distribute land, but no land of middle peasants was to be confiscated. Rent was to be abolished for temple land, etc., and for the land of landlords who owned over 50 mu. Mao Zedong⁸ together with Peng Gongda left Wuhan for Hunan to take charge of the uprising. At the temporary Politburo meeting of 9 August, it was decided that with Peng Gongda Mao was to consult with the Hunan provincial committee about forming a new committee and to report the results to the CC.⁹ Peng was appointed secretary of the Hunan Provincial Party Committee (Doc. C.7).

Peng Gongda's report (Doc. C.8) provides the most detailed and reliable account of the uprising by one of the Chinese leaders.¹⁰ The uprising was a failure. Only in east Hunan, where Mao Zedong was active, did it get off the ground. However, even there it was quickly defeated. On 12 September, worker and peasant troops took over Liling, but on 15 September the majority of the troops defected or abandoned their positions. The remaining troops were defeated by 17 September. Following these setbacks, at a meeting on 19 September, Mao and the Hunan Front Committee decided to abandon the CC's orders to attack Changsha. The meeting proposed a march east and then south to the Jinggang Mountains on the Hunan-Jiangxi border.¹¹

Peng's report analyzes the reasons for the failure of the uprising. According to Peng, the major fault lay in the fact that the peasantry were not mobilized sufficiently. The uprisings in the different areas relied too heavily on the military, thus failing to arouse the interest of the peasantry. Second, he accuses the party leadership and ordinary members of not having the stomach for a real fight, thus displaying their continued petty bourgeois mentality. Peng's complaints notwithstanding, the main legacy of the uprising was that it had sought to involve the local peasantry. To some extent, it was successful.

The failure of the Nanchang and Autumn Harvest Uprisings did not dampen the enthusiasm of the party central authorities. Far from it. Under Qu Qiubai's leadership an even more radical position was adopted. The Enlarged Conference of the Temporary Politburo (9-10 November 1927) decided to sever all relations with the GMD no matter whether left or right (Doc. C.9).¹² Policy for the rural and urban areas was also radicalized. Landlords, big and small, were to be shown no leniency, and workers were to take power in the factories into their own hands. A strategy of nationwide insurrections was proposed, and the leaders of the Nanchang and Autumn Harvest Uprisings, Mao included, were criticized for their rightism.

The November conference actually reflected the weakness of the central party leadership. Although the exhortations were to apply to the whole country, in reality they only applied to the situation in Canton. In fact, on 17 November 1927, the Standing Committee of the temporary Politburo called for an uprising throughout the whole province. Initially the uprising in Canton (December 1927) was a great success but ended quickly in total failure. The latter months of 1927 witnessed a number of uprisings. They were only successful in the sense that they led to the creation of communist armed forces and the establishment of communist-held territorial bases, thus offering a new alternative for the future. In terms of Qu Qiubai's strategy, they were a failure. They had failed to regain the initiative for the Communists by leading to a nationwide revolutionary movement. The defeat of the Canton Commune so swiftly after the defeats of the Communists in the Nanchang and Autumn Harvest Uprisings made it clear that a shift in tactics was necessary. It was impossible for the Party Center under Qu Qiubai to continue with its "putschism." The party had lost contact with the working class in major centers such as Shanghai, Wuhan, and Canton. The insurrectionary policy, even where the peasantry had been mobilized, had been intended to restore the initiative to the proletariat under the CCP's leadership by seizing major urban centers. The failure of this approach signaled the effective end of the proletariat as the main force of the revolution.

(b) The Sixth Party Congress—Reassessment of Strategy

A National Congress was needed to reassess the past and sanction a shift in policy direction. Thus, preparations began for the Sixth Congress, and for reasons of security it was held in Moscow (18 June to 11 July 1928).¹³ In April 1928, the Comintern suggested that Qu Qiubai, Luo Yinong, Ren Bishi, Zhou Enlai, and Huang Pingying should go immediately to Moscow to begin preparations. While this group was in Moscow it was decided that Li Weiham, Ren Bishi, and Luo Dengxian would preside over work in China.¹⁴

The Congress had two points of departure. First, that while the policy of military confrontation with the GMD was now inevitable, second, the reckless "putschism" pursued by Qu Qiubai had not shown any tangible success. The Congress adopted seven resolutions, of which the "Political Resolution" was the most important, and a revised Constitution.¹⁵

The "Political Resolution" adopted by the Congress defined the revolution as bourgeois democratic under the leadership of the proletariat with its vanguard the CCP (Doc. C.10). It depicted China as being in a trough between two waves. The first revolutionary wave had receded because of "repeated failures," and the new wave had not yet arrived. This notion allowed "putschism" to be attacked while supporting future insurrections. Judging the waves was a difficult business, and it is not surprising that the new Chinese leadership would seize on any sign of heightened activity as the arrival of a new crest.

The notion of the movement developing in waves was not an innovation of the Congress but had been put forward by the ECCI in February 1928. While criticizing the previous "excesses," in particular the Canton Commune, the ECCI maintained that a further revolutionary upsurge was possible. However, such upsurges would be irregular, and thus the party must take care not to allow the movement to run out of control. Instead the mass organizations were to be built up to ensure coordination.¹⁶

The "Political Resolution" stated that since the national bourgeoisie had betrayed the revolution, the workers and peasants were to form the core of future activities. The party was to reorganize the masses into labor unions and peasant associations. Despite objective reasons for the failure of the revolution, the "Political Resolution" stated that "the principal reason for the failure of the revolution was the opportunist policy" pursued by the CCP. The conciliatory policy of the CCP and the failure to develop the rural revolution and class struggle were identified as the causes. While criticizing Chen Duxiu's policies as opportunist right-deviation, Qu Qiubai's policies were criticized as a putschist left-deviation. Both rightist and leftist trends were to be resisted, but now "leftism" was identified as the greater danger.

A unique contribution of the Congress to communist strategy was its designation of the soviet as a governmental system to be established in the wake of armed uprisings to replace the old political regime (Doc. C.11). Leaving many questions aside, the introduction of the soviet did lay down the formula of a basic trinity of the CCP, the soviet government, and the Red Army as the basis for communist revolution in the following decade. While it is clear that the resolution on the soviet treated it as the ideal form of mass democracy applicable throughout the whole country, in practice the soviet came to stand for the buildup of military base areas in the countryside from which the Communists would proceed to encircle the cities and take over state power.

While the Sixth Congress made it clear that the intention was to recapture a hold on the urban bases, the situation led to a greater emphasis being placed on the revolutionary role of the peasantry.¹⁷ This is reflected in the "Resolution on the Peasant Question" (Doc. C.12). The party was to form a united front with as many of the peasantry as possible.¹⁸ Alliances were to be formed with middle peasants, rich peasants were to be neutralized, and poor peasants were to be put in charge of the peasant associations. The importance of guerrilla warfare conducted by the peasantry was stressed. While excesses were to be avoided, careful planning and leadership by the party was expected to ensure that such warfare would lead to the extension of rural reform and the buildup of a worker-peasant revolutionary Red Army. Yet this increased emphasis on the role of the peasantry by no means meant that it had become the leading class. The peasantry was to be under the hegemony of the proletariat.

The Congress also adopted a new Constitution to address the various organizational changes that had taken place (Doc. C.13). In particular, amendments were made to the section on membership, and the principle of democratic centralism was emphasized. To ensure collective leadership, it stipulated that party congresses be held annually as had been the case previously. In fact, the next party congress was not held until 1945!

Finally, the Congress elected a new CC with twenty-three members and thirteen alternates and a new Central Control Commission with three members and two alternates. On 19 July, the CC met in plenary session and elected members of the new leadership. The Politburo had seven full members: Su Zhaozheng (twenty-two votes), Xiang Ying (twenty-two), Xiang Zhongfa (twenty-one), Zhou Enlai (twenty-one), Qu Qiubai (sixteen), Cai Hesen (sixteen), and Zhang Guotao (ten); and seven alternates: Li Lisan (twenty-two), Guan Xiangying (twenty-two), Luó Dengxian (eighteen), Peng Pai (seventeen), Yang Yin (seventeen), Lu Futan (fourteen), Xu Xigen (fourteen). A Standing Committee comprising Xiang Zhongfa, Zhou Enlai, Su Zhaozheng, Xiang Ying, and Cai Hesen was elected with Li Lisan, Xu Xigen, and Yang Yin as alternates.¹⁹ The following day, the Politburo met for the first time and elected Xiang Zhongfa as chair of the Politburo and CC.²⁰

On the surface, the Sixth Congress appeared to have produced an appropriate long-term program. In reality, it presented the CCP with an intractable problem. The central issue of the revolution was to be the rural question, while it was of paramount importance that the CCP recapture its proletarian base in the urban areas. The chance of fulfilling these objectives was further complicated by the more radical turn of events in both China and the Soviet Union shortly after the Congress.

The central party leadership returned to China to find a more favorable situation than they had left. In the cities, the CCP was beginning to recover from the shock waves caused by the GMD suppression and the failed uprisings. In the rural areas, the latter months of 1928 witnessed a steady growth of the Red Army and the soviet areas. Particularly important were the bases on the Jiangxi-Hunan border under Mao Zedong and Zhu De, on the Hunan-Hubei border under He Long and Zhou Yiqun, on the Hubei-Henan-Anhui border under Xu Xiangqian, in east Hunan under Peng Dehuai, and in northwest Jiangxi under Fang Zhimin. The Red Army and the soviets were beginning to emerge as dynamic new forces in the communist movement.

Of greater immediate direct influence on the new party leadership was the factional struggle between Stalin and Bukharin. Although rumors of differences had circulated at the Sixth Party Congress, Bukharin supervised the Congress on behalf of the Comintern. Indeed, the "Political Resolution" was based on the nine-hour (sic!) speech that he delivered to the Congress, and the new Politburo was put together on his instructions. By the end of 1928, Bukharin had become the main target of Stalin's attacks for his "rightist" or "rich peasant line."

(c) The Second Plenum—June 1929— The Emergence of the Li Lisan Leadership

An increasingly leftward trend was first noticeable when the more radical Li Lisan replaced the more cautious Cai Hesen in the Politburo in November 1928. Li also took over as head of propaganda, giving him a prominent position in the party. Cai was transferred to Moscow, thus marginalizing his impact in the leadership in China. Gradually, Li Lisan moved to challenge the more cautious Zhou Enlai.²¹ Zhou was able to keep the upper hand, maintaining the moderate line of the Sixth Congress until the Second Plenum (June 1929). However, party practice was radicalizing again as party organizations were reformed and the workers' movement was expanded.

On 8 February 1929, the ECCI issued a letter to the CCP CC claiming that signs of a new revolutionary wave were clearly visible in China. As a result the ECCI warned that at the present time, the "rightist trend" was particularly dangerous.²² Shortly after the letter arrived, the Politburo drafted a formal resolution on how the party should apply the Comintern line in its practical work.²³ Indeed, the period until April 1930 marks a distinct phase in the shift of party policy.

The Second Plenum of the Sixth Congress (25–30 June 1929) marked a further step in the leftward trend of party policy, although neither Li Lisan nor Zhou Enlai was able to dominate the other totally.²⁴ The "Political Resolution" (Doc. C.14) passed by the Plenum attempted to reaffirm the correctness of the policies of the Sixth Congress while at the same time hailing the recent Comintern directive. On the current situation, the "Political Resolution" tried to play it safe by stating that it was incorrect to think either that the new revolutionary wave was far away or that its arrival was imminent. While calling for a fight against "rightism" and "leftism," it copied the ECCI February letter in judging that "rightism" was the particularly dangerous trend in the party at the present time.

The antirightist drive in Moscow continued to affect the Party Center in Shanghai. On 26 October 1929, the ECCI sent another letter to the CCP CC (Doc. C.15), this time announcing the beginning of "the revolutionary high tide."²⁵ The party was to take over the leadership of this new revolutionary wave by overcoming its "petty bourgeois vacillations." Once again the Comintern reinforced the view that at the present time "rightism" was the most dangerous trend in the party. The Politburo responded to this letter by adopting resolutions on 20 December 1929 and 11 January 1930 that fully accepted the Comintern's position and that heralded a stronger criticism of "rightism."²⁶ Unfortunately the revolutionary tide did not exist, at least in the urban areas. The Comintern's insistence on political strikes and preparation for armed insurrection served to alienate the proletariat rather than to rally it to the communist cause. The CCP leadership decided to use the rising soviet movement in the countryside as a means of recapturing its influence in the cities.

This attack on "rightism" was seen in the Politburo decision of 5 October 1929 attacking Chen Duxiu for his "Trotskyite" and "liquidationist tendencies" (Doc. C.16).²⁷ While Chen was in power before July 1927, he had no particular association with Trotsky and had adhered to the position of accommodation with the GMD approved by Stalin but opposed by Trotsky. The argumentation in the decision was tortuous. The decision claimed that Trotsky's request that the CCP break away from the GMD meant leaving the leadership of the Chinese revolution to the bourgeoisie alone, thus renouncing proletarian leadership. Yet, Chen Duxiu's persistence in cooperating with the GMD meant subordination of the proletariat to the bourgeoisie, thus also giving up leadership by the proletariat. In reply, Chen and his followers criticized not only the military adventurism of the Party Center but also the bureaucratic corruption of Stalin in the Soviet Union (Doc. C.17).²⁸ Chen Duxiu was indeed moving closer to Trotsky! The letter lays the blame for the failure of the Chinese revolution and the continued "opportunist" and "putchist" policies of the CCP squarely on the shoulders of the Comintern and Stalin and Bukharin. While criticizing these policies, the letter called for a reappraisal of the use of the parliament and the democratic movement while awaiting a future revolutionary high tide.

The conflict between Li Lisan and Zhou Enlai caused the latter to leave China for Moscow in April 1930.²⁹ This gave Li Lisan complete control over the central party leadership, and his radical line shifted into top gear. In addition to encouragement from the Comintern and the further development of the red armies and soviets (albeit still extremely tenuous), the outbreak of civil war within the GMD seemed to provide Li with the chance to launch his strategy. On 5 April 1930, a major conflict broke out between the Nanjing government of Chiang Kai-shek and the combined forces of Yan Xishan and Feng Yuxiang.³⁰ As a result, most regular GMD troops were transferred to the north, leaving just local troops and the police to guard the southern cities. The Communists took this clash in the GMD ranks as a sufficient condition for a revolutionary insurrection.

In May 1930, Li Lisan convened two conferences in Shanghai: the National Conference of Delegates from the Red Armies and the National Conference of Delegates from the Soviet Areas. While the latter Conference drew more attention because of its call for the establishment of a national soviet regime, the former was of more immediate and practical significance. The red armies were ordered to combine together into four army corps, with each being assigned a certain strategic locality for offense. The former guerrilla tactic was replaced by that of mobile warfare, thus paving the way for the adoption of the policy of attack on the large cities and main communication lines.³¹

The strategy was spelled out by the Politburo on 11 June 1930 in its new resolution (Doc. C.18).³² The current stage was seen as one of revolutionary upsurge, and it proposed that Wuhan be seized as a part of the takeover of one or more provinces. The resolution sought to implement the Comintern's wishes in China, but the failure of the strategy caused it to become the focus of critical attention in the Soviet Union some months later.

The resolution was sent to the Comintern for approval but the Comintern delayed making a formal reply possibly because of the link made by Li Lisan between the Chinese and world revolutions.³³ Later the Comintern was to criticize the efforts made in the resolution to show the interdependence of the Chinese revolution and the world revolution. The 11 June resolution claimed that because China was the weakest link in the ruling chain of world imperialism, the Chinese revolution could occur first, setting off the world revolution and the final class war. While such an analysis could be justified in terms of the Comintern's view that the stability of world capitalism would soon erode, though at an uneven pace, depending on place, the Comintern may not have been too happy to have Li Lisan lecturing it on the world revolution. The resolution also hinted at the need for Soviet aid, something that Li Lisan would soon openly ask for. This was ignored by the Comintern. It was not in a position to call on Soviet Russia to support the Chinese revolution. This appeal was later denounced as an error of "semi-Trotskyism." The prediction that a successful bourgeois-democratic revolution would soon be transformed into a socialist one was also cited later as proof of Li's Trotskyite tendencies. However, this too had been a prediction in line with Comintern analysis at the time.

On 16 July 1930, the Party Center sent another letter to the Presidium of the ECCI calling for approval of the strategy outlined in the resolution of 11 June. Two days later, the National Conference of CCP Organizations opened in Shanghai (18-22 July). The Conference announced that the party's general task was to organize armed uprisings to seize political power and that the party was preparing to take power. Further, it called for action committees to be established at the central and local levels. In the "red areas," workers and peasants' revolutionary committees were to be established. These would be the sole leading organs.³⁴

A reply was eventually made by the Comintern, whose letter of June 1930 to the CCP CC has produced different interpretations (Doc. C.19).³⁵ The letter contained no substantial disagreement with Li Lisan either in terms of general policy or even with respect to practical strategy. What was indicated between the lines, however, was worry over Li Lisan's operations and shirking of responsibility, which fully accorded with the position of the Comintern leaders in the early 1930s. The Comintern leaders were not so foolhardy as Li to claim world revolution was imminent; nor did they dare to exclude the possibility of a successful revolution in China. The letter did not oppose the idea of taking over Wuhan and one or more provinces, but it seemed to oppose Li's notion of an "immediate nationwide revolution."

It is a moot point as to when Li Lisan and the Party Center knew of the Comintern's views. Letters could take up to one or two months to arrive, and the full text probably did not arrive until early September. However, CCP leaders were already informed of its contents by late July from telegraphic messages received by the ECCI Far East Office in Shanghai.³⁶

On 27 July, Peng Dehuai's Third Army Corps³⁷ took the city of Changsha, but was only able to hold it for seven days before retreating. The collapse of the attack and the worldwide attention it drew undermined Li Lisan's position. Ironically, Li Lisan knew little of the Changsha attack. Communications were slow, and it seems that no direct orders were sent. Indeed, Li came to learn of the capture of Changsha through GMD broadcasts and newspapers.³⁸ It did lead Li to call two Politburo meetings on 1 and 3 August, at which he rejected Comintern concern and announced the arrival of a nationwide revolutionary upsurge.³⁹ On 6 August, Li Lisan chaired the first meeting of the Central Action Committee, calling on the whole party to mobilize for immediate revolution.

By August 1930 the Comintern was more clearly of the opinion that Li had gone too far. Qu Qiubai and Zhou Enlai were sent back to China to moderate Li's excesses but not yet to repudiate his policy wholesale.⁴⁰ This is not surprising, given that it would be difficult to extricate the Comintern from sharing the blame. Although it is not clear that the Comintern gave an instruction for another attack on Changsha, clearly Zhou was not given an instruction to prevent a further attack. Both Zhou and Qu were in China when the second attack took place (24 August–12 September). Also a few articles were published in Red Flag encouraging the operation, presumably at Li's instigation.

Apart from Comintern vacillation, other factors probably contributed to Zhou and Qu's unwillingness to take a tougher line at the Third Plenum (24–28 September 1930).⁴¹ Qu himself had pursued a "leftist" line only two years before, and Zhou Enlai's previous involvement with Li Lisan and his conciliatory personality also contributed. The "Political Resolution" adopted by the Plenum noted the basic concordance between Li Lisan's policy and that of the Comintern and only criticized Li for his tactical errors, particularly concerning the speed and development of the revolution (Doc. C.20). This mild approach to criticism was reflected in the fact that no basic changes were made in the Politburo that was elected. Indeed, Li Lisan supporter Li Weiham was added as an alternate member of the Politburo.⁴²

(d) The Fourth Plenum—January 1931— The Rise of Wang Ming's Leadership

Although the Comintern refrained from criticism of Li Lisan while the strategy was in operation, as soon as it failed, harsh condemnation followed.⁴³ Between the Third and Fourth Plenums (September 1930–January 1931), factional conflicts and power struggles within the CCP increased. Li Lisan's strongest opponents were Wang Ming and the "returned students" group. They had as their principal supporter Pavel Mif, the Comintern representative in China.⁴⁴ Yet, opposition had little to do with current or future policy and was not based on opposition to a "leftist" line. Wang Ming, in an article published four days after the 11 June resolution, only differed from Li in his assessment that the Chinese revolution could occur immediately without depending on world revolution as its precondition.⁴⁵

Also, the Comintern began to toughen its stance as Pavel Mif and his supporters in the Comintern became dissatisfied with the decisions of the Third Plenum. In October 1930, the ECCI sent members of the CC a letter stating that Li Lisan's mistakes were ones of line.⁴⁶ It labeled Li Lisan "anti-Comintern" and a "semi-Trotskyite." Mif himself arrived in China in mid-December 1930 and proposed that the Fourth Plenum be convened as soon as possible. The Plenum was held in Shanghai on 7 January and was dominated by Mif and his protégé, Wang Ming.⁴⁷ Indeed, the summary speech was made by Mif.

The resolution of the Fourth Plenum (Doc. C.21), drafted under Mif's guidance, was harsh in its condemnation of Li Lisan. Li was accused of betraying the correct instructions of the Comintern and bringing havoc to the party. Li's "line" was summed up as being contradictory to that of the Comintern and was essentially an opportunist viewpoint camouflaged by "leftist" words. Its attitude toward the revolutionary task of organizing the masses was one of "opportunistic passivism." Betraying the Comintern line was true to the extent that the Comintern itself had abandoned the idea of using the Red Army to seize the urban areas.

For its new leadership in China, the Comintern did not turn to the soviet areas but to Wang Ming and the "returned students." There were substantial changes in the Politburo with Wang Ming becoming a full member. Wang had not even been a CC member previously. Qu Qiubai, Li Weiham, and Li Lisan were dismissed from their Politburo positions, while, in addition to Wang Ming, Ren Bishi, Liu Shaoqi, and Wang Kequan were elected. Although Xiang Zhongfa remained general secretary, real power lay with Wang Ming.⁴⁸ Several months after the Plenum, the strength of the "returned students" was increased with the promotion of Bo Gu and Zhang Wentian.

Excluded from the new party leadership was the group gathered around He Mengxiong and Luo Zhanglong, who had opposed Li Lisan's adventurism from a practical point of view. From the beginning, they had been closely linked to the communist labor movement and saw that Li's policies were destroying it. However, lacking the support of Pavel Mif, they were labeled as "right opportunists."⁴⁹ They opposed the decisions of the Fourth Plenum and began to organize opposition to it. Indeed, He Mengxiong had opposed convening the Plenum, calling for an emergency conference similar to that of 7 August 1927. On 17 January 1931, He, Luo, and their supporters decided to bring their opposition out into the open. They organized a second Jiangsu party committee to rival the one headed by Wang Ming, and they demanded that an emergency party congress be convened and that Mif be recalled.

The following day, however, He, Lin Yunan, and other supporters were arrested by the British police and handed over to the Nationalists. They were executed on 7 February. Luo and the remaining supporters charged that the "returned students" had betrayed them. Not surprisingly, Wang Ming denied this, claiming that one of their own number had betrayed them. Whichever of these two versions is correct, it was very convenient for Wang Ming and his supporters.⁵⁰

Following the arrest, the Party Center launched a drive to break the influence of Luo Zhanglong and the group's remaining supporters. From 20 January onward, various critical resolutions were published culminating with the one expelling Luo from the party on 27 January 1931. This resolution accused Luo of heading a rightist group. It used the simple defense that because the Fourth Plenum was convened by the Comintern, anyone who opposed its decision was anti-Comintern and antiparty.⁵¹ Luo continued his oppositional politics (see, for example, Doc. C.22) and set up a rival CC with branches in some six provinces.⁵² The opposition collapsed when Luo was arrested by the GMD in April 1933.

(e) Mao Zedong and Li Lisan

The relationship of Mao Zedong to the Li Lisan line is an interesting and controversial topic. In assessing this question, the background of the more radical and moderate positions represented by Li and Zhou within the Party Center and the increasingly leftward drift in the party's general line need to be borne in mind. As evidence of conflict between Li and Mao, the exchange of two letters between the Party Center and the Front Committee in early 1929 have been quoted.⁵³ The 7 February 1929 letter from the Party Center to the Front Committee of the Fourth Red Army was most probably written by Zhou Enlai as head of the Organization Department and the Central General Office. The letter adjudged the situation to be a stalemate and suggested that Mao and Zhu De leave the Fourth Red Army and that it be broken up into small squads (Doc. C.23). The reply on 5 April was drafted by Mao. He pointed out that the central leadership's evaluations of both the objective conditions and the subjective strength of the revolution were too pessimistic. He expressed his confidence that his troops would take over the whole of Jiangxi within one year (Doc. C.24). Thus Mao was critical of Zhou's moderate stand while lending support, intentionally or not, to Li Lisan's more radical position. However, Mao's main concern was the operations of his own troops and not the differences within the party's central leadership. It should be noted that the Party Center's letter of February was written immediately after the Fourth Red Army's loss of the Jinggang Mountains base, while the reply in April came after the army's rehabilitation in south Jiangxi and west Fujian. These immediate military situations strongly influenced the pessimistic and optimistic views expressed in the respective letters.

Mao's "Single Spark" letter of 5 January 1930 to Lin Biao (Doc. C.25) has usually been taken to show his opposition to the Li Lisan leadership. Mao was countering what he saw as the pessimistic tendencies within the party, putting forward his independent position against the Party Center as a whole. In fact, he tacitly supported the aggressive posture favored by Li Lisan and still seemed to reject Zhou Enlai's more cautious position.

It was not until the central leadership under Li Lisan began to gain control over the red armies that Mao and Li came into conflict. Li Lisan wanted to bring all the Red Army troops under a more centralized leadership, using them to launch a concerted attack on the large cities. Mao supported the first action, and thus a joint headquarters was formed to be in charge of all the Red Army forces in Jiangxi with Mao as its leader. Mao did not support the second action. Instead of directing his troops to the north, he moved them to the south and east. Mao used as an excuse the three GMD brigades blocking the route to the north. Furthermore, Mao drafted a three-month plan for spreading all his troops into the countryside of south Jiangxi and west Fujian.

Contradictions between Mao and the Party Center increased. In April 1930 the Party Center sent Mao a letter warning him that the Fourth Red Army was very slow in its buildup of forces and that results were extremely unsatisfactory.⁵⁴ This letter claimed that this was because of Mao's conservative position and his deployment of the troops in the countryside. Instead Mao was called on to do his best to expand the Red Army. This seems to have spurred Mao. His Fourth Army had not expanded as vigorously as some others, such as Peng Dehuai's Fifth Army. Between February 1930 and June 1930, Peng had tripled the number of his troops and captured a number of medium and even large cities.

On 15 June 1930, Mao was criticized even more harshly for his inertia and instructed to take his troops north. In July, the Third Army Corps under Peng Dehuai⁵⁵ took over Yuezhou and Changsha. As a result, Mao changed tactics and quickly moved his troops north to join in the assault on the big cities. Mao's troops and Peng's forces, which had just withdrawn from Changsha, were merged into the First Front Army, and Mao was appointed general political commissar. Another assault was made on Changsha, but after two weeks, Mao pulled all the troops back to his Jiangxi base. Despite this failure in the eyes of the Party Center, Mao retained his position as general political commissar. The fact that he then guided his troops to take over the prefectural city of Ji'an (on 3 October 1930), claiming it the initial phase in capturing the whole of Jiangxi, suggests that Mao had not yet realized that Li's line was erroneous.

As the Joint Resolution of the Front Committee of the First Front Army and the Action Committee of Jiangxi Province of 26 October 1930 shows (Doc. C.26), Mao was still ignorant of the Comintern's criticism of the Li Lisan line at that time. The resolution continues to use phrases such as "the necessity of carrying out decisive class struggle" and "striving to win an initial victory" in Jiangxi. However, as far as practical issues were concerned, the resolution shows that Mao depended on his control of Red Army troops and his judgment of the actual situation rather than on the slogans of the Party Center.

A deep concern with the military forces under his command and the real situation rather than general party affairs and Marxist doctrine dictated Mao's position and strategy. In this sense Mao appeared as an opponent of the Li Lisan leadership; probably he would have opposed any central party authority at the time. However, the only period of direct confrontation was from April to June 1930 when Li tried to command Mao's troops directly. Apart from this period, Mao had acted, wittingly or not, in line with the radical impulses of the central leadership under Li Lisan. Furthermore, it was through the Li Lisan adventure that Mao rose rapidly through the ranks of the military command structure. In less than half a year, he had moved up to head a front army. Mao thus ended his three-year exclusion from the top leadership.

The beginning of 1931 saw a generally satisfactory situation for the CCP. At one point in 1927, party membership had dipped as low as ten thousand. Despite the two “leftist lines” of Qu Qiubai and Li Lisan, the party grew roughly tenfold by the end of 1930. Yet it was clear that the momentum of the movement had shifted from the urban to the rural areas. The Li Lisan line and the ensuing factional clashes had sharply reduced communist influence in the cities, and the central authorities in Shanghai functioned as a group of underground agents. The strategy of armed insurrections based on the potential that the Communists had built up during the Northern Expedition had been played out. It was replaced by an emphasis on the solid expansion of soviet bases and the Red Army. Important bases had been developed under Mao in Jiangxi, He Long in west Hunan-Hubei, and Xu Xiangqian in Hubei-Henan-Anhui. Despite the failure to take over a major city or to win a victory in one or more provinces, the military capacity of the Red Army had generally increased. The period of rebellions was replaced by one of civil war with the Nationalists, while the Communists developed their base areas and built up their armies.

C.1 CC Circular No. 9 on the Peasantry—The General Strategy for the Peasant Movement at the Present Time (20 July 1927)⁵⁶

1) In recent years, the progress of the peasant movement in China has demonstrated that the Chinese revolution has entered a new phase—the phase of the land revolution. The land revolution is merely a process. The evolution of this process requires a democratic regime of workers, peasants, and the petty bourgeoisie led by the proletariat and the armed forces of the workers and peasants. At present this revolution has suffered a setback in China. The causes are: (a) the leadership of the proletariat is not yet strong; in other words, the subjective organizational capacity of the proletariat is insufficient, at the moment, to lead the revolutionary alliance of workers, peasants, and the petty bourgeoisie. (b) The armed forces of the workers and peasants were not built up. (c) Our party committed the mistake of carrying out irresolute and vacillating policies. (d) The GMD CC in Wuhan, the nationalist government, and the so-called Revolutionary Army are, in their class nature, representatives of the landlord class and incapable of fulfilling the new historic mission—the land revolution. They have shifted from limiting the workers and peasants' movement to launching a full-scale counterrevolution to oppose and massacre the workers and peasants. This betrayal was a historical certainty and proves that the deepening of the revolution was to be expected. Our party's only responsibility is to fight resolutely these new counterrevolutionaries, gather together all the revolutionary forces, and open up this new revolutionary phase—the land revolution. This is the objective situation of the revolution at the present time, and it demands a new tactical response from us.

2) Peasants across the country now live in misery under the rule of the new and old warlords. The burden imposed by decades of war between new and old warlords and the economic aggression of the imperialists rests mostly on the shoulders of the poor peasants. In the north, the weight of harsh levies and taxes has already forced most peasants to abandon their land and lose their livelihood. In the various southern provinces, the miseries of the peasantry are hardly any different from those in the north. The little freedom that had been gained after repeated struggles has been snatched away again. Whether in the south or north, the majority of the poor peasants who have suffered excessive oppression (tenant peasants, semi-self-tilling peasants, farmhands, unemployed peasants, and most of the self-tilling peasants) have already been awakened and are fighting their enemies. In particular, in the south since the massacres by Li Jishen and Tang Shengzhi,⁵⁷ the peasants' resistance and struggles have become more heroic and resolute. At the same time, because of their conflicts and internal contradictions, the new and old warlords are unable to form a unified reactionary regime. One by one they are rapidly collapsing.

Therefore, while superficially the revolutionary tide throughout the country appears to be declining, it is actually continuing to rise. The current reactionary situation is only a reflection of the class conflicts that occur as the revolution evolves to the stage of solving the land problem. Only by taking a firm stand in support of this land revolution can our party lead the revolutionary tide forward. How can we create a movement for the land revolution? We can attain this objective only by quickly mastering the objective situation, seizing every opportunity, raising appropriate slogans, and leading the majority of the masses to wage continuous struggles. At present the following slogans should be used to launch the land revolution: "Do not pay harsh levies and multiple taxes"; "Do not pay precollected money and grains"; "Reduce rent by 25 percent"; "Eliminate high-interest loans"; "Confiscate the land of big landlords, local tyrants, evil gentry, and counterrevolutionaries"; "Confiscate the land of churches, temples, and all public land"; "Land to the tiller"; "Down with corrupt officials and government employees"; "Down with the local tyrants and evil gentry"; "Down with new and old warlords"; "Realize revolutionary democratic power"; "Establish the political power of the peasant associations in the countryside"; "Popular election of the county government"; "Dismantle the counterrevolutionary armed forces"; "Restore the peasant associations"; "Arm the peasants"; "Peasants must have freedom of assembly, association, speech, publication, rent strikes, and tax resistance."

3) In northern provinces, such as Hebei, Shandong, Shanxi, and Henan, self-tilling and semi-self-tilling peasants make up the majority [of the rural population]. The heavy taxes and levies drive them to bankruptcy, thus forcing them into banditry or causing them to seek refuge in other provinces. Here we should rely on the self-tilling peasants, poor peasants, and tenant peasants as the core to unite into a fighting alliance all the poor masses and small landlords in the countryside to resist all harsh levies, taxes, and the early collection of money and grains, all war requisitions; and to enforce a 25 percent rent reduction. At the same time, through these struggles we can seize political power in the countryside, take over the armed forces, and even confiscate the land of the village bosses, the gentry, the big landlords, the counterrevolutionaries, and all the churches and temples and distribute it freely among the peasants and tenants.

In southern provinces, such as Hunan, Hubei, Jiangxi, and Guangdong, tenant peasants make up the majority, followed by self-tilling and semi-self-tilling peasants. Tenant peasants are exploited by the landlords through heavy rents. At the same time, self-tilling peasants and small landlords are exploited by unusually heavy taxes and levies imposed by the warlords. We should start immediately to enforce a rent reduction of 25 percent and stage rent and tax strikes using the slogan "resist harsh levies and taxes and the early collection of money and grains." This is also intended to expose the hypocrisy of the Wuhan and Nanjing governments on the issue of rent and tax reduction. In addition, we can rely on the tenant peasants, self-tilling peasants, and poor peasants as the core to unite all poor people and even small landlords in the countryside, crush local tyrants, evil gentry, corrupt officials, and government employees and seize political power and place the armed forces in the countryside under the control of the peasant associations. We can even confiscate the land of local tyrants, the gentry, big landlords, counterrevolutionaries, and all the churches and temples to launch the land revolution. This is the slogan we must do our best to propagate now in order to gather together the forces of the peasant masses for its realization.

No matter where, the struggle against annual interest higher than 20 percent should be thoroughly fought because this is the demand of the common oppressed people.

4) The land revolution is merely a process, the main characteristic of which is the struggle for political power. The struggle for political power is necessary to overthrow the rule in the countryside by feudal landlords, to induce the explosion of the land issue, and to provide a mechanism for its resolution. In southern provinces, such as Guangdong and Hunan, although the chief characteristic of the peasant movement has become confiscation of [land owned by] big landlords, it is impossible to solve the land problem alone if the peasants have not gained political power. The experiences of Hunan and Guangdong show that there is nothing wrong with this analysis.

The struggle for political power is to build the peasants' revolutionary popular power or, in other words, the peasant associations. In the process of the Chinese peasant movement, the peasant association has been transformed from a professional organization into a rural political alliance with the poor peasants as its backbone. Not only has the peasant association united ordinary peasants (those who till the land or are unemployed) and incorporated artisans, primary school teachers, and small merchants, but also has drawn in some small landlords who have broken away from the influence of the big landlords and who express sympathy with the peasant association. Currently, therefore, the peasant association is a revolutionary political alliance of the rural poor peasants and other petty bourgeois elements—the peasant association as political power. This is a correct form of rural political power and should be established in all areas from now on.

5) In line with experiences gained through the peasant movement in Hunan, several points concerning the organization of peasant associations should be raised which deserve our special attention:

a) The peasant movement in each province should concentrate our human and material resources in areas of political and military importance and with important communications in order to establish a central base that can lead the peasant movement throughout the province. We should seek to deepen our work in these areas and temporarily postpone our expansion. We should never seek expansion while ignoring work inside the central base.

b) Since the peasant association unites ordinary peasants, artisans, primary school teachers, small merchants, and, under certain conditions, small landlords as well, we should pay attention to the composition of its leadership at each level. Perhaps small landlords, as a whole, should not be assimilated into the leading organs. In addition, tenant peasants, self-tilling peasants, and unemployed peasants should each account for at least one-fifth of the area executive committee [qufen zhiwei]. The election of primary school teachers to area executive committees is necessary.

c) Peasant associations at each level should set up women's and youth departments. The children's movement and organizations in the countryside come entirely under the jurisdiction of the youth department. Female peasants are to join the peasant association; no separate women's groups will be organized.

6) The peasant associations' struggle for political power and the land revolution require a revolutionary armed force to ensure victory. However, the so-called Revolutionary Army is now under the command of those reactionary officers who represent the landlord class. Everywhere, they murder peasants. Armed conflict has become a very widespread phenomenon in the peasant movement. Now this is the most serious and pressing problem. If every peasant movement organizer fails to pay 120 percent attention to this problem and does not seek the correct solution, this will leave us ill-prepared for victory in the peasant revolution. In all places, our party organizations should use all methods to make peasants accept military training and take up arms. Some general methods are listed below:

a) Use all means to seize weapons from the landlord class and all counterrevolutionaries, and arm the peasants.

b) Organize and send brave peasant association members to the military for training; use all methods to carry out sabotage against its [the military's] organization and prepare to seize its weapons.

c) The above methods are also to be applied to the civil police bureau and self-defense corps whose weapons cannot be seized immediately.

d) It is not possible for the peasant armed forces to function openly under names such as "Peasant Self-Defense Army" or "Peasant Army." They can function only in the following three forms: (i) they can use the legitimate name of "Household Regiment," "Defense Regiment," "Village Association," etc.; (ii) they can be dispersed in ordinary times, receive secret training, and be assembled as soon as fighting breaks out; (iii) they can "go up to the mountains" [shang shan—become outlaws] when the above two forms are impossible.

7) The party should send appropriate comrades to penetrate the masses of such armed groups as the Red Spear and Sword Societies in the north and lead them to fight for their interests. This will win their trust, and gradually they will break away from their reactionary leaders and become the armed forces of the revolution. We must never attack their reactionary leaders at the outset or propose to change their organizational forms and get rid of superstition. Such mechanical and hasty means will not win mass support. Also, if we use the previous tactics of only keeping in touch with their leaders or using the names of military leaders to mobilize them, we will not produce any results.

The bandits in the south who usually use the slogan "plunder the rich to help the poor" have also adopted the slogans of "down with local tyrants and the evil gentry" and "down with corrupt officials and government employees." At the same time, in terms of practical actions, they are moving closer to the peasant associations and sometimes even unite with the peasant associations. As a rule, the majority of them are unemployed peasants or virtually bankrupt peasants. Their economic slogans such as "plunder the rich to help the poor" are similar to "confiscate the land of the big landlords." They are natural enemies of the landlord class and rivals of the reactionary military in the cities (before they are sold out by their reactionary leaders). If we can help them to embark on the right revolutionary track, they will certainly become powerful assistants in the land revolution. However, their lives and environment are especially miserable, and their leaders are mostly of the candidate warlord type. This is why they are unable to receive correct political leadership, embark on the right revolutionary track, or fight for definite goals but rather make a regular living out of "plunder and robbery." Their thoughts and deeds follow the example of their leaders totally. Therefore, we should understand the positive role of secret society bandits in the peasant movement. On the other hand, we should also be aware of the possibility that they will become reactionary. Our objective is to improve their revolutionary qualities and provide them with revolutionary training so that they will become strong supporters of the land revolution under the leadership of the peasant associations. The methods to be employed are similar to those outlined above.

8) In the past, the party's organizations among the peasantry failed to fulfill fully their leadership responsibilities. Although in many areas tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of peasants have joined in the struggle, we have only a handful of comrades who can operate in these areas, and there are no party organizations to take over leadership responsibility. Although there are party organizations in some areas, they have not penetrated the masses (these organizations are only inside the area peasant associations but not inside the township peasant associations). Where there are organizations, they are useless. On occasion, the comrades responsible for the peasant movement have neglected the party's collective leadership and are accustomed to acting individually. This is why we believe that in party work in the countryside "with our comrades, our political enterprise will thrive; without our comrades, it will perish." Since the party cannot fulfill its active organizational responsibility in ordinary times, [when the battle breaks out] we cannot hope that it will be the only center leading the mass struggle. If our party's leadership is able to establish itself properly among the peasantry, then, first, it must ensure that party branches penetrate the township peasant associations and truly become the nuclei of the mass struggle. Second, the party's leadership of the peasantry must pass through our party groups [dangtuan] (correcting the past mistake of relying on the leaders alone); the party groups must absolutely obey the party leadership. Third, each province's party organizations should establish a peasant department [nongmin bu] and make monthly or bimonthly plans for the peasant movement. The departments should enforce the faithful execution of these plans by individual party organizations at each level.

C.2 Circular Letter of the CCP CEC to All Party Members (7 August 1927)⁵⁹

1) Introduction

[[The revolution has been in a critical stage since April 1927. Workers and peasants' organizations have suffered suppression by the Nanjing GMD under Chiang Kai-shek and the Wuhan GMD under Wang Jingwei. It is generally expected that the white terror will increase in intensity. We call on the masses to resist. We must once more point out that the counterrevolutionary forces of the GMD have actually betrayed the true principles of the GMD, which, as founded by Sun Yat-sen, was itself revolutionary. As the vanguard of the Chinese proletariat, the CCP now has a great mission to fulfill.]]

In the recent resolution of the ECCI it was pointed out that the leadership of our party had committed grave errors of opportunism.⁶⁰ The ECCI called on the entire party to criticize itself thoroughly and to correct such mistakes. The mistakes mentioned here are neither individual nor incidental but rather result from the grievously erroneous opportunist line carried out by our party's leadership. If this opportunist line is not abandoned and if the past mistakes remain uncorrected, then of course the party's future tasks cannot be correctly formulated and there will be even less chance of carrying on the revolutionary struggle and meeting the stupendous duties now facing us. In order to correct these mistakes, however, we must know how these errors were committed so that every party member will learn the lessons of the past. If the party does not correct the mistakes of the leading cadres it will be impossible to advance even one step along the revolutionary path.

[[The party of the working class must be able to correct its mistakes, and only if it publicly criticizes these mistakes will it be able to ensure that all party members join in.]]

Our strength is derived not only from our party's characteristics, but also is guaranteed by the struggle of the masses and the poor peasants who form the foundation of our party. As the ECCI's resolution states, "The CCP is carrying on a heroic struggle. The broad masses of the CCP are carrying on a truly revolutionary struggle among the lower social strata of workers, peasants, and urban poor." However, errors of opportunism have been committed by the party's leading cadres. Their constant vacillation, their irresolution at critical moments, their false, unrevolutionary theories which were contradictory to communism, and their unrevolutionary conduct are not only in complete contradiction to the resolutions and instructions of the Comintern, but also in total conflict with the revolutionary activities of the party masses.

[[Recent strikes in Shanghai, Guangdong, and Hunan attest to the glorious tradition of struggle by the masses.]]

Another glorious page in the history of the Chinese revolutionary movement was written by the comrades who led the peasant movement in Hunan. A political regime of peasant associations was set up by the peasant masses and led by CCP members. Land that belonged to the big landlords was confiscated by spontaneous action on the part of the peasants and redistributed among peasants in the villages; the local militia of the gentry were disarmed; peasant armed groups were organized; and the feudal reactionary forces were thoroughly suppressed. The peasant movement developed on a large scale, permitting the conclusion of a revolutionary—but not opportunist—alliance with the lower masses of the GMD to organize peasant revolts against the reactionary regime at Changsha. (If the party's central organ had not retreated so shamelessly at the critical stage, such revolts would undoubtedly have been victorious.) These are the achievements of the party members in Hunan. These are the best methods for solving the land problem.

[[The efforts of the party rank and file and the masses are lauded while leading party cadres are attacked as rightist, opportunist, and vacillating.]]

2) The National Revolution and Class Struggle

[(i) The party's leading organ at that time did not understand correctly the nature of the Chinese revolution, and failed to abide by the Leninist theory and practice of the Comintern. (ii) The Chinese revolution is a bourgeois-democratic revolution with its major inclination toward socialism. To maintain that, during this stage, the national anti-imperialist revolution forms a separate element in conflict with the class struggle and social revolution is erroneous and unbolshevik. The Comintern has always rejected this kind of interpretation as undesirable opportunism. (iii) The national bourgeoisie in China, unlike the compradore class in the big cities, is being hard-pressed by foreign capital and therefore has to fight an economic battle against the imperialists. The national bourgeoisie, however, stunned by the large-scale revolutionary movement of the working class, finally came to ally itself—like the landlord and compradore classes—with the ruling power of foreign capital. (iv) The class struggle of the working class against the bourgeoisie, and of the peasant masses against the feudal landlords, is not only compatible with, but necessary to, the anti-imperialist national revolution. The wavering petty bourgeoisie should be won over by the resolute revolutionary actions of the proletariat and of the CCP.]]

Here we have an evaluation of the various dynamic forces of the Chinese revolution, which should have determined the revolutionary strategy of the CCP. However, the party's leading cadres, in theory and especially in practice, had an opposite viewpoint in evaluating the strength of the various classes in the Chinese revolution. This (erroneous evaluation) caused the vacillating and hesitant opportunism of the party leadership. In the Menshevik manner, the CC separated out the national liberation movement and the class struggle as conflicting elements and seemed to think that development of the class struggle would be detrimental to the national revolution. The CC wanted the party, the working class, and the peasantry to limit their class demands and refrain from staging revolutionary struggles against the Chinese bourgeoisie and the landlords. The directive letter of 19 June [1927] sent by the CC to the Shanghai party committee declares that "one of the major characteristics of the Chinese revolution is its anti-imperialist nature. . . . In recent months we have neglected anti-imperialist activities." The CC seemed to imply that the emphasis on attacking feudalism had led to unfavorable consequences. The CC upbraided CCP members for going too far and instructed the revolutionary peasants led by our party to retreat. The same directive added that “on the one hand, the anti-imperialist movement has declined and, on the other, the workers and peasants’ movement, at least from the point of view of the petty bourgeoisie, has reached its climax. [Our party’s] activity in arming the workers and peasants, confiscating land, and calling for noncapitalist development has aroused the distrust of the petty bourgeoisie, who think that the CCP is about to turn against the GMD and carry out a class revolution instead of a national revolution.” Thus, the CC at that time deemed class struggle to be one thing and the national revolution another. The directive also stated that “the petty bourgeoisie does not realize that land confiscation is a prerequisite to the national revolution but seems to think that the CCP’s confiscation of land is aimed at a revolution like the [Bolshevik] October Revolution to expand the power of the workers and peasants. The petty bourgeoisie, as a result, must raise this issue and call for a check on the workers and peasants’ movement or a break with the CCP. Under these conditions, can [the CCP] accept the policy of the petty bourgeoisie? If we did, we would destroy our own strength, forfeit the leadership of the proletariat, and surrender to Chiang Kai-shek and it would mean a capitalist future. Can we then insist on the confiscation of land and the arming of workers and peasants? The result of such insistence would be an immediate split [with the GMD-left], leading to the immediate destruction of the revolutionary bases. If we cannot successfully cope with this difficult situation by using appropriate methods, it will mean the victory of the bourgeoisie. Should we give up the policy of arming the workers and peasants and the confiscation of land? This, of course, is undesirable. For example, in the fight against Xu Kexiang⁶¹ we have already decided on a policy of land confiscation and arming the peasants. This is an independent policy but a dangerous one. If we carry on independently, then there will be a split with the GMD. And though this would be a defeat with glory, the split would still be disadvantageous to us. We should seek a new path through which the impasse in which we now find ourselves can be overcome, thus expanding and deepening the revolution and leading it to final victory.” This directive concluded with instructions to the party members in Shanghai “not to regard the national revolutionary movement solely as a workers’ problem, but to carry on anti-imperialist propaganda among all classes,” which would mean to carry on propaganda on behalf of the Shanghai bourgeoisie. This is indeed an unheard-of, unrevolutionary, uncommunist course and clearly shows that the views of the [party’s] leading organ regarding the basic problems of the revolution, as well as on the nature of the revolution for national liberation, are entirely erroneous.

The opportunism of the CC regarding this problem reflects the influence of the bourgeoisie on Communists. The whole revolutionary policy has been turned upside down. The CC’s policy had nothing in common with the directives and resolutions of the Comintern, or with the struggle of the working class and the revolutionary peasantry.

Whoever insists on defending those opportunists or stands for a continuation of such opportunism will sever himself forever from communism.

3) The CCP and the Workers' Movement

The CCP is the vanguard of the proletariat, the most advanced, most revolutionary, and most class-conscious element of the proletariat. The work of the CCP should always be based on the basic interests of the working class and should aim at a change of the entire social structure by revolutionary methods. Since the CCP takes the welfare of the working class as its point of departure, it should raise demands which are objectively tenable in the stage of the bourgeois democratic revolution before [the revolution] reaches its socialist stage. One of the major tasks of the CCP is to organize the working masses, lead their struggle, and fight resolutely for the elevation of the living standards of the working class, for wage increases, for the establishment of an eight-hour workday, for complete freedom in organizing workers and class unions, for an unlimited right to strike, and for the elimination of the conditions of enslavement among workers who possess no rights or privileges whatsoever.

The workers can raise those demands in the course of the democratic revolution, but [they] must do so by means of an independent struggle of the proletarian masses. The CCP should spread and encourage the class struggle of the proletariat and help every workers' struggle against the bourgeoisie. The Comintern has repeatedly instructed the CCP to fight for the improvement of the material conditions of the working masses and for the improvement of living conditions in the factories and in society, for the immediate abolition of the laws which oppress the workers, and for the realization of such rights as the eight-hour workday, the increase of wages, and the recognition of workers' rights to organize unions and to strike. At the same time, the Comintern points out that it is necessary to arm the workers speedily, boldly, and resolutely, especially those elements which are most class conscious and best organized. This course is considered absolutely essential by the Comintern. Such directives of the Comintern are in keeping with the struggle of the workers themselves in the industrial areas and the actions of the rank-and-file party members. But the leading organ of our party has developed a different course. It has simply hindered and minimized the class struggle and the revolutionary actions of the workers. Instead of spreading and promoting strike movements, the CC, together with the leaders of the GMD, decided on an arbitrary method of mediation and ruled that the final authority belonged to the government. Under the government of a coalition of classes, led during this first stage by the bourgeoisie, this kind of policy actually served merely to protect the interests of the bourgeoisie and greatly obstructed the workers' movement. Our CC did not protest against the resolution of the GMD CEC that prohibited strikes in enterprises without the permission of the government, and it demanded that the unions stop fighting for the demands of the workers but rather undertake the responsibility for maintaining labor discipline. The CC seemed to think that the restriction of the workers' movement would preserve the alliance with the petty bourgeoisie, but did not understand that the irresolution shown in protecting the interests of the working class would only hasten the petty bourgeoisie's turn to the right. The CC used every method possible to restrain the workers' economic struggle and to prevent them from struggling for their direct welfare, [but failed to realize that] if these demands were not met, the leadership of the working class in the revolutionary movement would never be secured. The CC decided on such a policy at that time because its evaluation of the alliance with the petty bourgeoisie was erroneous. Also erroneous was its concept of the interest of the national revolution.

The spontaneously developing workers' movement has established powerful labor unions with a mass foundation and is entirely under the influence of CCP members. Armed workers' pickets, extensive labor organization, the youth corps, etc. have been brought into existence. The working class, discovering its own strength, rose in direct struggle against the bourgeoisie, which had become counter-revolutionary and retarded production, deliberately inviting industrial recession and financial chaos. When the unions arrested a few factory and shopowners, the whole bourgeoisie came out and shouted [about the workers'] "excesses." Joining in this cry were not only the intellectual elements of the petty bourgeoisie, but also the CC of our party. In some documents, the CC criticized severely such "excesses." The CC did its best to prevent the workers from taking over factories even when their owners deliberately closed them down. [The CC instructed them] not to close any shops even when their proprietors raised prices deliberately and to refrain from arresting people even if they were discovered to be counterrevolutionary.

The working class was surging toward the realization of a true democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants, but the CC used every means possible to prevent the workers' movement from progressing along the revolutionary path.

Not only did the CC fail to take measures to arm the workers, but, encountering the active opposition of the bourgeoisie, it disarmed [itself] voluntarily and dissolved the workers' pickets at Hankou. It also voluntarily disbanded the labor youth corps in order to preserve the alliance with the petty bourgeoisie.

The GMD leadership instructed the labor unions to assume responsibility for the maintenance of strict workers' discipline. Anyone disobeying the regulation was to be handed over to the government for punishment. The unions could only administer punishment to the workers. Yet our party's CC did not raise a single word of objection to all this, and when the Hubei Labor Federation accepted these instructions, the CC [of the CCP] acquiesced. Every independent expression of the working class was branded by the CC as "excessive" and "infantile," and it was not aware that its own remarks were those of the counterrevolutionary bourgeoisie.

The party's leading organ adopted an entirely erroneous policy, not only with regard to the workers' economic struggle, but also with regard to political activities. The workers in Hankou played an historic role when they retrieved the British concession there. Yet this action was not only not led by the party's leading organ, it was even criticized by the CC after the event. Recently, the CC showed an inclination to disband voluntarily the secret unions in Shanghai and make the workers join the "yellow unions" of Chiang Kai-shek. Fear of the masses and distrust of their strength were reflected in intraparty affairs. The majority of the leading cadres of the party are composed of representatives of the intellectual elements and the petty bourgeoisie. Only on the insistence of the ECCI were a few workers admitted to the leading organs [of the party]. In many unions, the leading party members are not workers but students and intellectuals. When the party school was about to be established, the CC insisted on reducing the number of workers [on the candidates list], maintaining that the cultural level of the workers was too low and their political consciousness undeveloped and unawakened. As a matter of fact, the political consciousness of the workers in Shanghai is higher than that of the party leadership. Our party should cut itself off once and for all from such unproletarian, unrevolutionary, thorough opportunism.

4) The CCP and the Rural Revolution

The question of rural revolution is the crux of the bourgeois-democratic revolution in China. The Comintern has repeatedly explained itself on this question. The Comintern gave clear and definite instructions to our Chinese party indicating ways of solving the land problem. The resolution of the Eighth Plenum of the ECCI [May 1927] also reiterated the previous directives. This resolution pointed out: "Only by relying on the rural revolution in the countryside and by satisfying the needs of the urban working class and guaranteeing their political rights can the masses be brought into the struggle. Demands such as those for the abolition of rental payments to the gentry; redistribution of land; confiscation of the land of the landlords, temples, and bureaucrats; cancellation of usurious debts of the poor peasants; prohibition of exploitative contracts; drastic reductions in taxes; and the shifting of the tax burdens to the shoulders of the rich should be carried out on a nationwide scale, particularly in areas under the rule of the Wuhan government. These demands should succeed in arousing the masses to oppose the landlords, the bourgeoisie who have betrayed the revolution, and the warlords of north China." The rural revolution consists of confiscation and nationalization of land—this is the major content of the domestic social economy in the new stage of the Chinese revolution. The main thing at present is to employ the "mass-type" revolutionary methods to solve the land problem [and allow] the tens of millions of peasants to solve this problem by rising up from below. The CC should be the vanguard of this movement and direct it. In the government, the CCP should carry out such a policy so that the government itself will act to support the rural revolution. Only thus can the present government be turned into the center of political organization of the workers and peasants' movement and the organ of the dictatorship of the workers and peasants.

However, the work of the leading party organ ran directly counter to this revolutionary course. The peasant movement in Hunan that had turned into a powerful rural revolution and the revolts of the peasant masses in other provinces against the landlords and gentry were neither directed nor guided by the CC, but were carried out against its orders and directives. In general, these movements were only initiated by the lower strata of the masses themselves. The peasant movement in various areas was led only by the lower party cadres and party members, and the CC often obstructed or even reversed the revolutionary movement of the peasants. The party's leading organ did not pay any attention to the significance of the land problem in the Chinese revolution. Before the Fifth National Congress [of the CCP; April–May 1927], the party's leading organ paid only the minimum possible attention to the land question. At the Hankou Special Conference in December 1926, which was an important conference [convened] to decide the tasks of the party after the success of the Northern Expedition, not a single word was mentioned on the stand to be adopted by the party vis-à-vis the land question. At the various provincial conferences of the peasant associations (such as those held in Hunan in December 1926 and in Jiangxi in January 1927), the party did not define its stand on the land question. Only in the provincial conference of the peasant associations in Hubei in March of this year [1927] did the party touch on this issue.

At the CCP's Fifth National Congress, a resolution on the peasant question was passed [see Doc. B.26], but the party leaders, Comrades Chen Duxiu and Tan Pingshan, stated that the current task was to extend but not to deepen the revolution, and that consequently land confiscation should be postponed until some future date.

The Land Committee of the GMD CEC convened for three weeks [19 April–6 May 1927], and the communist members, headed by Tan Pingshan, changed their stand on the land question twice, on both occasions acting according to the opinion of the GMD representatives. Finally [the CCP members] drafted a proposal which laid down some principles for the solution of the land problem but which did not call for immediate action. When the CEC [of the GMD] refused to make this resolution public, not a single CCP member on the committee protested.

The Sixth Enlarged Plenum of the Hunan Provincial Committee of the CCP [March 1927] even decided that rent-reduction should only be demanded when the rent exceeded 50 percent [of the principal crops]. This was at a time when the peasant associations in Hunan had already begun their active struggle and even carried out, in practice, a redistribution of land. The leading organ of our party verbally admitted some of its mistakes, but the policy of obstructing the rural revolution was maintained to the very end. Our party actually followed in the footsteps of the petty bourgeois leadership of the GMD and vigorously opposed the "excesses" of the peasant movement.

The course adopted by the leading organ of the party was, in reality, opposed to rural revolution. Thus, the circular of the Propaganda Bureau of the CC on 1 June [1927] declared that "we must remember that the party's peasant policy is to check firmly any excesses [committed] against the small landlords, revolutionary militarists, and petty bourgeoisie." Another circular, dated 4 June, also stated that "the failure to check the unorganized actions on the part of the peasants to solve the land problem by themselves has led to many excesses. Such a condition must be corrected."⁶² There was even one school of opinion which maintained that the excesses in the Wuhan area were fomented by the agents of Chiang Kai-shek. This is simply an imitation of the Wuhan [government] militarists, because they too have stated that the excesses were instigated by Chiang Kai-shek's agents. Thus, the CCP leaders would even defend the oppressors of the peasant movement. One directive of the National Peasant Federation declared: "Chiang Kai-shek, bad gentry, and village bosses are utilizing a few peasants to harm the welfare of the families of officers, to spread rumors, and to manufacture an internal split. They deliberately carry out leftist agitation in order to suppress the peasant movement later." One of the responsible leaders of the CCP announced on one occasion that "irresponsible arrests cause anxiety to the petty bourgeoisie, who get the impression that the GMD government has become the prisoner of the CCP. This impression must be eradicated."

In this manner, the great peasant revolt in Hunan not only frightened the bourgeoisie, landlords, and warlords, but also the leadership of the CCP. At a time when CCP members and the masses in various areas fought relentlessly for the development of the [peasant] movement, with an admirably brave spirit of sacrifice, the CC, frightened by the intimidation and wavering of the leaders of the GMD, failed to produce a revolutionary platform for the solution of the land question. [The CC] also took an extremely opportunist position regarding the question of attainment of political power by the peasantry. The CC did not take into consideration the revolutionary fighting experience of the peasant masses in drawing their conclusions, but willfully relied on a system of village self-government which was rigid, impractical, and harmful to the revolution. In fact, the spontaneous upsurge [of the peasants] has given revolutionary political power to the peasant associations, which have confiscated the land of the big landlords, reduced rent, disarmed the civil corps and the gentry, and punished the counterrevolutionary elements in rural areas.

The CC did not aid and develop this form of revolutionary political regime, but agreed to the rigid organization of rural self-government as proposed by the CEC of the GMD. What is the real meaning of this rural self-government? The answer can be found in the directive of the National Peasant Federation, which states: "Establish self-governing bodies in the rural areas in order to consolidate the victory secured by the peasants and eliminate the anarchic conditions prevailing in the villages."

The CC strongly opposed the redistribution of property, the imposition of fines [on the landlords], and the arrest of village bosses. As early as 25 May 1927, the CC announced that "infantile acts of the poor peasants are estranging us from the petty bourgeoisie."⁶³ Although the CC did not dare to oppose openly the slogan of land confiscation, all its actions were predicated on the abandonment of such a fine. The 25 May resolution stated that "naturally, we cannot abandon the platform passed by the Fifth National Congress, but we should realize that the land problem in China should pass through a propaganda phase. We must solve the most urgent question concerning the land question, namely, the question of village administration. Consequently, we must: (i) spread propaganda regarding the land problem, especially among the soldiers, and (ii) organize self-governing bodies in the villages, as well as in the counties [xian]." If this resolution is taken together with the fact that the CC did not raise the slogan of land confiscation but, on the contrary, resolutely opposed land redistribution, it becomes clear that the CC had adopted a policy of opposition toward the confiscation of the land of the big landlords.

This policy produced very undesirable effects on the activities of the party during the Hunan coup. After the counterrevolutionary coup at Changsha,⁶⁴ peasant forces which had mobilized at the suggestion of the CCP members in Hunan began to attack the counterrevolutionaries in Changsha. Had the armed attack of the peasants not been obstructed by the cowardly and irresolute leading organ of the party, Changsha, surrounded as it was by 100,000 armed peasants, would have been easily captured. At the last moment, on the eve of the attack (by the peasant army) on Changsha, the leader of the Hunan party headquarters, a member of the Politburo, ordered the cancellation of the attack on the grounds that military action against Changsha would lead to a national political imbroglio and that instructions from the CC should be awaited. On the next day a letter from the CC arrived stating that the attack should be postponed and that the peasant forces should undergo further consolidation pending solution of the incident by the national government [at Wuhan]. When the order for the cancellation of the attack was dispatched to all units of the peasant armies, the majority of them withdrew, but two units which, by some accident, had not received the order, stormed the city and attacked the counterrevolutionary forces. Outnumbered, they too had to withdraw after a vigorous struggle. The general retreat (of the peasant armies) resulted in the victory of the counterrevolutionaries and led to several days of counterrevolutionary persecutions throughout Hunan Province. The hesitation on the part of the CC during the peasant revolt was tantamount to the betrayal of the revolution and entirely inexcusable. It is indeed a black spot in the annals of our party.

Why did the CC obstruct the insurrection? The reasons can be found in the resolution of 25 May [1927]: "The task that confronts the party at present is neither to overthrow the enemy nor to surrender completely. There is still a middle way which must be found. At present it is undesirable [for our party] to have any direct armed conflict [with the GMD]. Our duty is to wait for opportunities and to consolidate our strength and be ready for the unavoidable attack." Such an attitude of shameful hesitation did not help the peasant movement by waiting for future opportunities but actually helped to provide the counterrevolutionary elements at Changsha with such opportunities. The degree to which the CC had yielded to a policy of capitulation at the time of the Changsha incident can be seen from its decision to support the circular telegram of Tang Shengzhi.⁶⁵ The CC showered Tang Shengzhi with praise, thus creating illusions and spreading the impression that the Changsha incident occurred against the wishes of Tang. Although the CC sometimes protested to the national government about the suppression of peasants and workers' organizations by the Changsha authorities and demanded punishment for the counterrevolutionary traitors, its actual vacillation and hesitation helped the counterrevolutionary elements in the Hunan coup to consolidate their power.

This moribund policy [of the CC] should have taught us a bitter lesson. The opportunist line of the CC on the peasant problem was pushed so far that its instructions, adopted at a critical moment, smacked of downright betrayal of the mass movement.

The actions of Tan Pingshan, CCP representative in the government,⁶⁶ were equally shameful. The Peasant Department stubbornly refused to support the rural revolution and attempted to harness the peasant movement as a branch of bourgeois reformism. A directive issued by the Peasant Department in May stated that "infantile acts of the peasants must be corrected, particularly acts of elements which have deviated from the correct policy and endangered the welfare of the great majority of peasants; such acts must be punished. As regards the struggle against counterrevolutionary elements and the punishment of evil gentry and village bosses, they must be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the law. They must be handed over to the authorities in accordance with party and government instructions, and no spontaneous action should be taken against them." This directive as well as all other activities of the Peasant Department were a concrete manifestation of the unrevolutionary and conciliatory line of our party on the land question at that time. If the entire party proceeds in the spirit of this line, then our party will never be communist or revolutionary. Fortunately, the activities of the masses and the lower party cadres are in striking contrast to this policy of the CC. Thus, even though hamstrung by the leading organ, our party can still furnish the peasant masses with correct leadership.

5) The CCP and the GMD

[[The "submissive and opportunist" line of the party leadership toward the GMD-left at Wuhan is contrary to the directives of the Eighth Plenum of the ECCI [20-26 May 1927]. The CC, like the GMD hierarchy, has been full of petty bourgeois prejudices and illusions. As a result, it was not the CCP that led the GMD at Wuhan but the upper strata of the GMD-left that dominated the leaders of the CCP, both politically and ideologically. The party and youth organizations of the CCP in the GMD, as well as other communist leading groups in the GMD, were unwisely dissolved by the leading organ of the CCP.

The erroneous policy of the CC was based on the theory that at that time it was necessary to retreat temporarily in order to retain the alliance with the GMD-left. One of the eleven points in the resolution on relations between the CCP and the GMD adopted at the Enlarged CC Meeting on 3 July [1927] declared that "since the GMD is an anti-imperialist coalition party of the petty bourgeoisie, workers, and peasants, the leadership of the national revolution naturally belongs to the GMD." Other resolutions yielded to the GMD the authority to control workers' and peasants' organizations, the mass movement, and workers' pickets and prohibited any excessive actions. This was no longer a compromise with opportunism but total liquidationism. It not only abandoned the independent policy of the CCP, but liquidated the entire revolutionary movement of the masses.

The party should learn its lesson from the mistakes of the party's leadership. The party must remember that all its strength and its future lie with the masses of workers and peasants and in their confidence, strength, and organization. The party must keep in mind that in the future the alliance with the GMD should be an alliance with the leftist and revolutionary GMD, i.e., an alliance with its masses and its lower organs. There should be no more illusions about the traitorous GMD leaders in the Wuhan government.]]

6) The Participation of CCP Members in the National Government

[[The resolution of the Eighth Enlarged Plenum of the ECCI [May 1927] pointed out that “the CCP should continue to work in the central and local organizations of the GMD but must criticize its ally and insist on a correct governmental policy.” The CCP members in the Wuhan government, especially Tan Pingshan, were guilty of yielding to the reactionary Wuhan government and of abandoning the struggle of the masses of workers and peasants.

“The stand taken by the CC contradicted both the policy of the Comintern and the basic requirements of the communist program, which has as its aim a resolute revolutionary struggle to turn the Wuhan government into a democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants. Our ties with the masses must be strengthened and maintained. Only in this way can the CCP work through the GMD.”]]

7) The Questions of Supplying Arms and Relations with the Army

[[The leading organ of the party tried to deal with the generals and officers in the GMD army instead of engaging in agitation among the men and the junior officers. The leading cadres of the party did nothing about the urgent task of arming the workers and peasants, but adopted a conciliatory attitude toward reactionary generals like Tang Shengzhi and Zhu Peide.⁶⁷]]

8) The Problems Within the Party and Relations with the Comintern

One of the reasons why the CC was so deeply caught in its opportunist line was the irregular conditions existing within the party. The CC was not supervised by, or responsible to, the masses. Nor did it present the party's policy to the rank and file for discussion. The party's organization was entirely based on a patriarchal system, and all policies were decided by the top leadership, which considered its opinion binding, indisputable, and infallible. Under these conditions, intraparty democracy became an empty phrase. Even in places where the party could perform a very great public function, the so-called intraparty democracy was entirely a formality. Within the party there was neither group life nor public opinion. The party masses did not have any supervisory or persuasive functions vis-à-vis the party leadership. Under these conditions within the party, the CC naturally carried out its instructions by dictatorial means, and it did not really wish to realize intraparty democracy.

The relationship between the party and the Comintern was also not in accordance with accepted organizational procedure. There has never been a case in the history of the Comintern where the instructions and resolutions were actually rejected in such a critical situation. This was no longer merely a simple breach of discipline, but a criminal act against the Chinese and the international communist movement. The Chinese revolution does not merely have a national significance, but also forms a major element of the world revolution. The fate of the world revolution will be decided by the fate of the Chinese revolution. The CCP not only carried out an erroneous policy, a policy that brought the revolution to defeat, that voluntarily liquidated the revolution and capitulated to the enemy, but also would not admit its errors or obey the instructions of the Comintern. Not only that, but it also deliberately ignored its obligations to and the discipline of the Comintern, even maintaining that it was not necessary to transmit to the whole party the resolutions of the Comintern, [thus depriving] the members of the opportunity to express their views after studying those resolutions.

Therefore, the Comintern recently had to criticize openly the policy of our CC and had to expose it to the entire CCP membership and other branches of the Comintern in the various countries.

9) Conclusion

The Comintern has severely criticized the CC's opportunist line, which has in reality betrayed the revolution. We agree that this criticism is entirely just and that the policy of the ECCI regarding the Chinese problem is entirely correct. We welcome the recent instructions of the Comintern, which have made possible the unmasking of the past mistakes of the [party] leadership and have saved our party [from destruction]. We positively agree that, in the past, the leadership of the CC carried out an opportunist, unrevolutionary policy and that it is necessary to carry out a thorough revision of our policy on the basis of the lessons of the past. In this letter, we have analyzed past mistakes from a correct communist viewpoint, and the analysis is based firmly on Leninism and the views of the Comintern. The entire party and all party members should give the utmost attention to an examination of these problems and be instructed to discuss in detail the past policy of the party. The resolutions of the ECCI on the Chinese question [July 1927] and this letter should form the basis of discussion. If party members do not learn from the lessons of the past, they cannot progress or correctly lead the Chinese revolution.

Certain conclusions should be drawn from the discussions: [We] should not only criticize the past party leadership and expel the opportunist elements from the leading organs of the party, but also reexamine all party work from a communist and revolutionary viewpoint, examine the actual direction of mass work, and prove in action that the CCP is truly the vanguard of the Chinese laboring class, capable of leading it, and that it will guide it to victory.

The party should establish close ties with the unions and the peasant associations and guide them, and it should shift the center of party work in this direction. The party should establish a close relationship with the CYL and give more assistance to its work. The delegates of the CYL CC have proved themselves recently to be politically stronger than the CCP CC. The CYL CC fully supported our proletarian stand and entrusted the CC to carry it out, but the leaders of the CCP CC, fearing that their opportunist policy might be shaken, tried to silence the voice of the CYL and deprive it of its right to pass political resolutions. This failed because the CYL CC stood firmly on the policy of the Comintern from beginning to end. The party should recognize the political significance of the work of the CYL and [establish] close liaison with it. Finally, the party should, in spite of [the present] severe political oppression, effect real intraparty democracy in order to encourage the discussion of party policies among the party masses. Collective activities in party headquarters at all levels should be inaugurated by secretaries of lower party organs in order to realize collective guidance. Also, every precaution should be taken to preserve party organs from the reactionaries. Strictly secret organs must be established, but at the same time they should be combative, underground units of the party.

Under [the present] trying circumstances and in a revolutionary crisis we should undertake to reorganize our forces, correct the serious mistakes of the past, and find a new path. We are firmly convinced, however, that our party possesses adequate strength to effect such reforms in a resolute and revolutionary manner. We should call on all party members to lend all their energies to help the party to realize these reforms. We are firmly convinced that the fighting determination of our comrades and their devotion to the revolution will enable us to overcome all difficulties and resolutely set the party on the correct course. Our party under the direction of the Comintern will assuredly win the final victory.

C.3 Report by the Comintern Representative. *Lominadze (7 August 1927)*⁶⁸

Before I begin the report, on behalf of the Comintern, I would like to extend my greetings to all of you. These greetings are unusual. The reason the Comintern has asked the CCP to convene this conference is that the CCP leadership has wandered too far astray. Without this meeting to correct its mistakes, the Chinese party could no longer be called a CP. However, the past mistakes were made only by the party's leading organ. With respect to the broad masses of the people, the Comintern is satisfied with their heroic struggle. It is very strange to discover such a large gap between the party's leadership and the Comintern's guidance as well as the requirements of the masses.

The Comintern has realized that it is extremely difficult to hold such a conference in China under the present circumstances. Had the reactionary GMD regime known we were meeting here, it would have surely come and caught all of us in a dragnet. However, without holding such a conference, we cannot correct the previous mistakes. So we have made up our minds to call together some leading comrades who are close to the masses. We will analyze past wrongdoings so that all of us can understand how they occur. This is important because the mistakes were made not only by the CC but also by the local leaders. It would be very dangerous if only a few top leaders rather than everyone realized the mistakes.

The Comintern's resolution states that this emergency conference should not only discuss the previous mistakes but also reorganize the leading organ. Now we face the question of whether we have the right to reorganize the leading body (the CC). Because of communication difficulties between the CC and the local organizations, we could only manage to get representatives from two places to come to today's conference. Because of the secret circumstances, we may call this conference an "emergency conference." Although it does not have the right to reorganize the CC, it has the authority to elect a temporary Politburo for the CC. This temporary Politburo will be authorized to announce to the whole party our previous mistakes and the future policies. It also has the right to convene a party congress, or an interim one. This temporary Politburo cannot be considered officially established until it is approved by the Comintern.

During today's discussion, we will make an evaluation about our past work. The Standing Committee [changwu] has already prepared a very detailed report for all party members. However, pressures of time mean that we can only analyze a few major mistakes in today's discussion.

First of all, I want to point out that the present situation would have been completely different if the party leadership in the past had followed the majorityism [duoshu zhuyi, i.e., Bolshevism] and the Comintern's resolution. This is by no means an overestimation of our strength, but a reality. Of course, we cannot deny the fact that the Chinese proletariat is numerically small and lacks experience, yet there is no other class in China more powerful than the proletariat. The Chinese bourgeoisie is so weak that it would have collapsed long ago if the foreign capitalists had not assisted it. Most Chinese capital is controlled by foreigners, and it is foreign capital that has created the Chinese proletariat. As a result, the Chinese bourgeoisie is not as strong as the proletariat. There are more peasants and petty bourgeois elements in China, but it has been proved that they cannot lead the revolution. They can follow either the proletariat or the bourgeoisie. In the present class struggle, the Chinese proletariat is gathering together all its class strength to fight against both Chinese and foreign capitalists. None of the other classes could be as powerful as the proletariat.

Now China has entered the period of the rural revolution. This will take the Chinese revolution into a new stage although we have to point out that the Chinese peasants are still unable to establish an independent class policy. They will follow either the proletariat or the bourgeoisie. The bourgeoisie in China has now become reactionary despite the fact that it had been revolutionary during a certain period. Only the proletariat can guide the peasantry, and only led by the proletariat can the peasantry achieve its own emancipation. The CCP has gained much experience from the proletarian struggle of the last two years. If the CC had correctly and resolutely led the proletariat, class relationships in China today would have been very different, and the reactionary situation in Wuhan and other places would not have occurred.

It is of great significance to examine the party's past leadership. From April to the end of July [1927], the party's leading body continually pursued reformism when deciding strategy. It made concessions not only to the petty bourgeoisie, including the reactionary petty bourgeoisie, but also to the GMD, and it gave up completely our party's own independence. Now the GMD has turned against us and is murdering us in the streets. Our party restrained the peasant movement, with the result that the movement has suffered a huge setback and many peasants were killed. Our party asked the workers to make concessions, with the result that the labor movement suffered a great defeat. In fact, as a result of the concessions, our party today cannot even operate openly. Not until the Nanchang Uprising at the beginning of August [1927] was there a clear turning point. Thus, we can conclude that the future situation will be different from the past because we have made up our minds to adopt a revolutionary line, and through the Uprising we have gained control of some armed forces. If we resolutely carry out the revolutionary strategy, our position will surely be different from that in the past.

In light of their theory and practice, we can see that leading CC members are simply the minority [shaoshupai, i.e., Mensheviks], nonrevolutionaries, and social democrats, rather than revolutionaries. This conclusion is based on the CCP's decisions on various issues. There is no power basis for Menshevism [shaoshu zhuyi] in China because Menshevism is built on the labor aristocracy. If the CC's line were still in operation, there would have been no CP in China. Fortunately, there is no power basis among the Chinese working class for the labor aristocracy; hence there is no such crisis. This is reflected in the struggles in Shanghai, Guangdong, and Hubei, and it is proved by the revolutionary enthusiasm of the workers at Wuhan. They did not follow the CC's instructions but acted according to their own consciousness. This was good luck for the Chinese revolution at a time when the CC did not have the authority to direct the mass movement. Our present conference will not have any significance if it is held casually or if the masses and the CC leadership hold the same view. Because the broad masses of the people hold a different view from that of the CC, we feel confident that the mistakes of the party's leadership can be corrected quickly.

In the report [the circular letter to all party members, see Doc. C.2], we have concentrated on the nature of the Chinese revolution and the role each class plays in it. The leading organ of the CC used to have a purely Menshevik viewpoint on this issue. It thought that it was necessary to have the bourgeoisie in the national front against imperialism, but it did not know that the bourgeoisie would inevitably withdraw from this front once the labor movement developed. The Enlarged Seventh Plenum of the Comintern [ECCI, 29 November–16 December 1926] has pointed out clearly this phenomenon. Now there are two roads in front of us: one is to maintain the national United Front to oppose the interests of the workers and peasants; the other is to oppose the national United Front in the interests of the workers and peasants. We have to choose one of them. We should firmly oppose not only the remnants of imperialism and feudalism but also the bourgeoisie. In the past the CCP CC adhered to some Menshevik theories which held that class struggle would conflict with the national revolution. We can find this theory in the June letter of the CC to the Shanghai party committee, which claimed that in order to develop the anti-imperialist movement we should not wage resolute class struggle. It also called for a second "May 30 Movement." This would undoubtedly have sacrificed the workers. In fact, the more vigorously the labor movement develops, the more fiercely we attack the bourgeoisie; and the more intensified the class struggle becomes, the more heavily we strike at imperialism.

This issue is of vital importance for our work both in the past and in the future. Now we should ask ourselves: should we continue to support the bourgeoisie to oppose imperialism? The Chinese bourgeoisie always wants to wear a mask. For example, on the one hand, Chiang Kai-shek collaborates with Japan and America, while, on the other hand, he pretends to wage an anti-Japanese movement. The Wuhan regime has not yet become a puppet of imperialism, but we know clearly that it will turn into a tool of imperialism sooner or later. Therefore, now we should ask whether we should support the Wuhan regime to oppose imperialism. As a matter of fact, Communists will lose their identity if they help the bourgeoisie to oppose imperialism. Although the national bourgeoisie cannot agree among themselves on economic issues, politically they are unanimous. Now they are arguing with the imperialists, but these disputes will disappear gradually because they fear the working class much more than the imperialists. They will compromise with the imperialists at all costs in order to suppress the proletariat. In light of this background, we must not support the bourgeoisie against the imperialists. On the contrary, we should make use of the bourgeoisie's anti-imperialist movement to expose their intrigue so as to realize our purpose of opposing the bourgeoisie. We must understand that only by defeating the bourgeoisie first can we get rid of imperialism.

We will carry on the struggle for national liberation, and the proletariat will continue to shoulder the task. Slogans such as "Abolish the unequal treaties" and "Recover the concessions" are helpful because they can be used to oppose the bourgeoisie.

It is a shame that our party adopted an antilabor, antipeasant strategy. For example, the CC asked the workers not to demand too much in their struggle and asked them to make sacrifices for the anti-imperialist movement. It even planned to work with the GMD to stop strikes through arbitration. The strategy toward the peasant movement was a capitulationist one, and the leadership of the movement in Hunan was reformist.

Now let's talk about our policy toward the GMD. The GMD is different from the other political parties in that it is a multiclass federation. Before April, the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek's GMD was in the hands of the bourgeoisie. Our task at that time was to seize the leadership from the bourgeoisie and drive it out of the GMD. This work was done well by our comrades working at the grass-roots levels of the GMD. However, the CC, instead of consolidating the achievement, abandoned our independence and the right to criticize the GMD. For example, it agreed with the resolution of the Joint Conference [of the CCP and GMD], which declared that resolutions must not be publicized in the name of the Joint Conference but only by the GMD. The CC also advocated that the national revolution ought to be led by the GMD and asked our comrades working in the press not to write articles containing our doctrines. Moreover, it even wanted to hand over the leadership of the worker-peasant movement to the GMD. Such a policy is absolutely wrong. It is necessary for us to maintain an independent position and have complete freedom of criticism within the United Front. What the CC thought, however, was just the opposite. Only in Hunan were things different. There, resolutions could be publicized in the name of the Joint Conference. Lenin taught us that being unable to act independently or not having the freedom of criticism in the United Front was a betrayal of class interests. In the past, we used to form the United Front by relying only on a few top leaders of the GMD. It is indeed a good policy, but a good policy to abolish our party and the GMD as well.

Talking about our erroneous attitude toward the GMD, some comrades argue that if we want to ally with it, we cannot freely engage in revolution. Well, now we have launched the Nanchang Uprising, and we can, according to this logic, make the revolution independently and freely. This conclusion is not correct either. Those who advocate withdrawal from the GMD include the Russian opposition faction and the CCP's Tan Pingshan, who plans to organize a third party to eliminate both the GMD and the CP.⁶⁹ The so-called third party is in fact Menshevik. Even Comrade [Chen] Duxiu has claimed that if we want to stay in the GMD we would have to give up independence, and if we want to work freely, we must withdraw from the GMD. These ideas are all wrong, at least at this time.

The strategy of the Nanchang Uprising is correct.⁷⁰ Instead of trusting a few GMD leaders, we should rely on its ordinary members. Now is not the time for us to withdraw from the GMD. Not until we win the victory of the national revolution and begin the socialist revolution can we break up with the GMD. At present, we have formed a new United Front. Based on the experiences learned from the past, we should carry out resolute criticism. We must resolutely follow the revolutionary line and not fear the vacillation of the petty bourgeoisie. Only in this way can we consolidate the revolution.

Next, I will talk about the attitude of the CCP CC toward the Comintern and about who should be blamed for the mistakes made in the past. It is the opinion of some comrades that the Comintern should be held responsible for the mistakes. Concerning this, we must first ask whether the Comintern has issued any instructions which conflict with the present situation. No matter how one looks at it, I can assure you that the Comintern has tried continuously to lead the CCP along the correct path. I think the most serious mistake made in the past is that the CC did not pass on the Comintern's directions to the masses. For example, the major resolution on the Chinese question approved by the Eighth Enlarged Plenum of the ECCI [20–26 May 1927] has not yet been translated into Chinese, and many CC members have not even heard of it. Even the resolution of the Seventh Plenum [29 November–12 December 1926] has not been relayed to the masses. On the other hand, although some CC members knew of the resolutions, they accepted them formally but rejected them as far as their work was concerned. Therefore, the Comintern wants to call on branches in all countries and the whole CCP to criticize such a mistake. Of course, the Comintern sometimes makes mistakes. But we must believe that it has accumulated a rich experience of struggle, and we should accept its direction sincerely. Otherwise, we will surely meet with failure. The past experiences of some West European parties prove this. Since the Comintern is much more experienced, we should trust it and accept its leadership. Otherwise, we will stray onto a noncommunist road.

With respect to the question of who should be blamed for past mistakes, Comrade Chen Duxiu, the leader of the CC, ought to take the responsibility. He changed resolutions on various issues according to his own ideas even though these resolutions were made by the CC. However, I think that the Politburo as a whole should be blamed. For example, it thought it was not worthwhile to listen to the opinions of the labor and peasant leaders at the grass-roots level, and there are very few workers and peasants in the leading body of the party. Consequently, many odd theories have surfaced in the party. In fact, we can say that the consciousness of the labor leaders in Shanghai is much higher than that of the CC, and their theory much wiser. As far as the economic struggle is concerned, no one can lead it better than those who come from among the workers.

From now on, our party's leadership should abolish the patriarchal type of leadership and adopt the collective model. The broad mass of party members should be informed about what has happened in the party. Of course, there is always someone who thinks he or she is above the party and might even deliberately make things difficult for the temporary Politburo we have elected today. In such cases, we should apply party discipline and wage a resolute struggle. Only by so doing can our party's leadership be consolidated. Owing to a lack of time, I have to stop here although there are more issues I want to talk about.

C.4 Report of the Representative of the CC Standing Committee. Qu Qiubai (7 August 1927)⁷¹

Before my report, there are two issues which I would like to raise: first, does the Chinese bourgeoisie fight against the feudal class in the Chinese revolution? This is of vital importance. The fact that Chiang Kai-shek and his followers took power with the support of not only imperialism but also the feudal class clearly proves that there is little conflict between the bourgeoisie and the feudal class in China. With this idea in mind, we can rid ourselves of the illusion that the Chinese revolution can be divided into two stages. This illusion had lured us to cooperate with the bourgeoisie, but in fact it is totally wrong. The Chinese bourgeoisie has no democratic essence. Now we have only two choices: either we eliminate the GMD or they destroy us. Second, the leadership of the revolution made pedantic errors, and our party lacks the spirit of the broad masses.

At present, it is obvious that the GMD has broken with us. We can no longer expect to gain power by making concessions. We can win it only through the revolution. Once, in the Politburo, we discussed whether we should bargain with the GMD or withdraw from it. In the past, when we were capable of dominating the GMD, the CC did not allow us to do so; now that we want to do this, we are too weak. In the past, we thought we could gain some power by making use of the conflicts between different forces. The method used to be effective, but now it is no longer appropriate. The 13 July statement of our party marks the beginning of our new policy.⁷² The Politburo's anti-GMD statement is resolute. The reason why Wang [Jingwei] suddenly turned against us is not because Roy had shown him the telegram.⁷³ Of course it was incorrect for Roy to show the telegram to Wang since it provided Wang with an excuse to turn against us. When Wang received the telegram saying Feng [Yuxiang] had decided not to oppose Chiang [Kai-shek], he flew into a rage. Thus, he tried even harder to make anti-Chiang propaganda. However, at the same time Tang [Shengzhi] put pressure on him and asked him to turn against the Communists. At the last meeting of the Joint Conference, Wang claimed that he had been "raped" and could not hold on in Wuhan. Just at that moment, Roy showed him the telegram, and he found a new way out. Therefore, he used the telegram as an excuse to join Tang in turning against us and openly declared the anticommunist policy. After that, the Communists in Zhang Fakui's army became Wang's major enemy.⁷⁴ At that moment Zhang also wavered somewhat, and Ye [Ting]⁷⁵ expressed the desire to withdraw temporarily from the CP. Some of us felt the same. Nevertheless, this did not happen. Our party is quite resolute concerning the statement because Song [Qingling] and Deng [Yanda]⁷⁶ also publicized their declarations. The recent action we took in Nanchang [August 1927] indicates that at least we have unconsciously adopted a new strategy. Before 15 July when we participated in the government, we could create conditions from the top to help develop our work at the grass-roots level. Now, because the whole country is controlled by the reactionaries, our most important task is to create a new force from the rural revolution. Our army should do all they can to support the rural revolution.

Zhang [Fakui] was scared and was outraged by the Ye [Ting]-He [Long] uprising [Nanchang Uprising]. Zhang immediately took a few hundred guards with him by train to stop the Ye-He troops. Thinking that he was working for the party, he thought that the army, his old troops, would certainly obey his orders. However, he was totally wrong. As a result, even his own gun was captured by us. It should be pointed out that we treated him fairly mildly. During his second "punitive expedition," his orders were quite moderate, and he acted only as he saw fit. This reveals that Zhang is now unable to launch an offensive. Zhu Peide's army is also very weak. Neither of his two divisions is good at fighting. According to today's newspapers, our troops have left Nanchang. I presume that they must have won at the front. The Front Committee must have followed the CC's order sent to them not long ago. Right now our major enemy forces are the Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth Armies. But Tang [Shengzhi] would never use these two armies to assist Zhang because he intends to use them to take over Jiangsu. Prior to this incident, the third force had already planned that Bai Chongxi and Li Zhongren would ask Nanjing to call a truce, and Zhu Peide would guarantee that Wuhan would do the same. Wang [Jingwei] would become the leader, and Bai and Li would force Chiang [Kai-shek] to resign. There are conflicts between the third force and Tang, but at present neither would provoke a fight since they have to work together against the communist forces.

In the future, the situation will be different. There used to be big warlords such as Zhang [Zuolin] in Liaoning, Chiang in Nanjing, as well as Wu Peifu. In the future, they will be replaced by many small warlords, and a very confusing situation will develop. It shows that the feudal class has declined and the bourgeoisie is weak. The conflicts among the counterrevolutionaries are very sharp, so their regime will be unstable. This is a good thing for the revolution in the future.

The climax of the rural revolution has arrived. We should mobilize our troops to promote it. Ye Ting has already done that. Zhang Zhaofeng⁷⁷ in the north should also act in the same way when conditions there ripen. There is a definite chance for the revolution to succeed.

Now the peasants want to launch an uprising and we control many armed forces in various areas. With such a good opportunity and such great strength, we must light the fuse and set off the rural revolution.

Under these circumstances, our strategy is independently to wage the worker-peasant class struggle and use it, without any hesitation, to replace the GMD and the national revolution. First, we will make every effort to seize the leadership from the bourgeoisie, which is wearing a democratic mask. Since Wang is the representative of this faction, we should aim at Wang as our major enemy at the moment. Lenin used to strike particularly hard at this kind of person. This is our major strategy at present, and we will tell the masses that they represent the pseudo-GMD. Second, we should correct our previous mistakes, keep in close touch with the masses and listen to the opinions from below. Whoever supports us is a leftist. Third, our purpose now is not to sever links with the government. We have undergone three stages in our policy toward the government: (a) We refused to take part in the government. (b) We participated in the government but failed to play a role because of our errors. (c) We will organize a provisional revolutionary government during the uprising. The government will still use the name of the GMD, but we should become the dominant force in it so as to turn it into the political power of the worker-peasant democratic dictatorship. Political power in the countryside should belong to the peasant association. We must act firmly and tell the masses that the regimes in Wuhan, in Nanjing, and in Beijing are all counterrevolutionary. Although it is difficult to defeat Wang Jingwei, we will do our very best. This is our main policy.

In order to fulfill various requirements, the Standing Committee and the Comintern representative have drafted three resolutions for our discussion today. There are a few more issues: (a) How to deal with the GMD and how to unite its leftists. We have issued a letter to all the GMD members, and it should be considered our political program for its leftists.⁷⁸ (b) Our work in the army and among the soldiers. This has also become very important now. I have discussed it with [Wang] Ruofei, and I think the temporary Politburo should take it into consideration. (c) We must recognize the political program of the GMD leftists.

C.5 Comments on the Report of the Comintern Representative. Mao Zedong (7 August 1927)⁷⁹

The report by the Comintern's representative is very important [Doc. C.3]. First, the issue of the GMD is a very old problem for our party, and so far it has not yet been solved. At first, the problem was whether we should join the GMD, next it became who should join it, i.e., whether the industrial workers should join it. In fact, our party placed restrictions on joining the GMD, not only on industrial workers but even on the peasantry. Essentially, at that time, we all thought the GMD was a party of the others. What we did not know was that it was an empty house waiting for people to move in. Afterward, we reluctantly moved into that empty house, just like a bride who is forced into a wedding sedan. Even so, we never made up our minds to be the mistress of the house. In my opinion, this was a great mistake. Some of us later insisted that industrial workers should also join the GMD. It was said that our comrades in Hubei had made such a decision, but it turned out to be only empty talk because the decision was not put into practice. There were a few comrades at the grass-roots level who did not follow the CC's instructions. They took over the leadership of the local GMD organizations and became the master of the house there. But these were isolated cases and were against the will of the CC. Not until recently has the policy changed and have we begun to allow the workers and peasants to join the GMD and become the master of the house. Second, the peasant issue. The peasants want to make revolution; so do the local party organizations who are close to the peasants. But the party's leading body is different. Before I went to Changsha, I did not have any facts which I could use to oppose the party's resolution that favors the landlords. Even after arriving in Changsha, I did not know how to answer the question either. But I changed my attitude completely after I stayed in Hunan for over thirty days. I put my ideas in a report I made in Hunan and sent the report to the CC at the same time.⁸⁰ Although the report was quite successful in Hunan, it failed to receive any response from the CC. I cannot help wondering if the leadership of our party was counterrevolutionary because while the broad masses both in and out of the party wanted to make revolution, the leaders did not.

The peasantry caused me to draw this conclusion. Eventually, however, I gave up my view because I always thought the ideas of the leading comrades were correct. My suggestion was rejected since they thought it did not make any sense. Instead, under our leaders' instructions, the party followed Xu Kexiang. It was really strange that even though Tang [Shengzhi]'s army admitted that there were only eight officers' homes destroyed by the peasants, our party discovered that many officers' homes were ruined.⁸¹ In short, the opinions of the masses did not have much impact on the party leadership. Third, the military issue. We used to criticize [Sun] Yat-sen for being interested only in military affairs. We were just the opposite: paying no attention to the military issue and concentrating only on the mass movement. Both Chiang [Kai-shek] and Tang [Shengzhi] gained power by using the armed forces. We entirely neglected the issue. Now we have changed our attitude somewhat but still lack clear understanding of its significance. Take the Autumn Harvest Uprising for example. We cannot expect to win without arms. We must emphasize the importance of this issue at this conference, and the members of the Standing Committee of the new Politburo should bear this in mind and pay particular attention to it. Our failure in Hunan this time was caused entirely by this erroneously pedantic orientation. From now on, we ought to concentrate on the military problem. We must understand fully that political power grows out of the barrel of a gun. Fourth, the organizational issue. In the future, the leading party organs should lend a willing ear to the comrades working at the grass-roots level. Only in that way can they turn a nonrevolutionary standpoint into a revolutionary one.

C.6 Outline of the CCP CC on the Peasant Autumn Harvest Uprising in the Four Provinces of Hunan, Hubei, Guangdong, and Jiangxi (3 August 1927)⁸²

I) This program of action is made on the basis of the CC's recent resolution about peasant struggle and is to be carried out in the four provinces of Hunan, Guangdong, Hubei, and Jiangxi.

II) The Chinese revolution is taking a new direction—the worker-peasant democratic dictatorship [gongnong demokelaxi ducai], in which the rural revolution will play a most important role. At present, party policy needs to be modified, and the revolutionary social forces need to be rallied anew and receive new training. To date, the reactionaries have not been able to consolidate their control. Longing for the autumn harvest, the peasants, after having suffered a setback, are looking for a new strategy [to fight with]. The “Autumn Harvest Uprising” is a suitable answer to such a situation. This antirent and antitax uprising is a new stage of the rapid development of rural revolution. It can at least shake the reactionary regime of the new and old warlords and may pave the way for the establishment of a new revolutionary government in Hunan and Guangdong.

III) Previously our party's policy for the peasant revolution was mistaken. This restrained the peasants and protected the interests of small landlords. Specifically, the policy forced the peasants to ally with small landlords to build up village autonomy. After the Fifth Congress [27 April–9 May 1927], instead of resisting the GMD's various orders to restrain the peasant revolution, we directed party organizations at the grass roots to carry out those reactionary orders. This mistake was the result of our party's overall policy toward the petty bourgeoisie. Recently, at its Eighth Enlarged Conference [20–26 May 1927], the Comintern pointed out that the future of the Chinese revolution should be the worker-peasant democratic dictatorship in alliance with the petty bourgeoisie. This new instruction has proved that in the past the peasants in Hunan were correct in exercising the dictatorship of the peasant association against village autonomy and that we need not be worried about their inevitable attacks on the small landlords—the phenomena of the so-called infantile excesses. Rather, we should provide them with positive leadership. Only by understanding this truth, can we avoid getting lost in narrow-minded confusion and go ahead bravely to direct the Autumn Harvest Uprising.

IV) The strategy for the uprising:

1) Use the peasant association as the core to rally all social forces close to the peasants (such as bandits and secret societies) and set the uprising in action. The peasant association is to be proclaimed as the local government.

In addition to the political power in a village, peasants should also seize, if possible, that of a county. They should unite the workers and the urban poor (peddlers in the city) to form a revolutionary committee [geming weiyuanhui] and make it the local revolutionary center, which must try its best to rally various nearby uprisings and revolutionary governments to wage attacks on the counterrevolutionary forces.

2) The peasant association will be authorized to issue orders that there shall be no rent for the land of temples, all clan halls, public fields, and any landlords owning fifty mu of land. For small landlords with less than fifty mu, there will be a reduction. The peasant association will decide the rent rate: approximately 7:3 between tenants and landlords.

3) All political power belongs to the peasant association. Wipe out local tyrants and evil gentry as well as all reactionaries and confiscate all their property.

4) Refuse payment of any tax to the reactionary regime and implement an economic blockade against the counterrevolutionary forces, such as blocking any business activities with them and banning the sale of rice to their troops.

5) The land of the middle peasantry is not to be confiscated. They and the tenants allotted land from the big landlords will pay a land tax to the revolutionary government (the peasant association). The amount of the tax will be decided by the peasant association.

6) The peasant association will organize a land committee to decide on land distribution.

The following are the instructions regarding the specific tasks for each of the four provinces during the peasant Autumn Harvest Uprising:

Hubei. The major task of the Uprising in Hubei should aim at causing a political disturbance to the present regime so as to destabilize their rule in Hubei and weaken their control over Jiangxi. Economically, it should cover four resistances (against rent, taxation, levies of duties, and grain). Specific plans may be decided based on the major task.

Hunan. A revolutionary government will be set up in south Hunan before too long, and all manner of revolutionary organizations will be established. The government will be under the leadership of the Guangdong Revolutionary Committee.

A South Hunan Special Committee [Xiangnan tebie weiyuanhui] led by the provincial [party] committee should be set up right away, so that it can independently direct local work where traffic and communications problems occur. The special committee comprises four members: Xia Xi, Guo Liang, [Mao] Zedong, and [Ren] Zuoxuan; [Mao] Zedong will be secretary.

Jiangxi. (a) Seize political power at district and county levels immediately; (b) implement the CC's program for the rural revolution; (c) kill as many local tyrants, evil gentry, and counterrevolutionaries as possible; (d) take an active part in the battles of the revolutionary troops against the counterrevolutionary army.

Guangdong. In areas controlled by the revolutionary troops, adopt policies basically the same as those in Jiangxi; in areas not yet occupied by the revolutionary troops, start uprisings immediately as a response to the situation. Seize political power in villages, establish the authority of the peasant association, and carry out the program of the rural revolution. If possible, seize political power at the county level immediately in order to establish a revolutionary government to take control of the whole province.

An Zhongyuan [CC of the CCP]

C.7 A Letter from the CC to the Hunan Provincial Committee—Resolutions Adopted by the Temporary Politburo of the CC on the Work Plan for Hunan Province (9 August 1927)⁸³

Hunan Provincial Committee:

The first session of the Temporary Politburo of the CC has adopted the following resolutions on the work plan for Hunan Province. Please take appropriate actions on the basis of the resolutions:

The CC has already passed a decision for the Autumn Harvest Uprising in the provinces of Hunan, Hubei, Jiangxi, and Guangdong [Doc. C.6]. Our purpose is to enable our party to assume leadership over the revolutionary upsurge of the peasantry in these four provinces and begin uprisings for the rural revolution to overthrow the reactionary regime in the four provinces and establish the political power of the worker-peasant revolutionary democratic dictatorship (in the countryside, all powers should belong to the peasant association: the peasant association will be the political power; in the cities, all powers should belong to the revolutionary committee. Comprising comrades appointed by our party and a few genuine leftist nationalists [i.e., members of the GMD-left], the revolutionary committee is the leading organ directing an uprising before it begins and should function as a provisional revolutionary government after victory. As we have agreed on slogans such as "Establish a Revolutionary Government Elected by the People" and "Create a Truly Democratic Power for Ordinary Citizens," for the sake of propaganda, we can declare: "After winning victory, the revolutionary committee should immediately hold a conference of representatives from trade unions, peasant associations, and revolutionary small merchants to elect a formal people's government." In practice, however, such a people's government should not be organized until the local revolutionary committee has firm control over the situation.) The Nanchang Uprising was planned in advance by the CC and was aimed at providing the insurrections to be launched in the four provinces with military strength so as to assure their success. Otherwise, the significance of the Nanchang Uprising will be lost. If one considers the uprisings in the four provinces as a mere effect of the military force of the Nanchang Uprising, then this is definitely putting the cart before the horse and negating the CC's decision.

According to Mayer's⁸⁴ and also your report, there are two plans for the Nanchang Uprising troops: one is to transfer the troops from Fujian to Guangdong; the other is to organize a division in south Hunan and join the Nanchang Uprising troops to take over Guangdong. The first amounts to calling on the Nanchang troops to avoid fighting and abandon the forthcoming insurrections in the four provinces; the second underestimates the military significance of the insurrection in Hunan Province. Planning to move the troops back to Guangdong is obviously to mistake the branch for the root. The CC considers neither plan to be correct. In practice, if you spare no effort in launching a great insurrection in Hunan Province, you will provide significant support to the Nanchang Uprising. You must understand that the Nanchang Uprising is part of the strategy to respond to the Autumn Harvest Uprising in the four provinces. You must draw up your work plan on the basis of this principle.

The CC has also decided to transfer one or two regiments of the Nanchang Uprising troops to be under the direction of the South Hunan Special Committee and to gather all the forces of the worker-peasant army now in south Hunan to take over Chen, Yi, and Ru.⁸⁵ A revolutionary committee should be organized to help launch a provincewide peasant uprising to restore the revolutionary government in Hunan Province. The South Hunan Special Committee comprises Mao Zedong, Ren Zhuoxuan, Guo Liang,⁸⁶ and several local workers and peasants. Zedong will be the secretary, and it will come under the leadership of the Hunan Provincial Committee. It must be made clear here that the south Hunan uprising is only part of the provincial plan for insurrection. Only by linking its launch to the provincial uprising can the south Hunan operation be realized and have significance. You must remember this point and must not put the incidental before the fundamental.

Since the Horse Day incident [21 May 1927 massacre in Changsha], most of the former trade union and peasant association leaders in south Hunan have either disappeared or been executed. Now, you must rapidly and resolutely promote those “ruffians” [baotu fenzi] who have taken an active part in the struggle during recent months and appoint them as leaders of various trade unions and peasant associations. Also, without hesitation, you must quickly admit them into our party in order to establish a close relationship between our party and the masses of workers and peasants. As long as they have participated in the revolutionary struggle, even members of the various secret societies should be recruited into the party. Only in this way can the party’s new line, as decided by the Comintern, be implemented and can the Autumn Harvest Uprising succeed. This policy must be carried out without any wavering.

In Hunan, the local organization of the GMD-left is more powerful than in any other province. About 150,000 to 200,000 GMD-left members and their organizations have been fighting until now under our guidance. Our party should more firmly win them over organizationally and lead them politically so that they can become an important force in the Autumn Harvest Uprising. We cannot rely solely on the leadership of the Secret Committee headed by Linbin and Xie Juezai over these GMD-left members. This committee can only make an appeal to them but cannot lead them in any actual struggle. Now, we must rely on our party organizations at the grass roots to unite a number of organizations of the GMD-left members to wage a joint struggle and recruit all the activists into our party. The CC has decided to reorganize the Hunan Provincial Committee since it has no worker and peasant members. The new provincial committee should be organized in the following way:

a) Zedong and [Peng] Gongda are entrusted to compile, together with the current Hunan Provincial Committee, a list of members for the new committee and report it to the CC.

b) The new provincial committee should consist of nine members. They do not all have to be in Changsha. Of the nine, at least three must be workers or peasants, and three should be placed in charge of the workers and peasants’ movement.

c) It is hereby announced that Gongda has been appointed the new provincial party secretary by the CC.

C.8 Report on the Progress of the Autumn Harvest Uprising in Hunan (Extract). Peng Gongda (9 October 1927)⁸⁸

I) The Process of Reorganizing the Hunan Provincial Party Committee

After the CC's Emergency Session [7 August 1927], the Politburo held its first meeting for a general discussion of the work plans for various areas [9 August 1927]. Two proposals from the Hunan Provincial Committee were analyzed at the meeting.

First, the Hunan Provincial Committee claimed that the Comintern lacked the courage to admit its opportunist errors concerning China policy and argued that although it was the CCP that had made erroneous decisions, the Comintern should share the blame for some of the mistakes.

Second, concerning the peasant issue—the land question—Comrade Yi (Lirong), secretary of the Hunan Provincial Committee, had opposed confiscating the land of small landlords. He insisted that we should confiscate only the land of the big landlords and even suggested that we only consider political factors when confiscating land.

The newly elected Politburo thought that these two propositions contradicted the essence of CC policies. Therefore, it made the resolute decision to reorganize the Hunan Provincial Committee to choose some comrades who had experienced the mass struggle to lead the party organizations in Hunan and to implement resolutely the new policies of the CC. Reorganization was carried out in the following manner:

First, Comrade Peng Gongda was appointed secretary of the Hunan Provincial Committee.

Second, a new nine-person Provincial Committee was chosen: three workers and peasants, three worker and peasant leaders, and three comrades who have been really courageous and skillful during the revolutionary struggle.

Third, Mao Zedong and Peng Gongda were authorized to bring together the leaders of the former Provincial Committee to explain the spirit of the CC's new policies and to reorganize the Provincial Committee.

Gongda returned to Hunan on 11 August, and Zedong left Wuhan on 12 August. They intended to arrive in Changsha on 13 August and to hold the meeting on 15 August. However, the meeting was postponed to 16 August because Comrade Zedong did not arrive on 13 August. On 16 August, all the participants were present except Zedong. Initially, we planned to postpone the meeting again to wait for Zedong. However, the situation was so dangerous that it would have been very difficult to find an opportunity for another meeting. The participants decided to hold the meeting that day and pass on the results of the election to Zedong. With his approval, we then reported the election to the CC. At the meeting, we first discussed the resolution of the CC's Emergency Session and then elected the Provincial Committee.

The new Provincial Committee held its first meeting on 18 August and elected the Standing Committee and discussed the plan of the Autumn Harvest Uprising. The details of the discussion are reported below.

II) The Different Views of the Provincial Committee Members

A) The Peasant Question—The Land Question

1) Zedong's View:

(i) To confiscate the land, we must have targets. Since most landlords in China are small (there are only a few big landlords in this country), if we confiscate the land of only the big landlords, there will not be much land to confiscate. However, the poor peasants are asking for a large amount of land. Thus, to meet their demands and win them over, we must confiscate the land of all landlords. (ii) Concerning the method for confiscating land, our party's revolutionary committee should formulate a land program so that the peasant association or revolutionary committee can carry it out. (iii) This land program should find a correct way to arrange the landlords' livelihood after their land has been confiscated. The peasant association can collect a certain amount of grain as part of the agricultural tax and distribute the grain equally to the landlords who are old, weak, or unable to work. (iv) Abolish all forms of extravagant levies and taxes imposed on the peasants by the old regime; and collect the agricultural tax.

2) Lirong's View:

(i) The majority of the landlords in China are small landlords. If we confiscate their land at the present time, they will certainly join the big landlords in the counterrevolutionary camp. Thus, now is not the time to confiscate the land of the small landlords. (ii) At the present time, when dealing with the land question, we must give priority to political considerations; for example, only the land of the big landlords and of the counterrevolutionaries should be confiscated. (iii) We need to formulate a political program that suits the peasants and enables them to act simultaneously in line with the program. Only in this way can we set people's minds at rest and avoid social upheaval in the countryside. (iv) The peasants might get lazy after receiving their distribution of land. If so, there will be a decrease in grain production. I am afraid that this will become a problem.

3) [Xia] Minghan's View:

(i) The Chinese revolution has entered the stage where all land must be confiscated and placed under state control. We must confiscate all land now and declare the principle of state ownership of land. (ii) If we confiscate only the land of landlords and do nothing about the land of the yeomen, the peasants will feel dissatisfied. As the revolution develops, sooner or later we will have to confiscate the land of the yeomen. Therefore, I think it is better to take over all the land right now. (iii) The method of confiscation should be decided by the peasant association.

4) The Views of He Erkang, Mao Fuxuan, and Other Comrades Are the Same as Those of Zedong.

B) The Question of the Uprising

1) The Views of Zedong and Lirong:

(i) The purpose of the Autumn Harvest Uprising in Hunan is to solve the land problem for the peasants. This is an obvious fact that no one can deny. However, in order to organize the uprising, we must have the support of the armed forces because the strength of the peasants alone is far from adequate. If we could control one or two regiments of troops, we would gain victory. Otherwise, the uprising will inevitably be defeated. (ii) The ultimate aim of the uprising is to seize political power. However, it is simply self-deception to do this without control over the military forces. The party's mistake previously was to neglect military affairs and seize and establish political power with guns.

2) Minghan's View:

(i) The Hunan uprising can be organized, but its success depends on whether we can control military forces. Peasants cannot be the backbone of the uprising because unlike workers, they lack the courage to fight. What they want is to get help from a good regime or the military. They have little desire to use their own strength to establish a government. (ii) This time, the Hunan uprising should be based on both the armed forces and the peasants. We ought to concentrate our efforts equally on military and peasant issues.

In line with these differing views on the land and insurrection issues, we can draw a simple conclusion.

1. The solution to the land question is not to encourage the peasants to rise up and seize land; rather, it is to call on them first to participate in the uprising and only to confiscate land after the uprising's victory. This is a revolutionary lawful act rather than a revolutionary method.
2. Concerning the land question, all the views suggested we provide a livelihood for the landlords who are old, weak, or unable to work so as to reassure the public and win over the people.
3. No one believed we could rely on the peasants alone in organizing the rural uprising. In order to launch the uprising, it was thought that we must control an army with at least 1,000 guns. During the uprising, it was felt that the strength of the military was equally as important as that of the peasants.

In essence, the three points all reflected the attitude of revolutionary pacifism. On the one hand, they advocate revolution while, on the other, they fear that once the revolution began, it would cause too much damage and social upheaval. Thus, it was necessary to set people's minds at rest. The method was to pursue the revolution from above and to extend it from the military to the peasants rather than the other way around, building up the worker-peasant armed forces from the masses of laboring people.

III) The Differences Between the Hunan Provincial Committee and the CC on Certain Questions

A) The Question of the GMD

For the following reasons, the Hunan Provincial Committee holds that using the GMD as a signboard is no longer useful and that we should get rid of it.

1. The GMD CC at Wuhan was unable to suppress Xu Kexiang's atrocity during the 21 May Incident in Hunan. The GMD could not exercise its power beyond Wuhan, and not even outside the headquarters of its CC. Its policy was decided entirely by a few warlords, and it lost its position—in reality it is already dead. When Wang Jingwei betrayed the revolution on 15 July,⁸⁹ the GMD had not only died but had begun to rot. Its rotten smell had spread over the country. The GMD was seized by the warlords and became their tool in competing for power and spheres of interests. From Tang Shengzhi to Chiang Kai-shek, to Wang Jingwei, and even to Zhang Zhuling, they all used the GMD as a tool to suppress and slaughter the masses. In short, it had completely degenerated into a party of the warlords.

2. The death and deterioration of the GMD was caused not only by the betrayal of Tang and Wang, but also was an outcome of the awakening of the broad masses of people. The GMD used to acknowledge many legal rights of the people. However, when people asked it to put these laws into practice, it started to suppress the people. In this way, the masses all realized that the GMD was a hypocritical party and they could never trust it again. This is the common feeling of the people. They have denounced the GMD and abandoned it.

3. There is a view that claims that although the GMD is dead, there remain in it some leftists who can continue to play a positive role. Who are these so-called leftists? Most of them are members of the petty bourgeoisie. They only have sympathy for the revolution, but will never make revolution themselves. In addition, their attitude largely depends on political trends. If the revolutionary movement is powerful, they will stand with the proletariat and support the revolution; but if the bourgeoisie is on the rise, they will act accordingly. It will not be a problem for us to get rid of the GMD, since as long as the proletariat remains powerful, the leftist petty bourgeoisie will continue to participate in the revolution. Therefore, the Hunan Provincial Committee decided, during this Autumn Harvest Uprising, to arouse the people in the name of the CP. The GMD only banged the drum behind the CP. In the future, we had better let the GMD gradually fade away.

B) The Question of Political Power

Based on the above conclusion that we should get rid of the GMD, we have drawn up the following principles concerning political power:

1. The situation in China at present is similar to that in Russia in October 1917. However, the Chinese revolution must undergo the significant stage of rural revolution. During this period political power is not purely that of the proletariat but one of the workers and peasants. Now we must expand propaganda to establish Soviet-style political power.
2. We must set up a Soviet-style government in the areas where the forces of our uprising are most powerful.
3. The slogans to establish a democratic revolutionary government have turned sour. (Both Wu Peifu and Zhao Hengti claimed their regimes to be democratic.) We should no longer use the slogan. At present, we ought to spare no effort to advocate the idea of, and to establish, the political power of the workers and peasants.

C) The Peasant Question

The Enlarged Session's resolution on the peasant question has decided to confiscate the land of big landlords and give it to the peasants. It is our opinion that in areas where the revolution has developed rapidly, if the peasants themselves confiscate the land of small landlords, we had better not interfere. The Hunan Provincial Committee holds that, at present, the rural revolution has reached the point where it can abolish entirely the tenant system and overthrow the landlord regime. Our party's policy toward the peasants should be the rural revolution, letting the poor lead the middle peasants, controlling the rich peasants, and overthrowing the whole landlord system. We should not make any concessions to the landlord class when we confiscate their land. What we ought to do is to help them after their land has been confiscated and they have become ordinary people. At that time, if they are able to farm, we will distribute to them the same amount of land as that given the peasants. This is the way to eliminate the landlord class.

IV) The Plan for the Autumn Harvest Uprising in Hunan⁹⁰

A) The Autumn Harvest Uprising in Hunan was originally intended to launch a provincewide peasant uprising, develop the forces of the uprising to implement the party's land program, and seize political power. The uprising was divided into the following four areas: (1) central Hunan with Changsha as the center; (2) south Hunan with Hengyang as the center; (3) west Hunan with Changde as the center; (4) the Baojing area between the west and the south with Baojing as the center.

Having made this arrangement, we found it was very difficult to organize the uprising in all four areas because of the shortage of labor power and money. After several discussions, we realized that our party's strength and economic situation could only allow us to organize the uprising in the counties of central Hunan. Thus, we gave up the original plan and concentrated our efforts only on central Hunan with Changsha as the center. The uprising was to be launched simultaneously in the seven counties of Xiangtan, Ningxiang, Liling, Liuyang, Pingjiang, Anyuan, and Yuezhou.

B) The schedule of the uprising—as soon as the plan of the first Changsha Uprising was approved by the CC we started immediately to prepare the uprising in central Hunan. In principle, it was to be launched at the same time as the uprising in south Hubei. We took the decision on 30 August. The Standing Committee then sent Gongda to the Party Center to report the plan, Zedong to the Liu[yang]-Ping[jiang] area to be the division commander of the peasant army and to set up the Front Committee there, and Zisheng to Yuezhou to direct our work in Hubei and to coordinate the peasant uprising with that under the Command Committee of South Hubei. Gongda went to Wuhan on 1 September and convened a Standing Committee meeting (immediately on his return to Changsha on 5 September) to discuss with all department leaders of the Provincial Committee the schedule of the uprising. The same day, Zedong sent a letter back from Anyuan—the Anyuan Executive Committee sent a similar letter back—in which they agreed to launch an uprising at Anyuan on 11 September and attack Changsha on 18 September. He also mentioned in the letter that the uprising at Changsha should cooperate with the army at the front; otherwise, it would be defeated. At the Standing Committee meeting, Gongda suggested that we begin to sabotage the railways on 9 September and start the uprising in various counties on 10 September and in Changsha on 13 September. He argued that in launching the uprising our forces in different places should not wait too long for each other, because that would allow the enemy to prepare to wipe us out. After a one-hour discussion, however, his suggestion was rejected by the department leaders. The final arrangement was to sabotage railways on 9 September and start the uprising in various counties on 11 September and at Changsha on 15 September. Once the decision was made, we immediately notified the local party organizations and ordered them to implement it.

C) Things to be done during the uprising: The Provincial Committee thought that we must encourage the peasants to decide to do the following things both before and after the uprising:

1. Distribute the land equally.
2. Restore the peasant associations and declare that all political power in the countryside belongs to the peasant association.
3. Execute local tyrants, evil gentry, and reactionaries.
4. Confiscate the property of local tyrants, evil gentry, reactionaries, and big landlords.
5. Burn down the houses of local tyrants, evil gentry, and big landlords.
6. Boycott and refuse to pay rent and taxes; distribute equally to the people the rent and taxes that have been collected.
7. Refuse to pay taxes and levies, and destroy all kinds of governmental tax offices.
8. Establish revolutionary committees.
9. Destroy traffic and communications services.

[[E] Propaganda work during the uprising.]]

V) The Progress of the Hunan Autumn Harvest Uprising

[[A] The uprising began with sabotage by sixty people on the Changsha-Yuezhou and Changsha-Zhuzhou railways. But lack of technical preparation meant that little damage was done. The Changsha-Yuezhou railway was open again on 15 September, and the Changsha-Zhuzhou railway on 12 September.

B) The Anyuan Uprising began on 10 September with an attack on Pingxiang. A second attack was attempted on 12 September but we had to withdraw. Attacks on Liling and Liuyang also failed. In Liling the peasants failed to add their support, and at Liuyang the worker-peasant army was defeated too quickly.

C) The Liuyang-Pingjiang peasant army attacked Changshoujie from three sides on 11 September but was defeated because of a regiment's defection. They retreated to the Hunan-Jiangxi border, where they were planning to launch another offensive. They have been instructed by the Provincial Committee to begin land redistribution.

D) On 11 September, the uprising began to the east and west of the Changsha River. In the east, five local regiments were destroyed. The peasants did not rise up, as their leaders lacked determination. Once the military operations were completed, political influence over the peasantry was ended and party organizations disappeared.]]

E) The peasants in the outskirts of Changsha were better organized than their counterparts in various counties. Last year, they waged a struggle to reduce rent and realized that the peasant association was an organization working for their interests. Thus, they trusted the peasant association. At the beginning of the uprising, about 10,000 peasants in the outskirts of Changsha joined in, and they provided the main force. Unfortunately, after being defeated by the local regiments at Jiufeng, they lost courage and even refused to allow Comrade Tan, who was claimed to be their leader, to stay with them. Three-fifths of the strength of the Changsha Uprising was wiped out. Although the labor forces managed to survive, most labor leaders were arrested because the reactionary regime had adopted a harsh policy to execute and suppress the workers and peasants. Now, after suffering numerous setbacks, the labor movement has lost much of its courage for the uprising. The failure to sabotage the railways was a heavy blow to the development of the Changsha Uprising and forced it to stop.

F) Had we started the Changsha Uprising on 13 September, it would have been a good opportunity because both the reactionary regime and society were frightened on that day. In addition, the uprising in the Liu-Ping area was developing rapidly. Had we taken the opportunity to launch the uprising at Changsha, we might have succeeded in taking over the city, or at least we could have provided effective assistance for our forces in the Liu-Ping area and south Hubei. In this way, the uprising in those two areas would not have failed. By 16 September, the reactionary regime and society had gradually recovered from the panic, and the reactionary forces had completed their military deployment. If we had continued the uprising, we would have certainly suffered heavy casualties under the harsh suppression of the enemy troops. In light of this background, the Provincial Committee decided to halt the uprising.

VI) Conclusion—Comments on the Failure of the Autumn Harvest Uprising

In our opinion, the decision made by the Provincial Committee to halt the Changsha Uprising on 16 September was not a serious mistake. The genuine major mistakes made by the Provincial Committee were as follows:

1. The purpose of the Hunan Autumn Harvest Uprising was to mobilize the peasants for rural revolution. The main force of the uprising thus had to be the peasants. We must urge the whole party to work hard among the peasantry to organize it for the uprising. Unfortunately, the party leadership in Hunan neither committed themselves to this task nor concentrated on the peasant movement. Instead, the uprisings in various areas all simply aimed at carrying out military operations. Therefore, they failed to arouse peasant interest in the uprising, even less their enthusiasm for the rural revolution. This is the fundamental error that caused the uprising's failure.

2. The party's leading organs—both the Provincial Committee and the various county committees—did not really understand the true significance and aim of the Autumn Harvest Uprising. They failed to grasp the essence of party policy and did not treat the uprising as the focus of the struggle and the party's central task. As a result, the broad body of party members did not feel a strong need for the uprising. The party's leadership as well as ordinary party members had neither the determination for the uprising nor the resolute will to implement the various policies of the uprising among the peasantry. This fact fully reveals that our party is still an organ of the petty bourgeoisie rather than an organization for the proletarian struggle.

3. The Hunan Autumn Harvest Uprising should have been launched throughout the province, as circumstances were favorable at that time. However, the Provincial Committee decided subjectively to concentrate on a few counties in the central Hunan area and organize the uprising in only a few counties. We exerted no effort in the south and north Hunan areas. Hence, the uprising in the central Hunan area became isolated, and our forces in south and west Hunan could neither pin down the enemy nor launch any important diversionary attacks. This is also one of the reasons for our defeat.

VII) Suggestions for Future Work—Draft for the Second Hunan Uprising

1) Although the Hunan Autumn Harvest Uprising has failed because of mistakes by the party leadership, the revolutionary movement of the proletariat and the peasants in Hunan is continuously developing and surging ahead. Having experienced the failure of the Autumn Harvest Uprising, the revolutionary struggle in Hunan has entered a new stage. Its mission now is to complete the rural revolution and to establish the political power of the worker-peasant-soldier soviet.

2) As the revolutionary enthusiasm of the proletariat and the peasantry in Hunan continues to rise, we must make use of this good opportunity to launch the second uprising. We should keep in mind the precious lessons learned from the Autumn Harvest Uprising, that is, we must not rely only on the military while neglecting the strength of the peasants. We must avoid making the same mistake during the second uprising. This time we must use the peasants as the major force in the uprising and mobilize the whole party to work hard among the peasantry, encourage them to rise up spontaneously to seize land, and complete the rural revolution.

3) The revolutionary courage and determination of the proletariat in Hunan—the miners of Anyuan and the railway workers—were reflected in the Autumn Harvest Uprising. Therefore, we ought to make particular efforts to enhance our work among the miners of Anyuan, Shuikoushan, and the tin mine; the rickshaw pullers, longshoremen, streetcar workers, iron workers, and textile workers in Changsha, as well as the workers of the ordnance factory in Hengyang to encourage them to rise up in arms.

4) We must employ all kinds of methods in the uprising areas to advocate the significance and aim of the uprising in order to arouse the enthusiasm of the broad masses of workers and peasants.

5) With respect to the military aspect of the uprising, we should not rely on the military as the major strength but only as one of the forces in the uprising. The main purpose of military work is to sabotage the enemy's military organizations. Thus, we must speed up our work among the enemy's soldiers and establish party organizations and party branches among them. With the establishment of these organizations, we can cause more serious damage to the enemy troops. We used to carry out military work in the old and erroneous style. This must be completely corrected in the future.

[[6) List of areas for the second uprising.]]

7) We must encourage the peasants to organize themselves both before and after the uprising to carry out the following work: (i) Distribute land. (ii) Confiscate the property of local tyrants, evil gentry, reactionaries, and big landlords. (iii) Execute local tyrants, evil gentry, landlords, and rich and powerful people in cities. (iv) Capture the weapons of the local regiments to arm the worker-peasant revolutionary army. (v) Burn down the houses of local tyrants, evil gentry, and big landlords. (vi) Boycott taxes and rent and destroy all manner of tax offices of the reactionary regime. (vii) Sabotage as much as possible the communications of the reactionary regime. (viii) Restore the peasant associations; and exercise the dictatorship of the peasant association. (ix) Establish revolutionary committees.

C.9 Resolution on the Current Situation in China and the Mission of the CP (November 1927)⁹¹

I) Recent Strategy of the CC and the Revolutionary Situation

[[The main contents of the Circular Letter drafted by the 7 August 1927 Emergency Conference of the CC are outlined [see above, Doc. C.2]: because of the warlords' counterrevolutionary activities, a general crisis would develop rapidly. Despite the setbacks in Shanghai and Canton [April 1927] and in Wuhan [July 1927], the revolution would not remain at a low ebb for long. Pessimism was completely wrong.]]

The political situation since then has fully shown that the CC's conclusion is correct, as is its general political strategy. Of course, the Nanchang Uprising and the Southern Expedition of the Revolutionary Army in Guangdong failed at Chaoshan. Neither did the peasant uprisings in Guangdong, Hunan, and Hubei win any decisive victories. However, despite these new failures of the revolution, the general experience of our struggle during the recent three months has proved further that our party's strategy is entirely correct. Recently, the labor movement and the peasant struggle have broken out forcefully and the general political conditions as well as the relations between different classes have undergone drastic changes. Hence it is the CCP's task to analyze the current situation and decide on a strategy that suits the circumstances.

II) The General Crisis in Chinese Society and the Economic Situation in Agriculture

[[The general crisis will bring about a new climax of the revolutionary struggle waged by the proletariat, the urban poor, and particularly the broad masses of the peasants. The badly stricken and declining rural economy is set to erupt like a volcano. Now 50 to 70 percent of the peasants throughout the country are unable to survive because of the extreme exploitation by the ruling class. War damage has affected irrigation, etc. The financial system is in chaos, leading to a drop in price of most farm products in the cities. Only a complete victory of the worker-peasant revolution and a drastic change in landownership can prevent the crisis.]]

III) The Industrial and Commercial Crisis

[[The industrial, commercial, and financial crisis in China is even more serious. One of the major missions of the Chinese revolution is to create a unified nationwide domestic market, because without such a market, industrialization cannot be realized. The GMD's betrayal of the revolution has prevented this.]]

IV) The Rapid Advance of the Imperialist Invasion

[[In the field of international relations, the reactionary bourgeois warlords [GMD] have completely surrendered to foreign capitalism. This has led to the expansion of imperialist power in China.]]

V) The National Bourgeoisie and the GMD

[[With regard to domestic policies, the reactionary bourgeois warlords have resorted to the savage means of fascism and the Asian form of brutal dictatorship. However, as it turns more reactionary, the national bourgeoisie is also approaching disintegration and collapse. It betrayed the revolution at the very climax of the mass movement. The national bourgeoisie cannot unite China either alone or in alliance with the landlords.]]

The GMD used to be a revolutionary league composed of various classes, but today it has decayed into a kennel of imperialist running dogs without doctrine or purpose, a party which murders workers and peasants and a bureaucratic body made up of grafters, corrupt politicians, murderers, and speculators. This fact reflects clearly the totally corrupt and deteriorated state of the reactionary bourgeois regime. As early as August, the CC of the CCP predicted that it was absolutely impossible for the GMD to be a well-organized bourgeois ruling party. This prediction has proved correct. The present meeting entirely agrees with the CC's September resolution on canceling the plan for organizing a GMD-left and raising the slogan for the establishment of the soviet.⁹² We are convinced that the failure of the GMD-left demonstrates that the GMD has degenerated into a party of white terror and that the only way out for the true revolutionaries is to unite under the banner of the CP. Not only will we call on all revolutionary elements to withdraw from the GMD, but also we will expose its hypocritical, evil essence and its oppression of the people. We are determined to lead the broad masses of the people to overthrow the GMD.

The Chinese bourgeoisie is a historically aborted child. It cannot even organize a political party of its own and put forward a basic political program, to say nothing of a platform of real political significance.

VI) The Future of the Chinese Revolution

[[The unique character of the Chinese bourgeoisie has resulted in the failure of the reactionary regime of the bourgeois warlords to maintain the stability of their rule. Even if the national bourgeoisie were to gain power, it would have to hand it over to the gentry and landlord class with their reactionary forces. Capitalism using reformist methods is impossible in China. Further, the Chinese people's revolutionary movement is still powerful and is far from destroyed.]]

All these factors make the enlarged meeting of the Temporary Politburo of the CCP believe that the present conditions in China are favorable for a direct revolution. This analysis by the meeting has nothing in common with the illusion that "the revolution will surely achieve a complete success within the shortest time." The situation in China indicates that the period of the direct revolution is not that of several weeks or a few months. It will last quite a few years. In essence, the Chinese revolution is a long, uninterrupted process. It is what Marx would call a "continuous revolution" [wujianduan de geming]⁹³ because first, as far as its nature is concerned, in the development of the Chinese revolution, there will not be an interruption after the stage of the bourgeois revolution (the so-called theory of "two-stage revolution"). This is because the Chinese bourgeoisie is incapable of carrying out the democratic revolution to overthrow the feudal warlord regime. Hence the Chinese revolution must advance directly and rapidly from the democratic stage to the socialist revolution. Second, as far as the speed of development is concerned, although the Chinese revolution has suffered several setbacks, it has managed to make continued progress because the conflicts between the different factions of the ruling class are so sharp that they are never able to consolidate their regime. The various movements waged by the revolutionary people, particularly the spontaneous peasant uprisings that have broken out everywhere, are bound to merge into a general worker-peasant uprising which will overthrow the regime of the warlords, gentry, and landlords and the bourgeoisie. This continuous eruption of the revolution indicates vividly that the Chinese revolution is a permanent one. In short, although the Chinese revolution has not yet finished its mission for the democratic stage, it will develop rapidly beyond it and turn directly into a socialist revolution.

VII) The High and Low Ebbs of the Revolutionary Tide

[[The permanent essence of the Chinese revolution is reflected in the recent new climax of the peasant uprisings in a number of important provinces. After a low ebb, the labor movement surged forth vigorously again in the several major industrial centers although it remains weak.]]

Of course, it is wrong to overestimate the development of the revolution and its strength and the organizational capability of the people, and to think that an immediate victory can occur over a large area. Nevertheless, it is clear that the revolutionary struggle is on the rise again despite the three major setbacks and the present reactionary pressure. It will be an absolutely unforgivable mistake if we overlook such a situation.

For the revolutionary tide to reach a low ebb, at least three factors must be present: first, the bourgeois warlords must maintain a stable rule; second, reformist policies must be gradually applied; and third, the revolutionary mass movement must decline and collapse. The enemy's harsh suppression alone cannot cause the revolution to collapse; rather, it indicates that the enemy has been scared by the surges of the revolutionary tide and that is why they desperately try to put down the revolutionary struggle. However, the revolutionary mass movement will fail if there is not a Bolshevik party to lead the proletariat, to mobilize enthusiastically the people to participate in the struggle, and to guide the revolution's development. To dream that the revolutionary movement will rise and succeed by itself is to make an opportunist error.

VIII) Our General Strategy at the Present Time

The CCP's current general strategy is to: (a) go all out to build the spontaneous revolutionary struggle of the masses into a well-organized movement; (b) try to unify the various isolated and scattered peasant uprisings into a general uprising across an area as large as possible; and (c) make sure that the working-class struggle and the peasant uprising can be combined to mutual benefit. The CCP should avoid launching any immature and hopeless armed uprisings because that is a desperate and risky strategy. But, at the same time, our party should take over the leadership of all spontaneous, mass revolutionary struggles. We Communists ought to be the leaders of all peasant uprisings. When a peasant uprising lacks preparation, we should postpone it. If an uprising is unable to score a large-scale victory, our party should transform it into guerrilla warfare, i.e., not attacking county seats, or spending time organizing a large, regular army, but building up a small and well-organized guerrilla force to launch frequent attacks on the government's army and the landlord forces. Later, this kind of guerrilla warfare can easily develop into a major peasant uprising and seize political power over a large area. Of course, once guerrilla warfare begins, it is very likely that the peasants will attack cities, particularly small towns. Our party should make special efforts to guide this kind of guerrilla warfare in order to make it serve our tactical purposes. We should strike when the enemy is unprepared, seize its arms, execute the gentry and landlords, and destroy all kinds of reactionary government organs. However, it would be military opportunism if, after a peasant uprising, we concentrated only on attacking county seats and forgot that the fundamental task for the rural revolution is to mobilize more people, to distribute land to the masses, and to help them establish a government (the soviet).

It is much more difficult to apply the strategy of guerrilla warfare in the cities because such tactics do not always suit the urban environment. Therefore, we should not launch guerrilla warfare in a city unless we have finally decided to launch an uprising there and street fighting has already begun. At present, however, it is one of our urgent tasks to build up the workers' armed self-defense corps in all industrial areas, train them, and use them in the daily struggle against the "yellow" trade unions. The following conditions are necessary to launch a successful urban uprising: first, the revolutionary enthusiasm of the workers must be high, and their daily economic struggle must have intensified and expanded into part of the general political struggle; second, the ruling-class regime must be unstable and face a total crisis; third, ordinary people in the city must be panicked, feel hostile to the ruling class, and even begin to show sympathy for the struggle to overthrow the regime; and fourth, the revolutionary labor movement must be well organized and skillfully trained. Therefore, while actively engaged in the preparation for military operations, our party should also pay attention to the direction and mobilization of the daily economic and political struggles of the workers, artisans, and shop assistants in various cities, speed up the struggles and educate the workers to understand, even in a very small-scale strike, the necessity to seize power through an armed uprising and the significance of uniting with the peasants to overthrow the ruling class. This is a practical way to make political preparations for an urban uprising. Our party's most important task is to organize an association linking the working class and the peasant uprisings because without the leadership and assistance of the working class, the peasant uprising alone cannot expect to win final victory. However, this kind of association can only be organized and planned by the party. No matter whether in an urban or rural area, armed uprisings must always be suited to the local circumstances and begin at the right moment. They should not be postponed in order to wait for each other or start hastily when the conditions are unfavorable. We cannot expect to win an armed uprising with military opportunism or with the military influence from other insurrections.

Since the working-class uprising is very important, it is certainly wrong to neglect urban workers and to regard them only as a force for cooperation with the peasant struggle. It is our party's responsibility to guide the daily struggle of the workers, raise their revolutionary consciousness, organize them, and lead them to launch insurrections so that an urban uprising can become a center to lead the spontaneous peasant uprisings in the area. In fact, urban workers' uprisings are the precondition for a large uprising and for consolidation of the revolution's victory.

With the general strategy of armed uprisings, two erroneous tendencies might occur. One is military opportunism. To launch an immature and hopeless insurrection is of course a kind of military opportunism. However, this is not the major danger. The real problem is that some of us trust only military power rather than the people's strength, and know only how to make military deployments rather than how to mobilize the masses. Thus, in an armed uprising, they would concentrate only on military operations and forget to develop the people's struggle. The other erroneous tendency is to adopt, as an excuse for lack of preparation, an attitude of wait and see toward the uprising. Such people would not mobilize the local masses and feel hesitant or act shakily in leading an uprising even when the majority of the people have taken up arms. Such a tendency to underestimate the people's strength, overlook the work of mobilization, and even place restrictions on the spontaneous struggle of the masses will cause our party to lose political influence among the broad masses of people. As regards how to handle these two erroneous tendencies, the party should first point out their dangers, and then make every effort to get rid of them. Of course, it is the CCP's responsibility to plan as carefully as possible a well-organized uprising, but we should also take into consideration leadership of the spontaneous uprisings of the masses even though they may lack preparation.

Finally, as far as the strategy of the worker-peasant uprisings is concerned, we must make particular efforts to eliminate ruthlessly the gentry, landlords, scabs, and all reactionaries. We should also try to persuade the urban poor and ordinary citizens (the petty bourgeoisie) to participate in the worker-peasant movement. Nevertheless, regarding our policy toward the higher echelons of the petty bourgeoisie such as shopowners, we should not feel hesitant in developing the dictatorship exercised by the revolutionary masses or place any restriction on their revolutionary activities for fear of disturbing the tranquility and peaceful order of the higher echelons of the petty bourgeoisie. Although the opportunity for a general uprising has not yet arrived, it is our party's task to raise revolutionary enthusiasm both in urban and rural areas in order to create a favorable environment for the general uprising. While taking the leadership of the spontaneous peasant uprisings into account, our party should also work hard to educate the impoverished peasants, guide the preparations of any potential uprisings, and launch guerrilla warfare. In addition, we should organize workers to wage class struggle, help them launch armed uprisings, and guide them to ally with the peasant uprisings to form a general uprising in order to triumph over as large an area as possible.

IX) The Slogan for the Establishment of the Soviet and the Political Program of the Workers and Peasants

During the present stage of the revolution, our party's main slogan is to call for the establishment of the soviet. This is because the political power of the worker-peasant dictatorship under the leadership of the proletariat can only be founded within the soviet system. The party should make speeches and publish propaganda to explain to the broad masses that "it is necessary to establish a government made up of the representatives of the workers, peasants, soldiers, artisans, and the urban poor." (All power belongs to the congress of workers, peasants, soldiers, and urban poor.) However, organization of the soviet should not be started until the climax of the revolutionary mass movement has definitely arrived and the victory of the uprising is guaranteed. Only then can we establish the soviet as the organ of revolutionary power. The so-called guaranteed victory of the uprising means that the uprising is able to control a certain area for quite a long time. Once such a possibility appears, we should begin to establish a peasant congress [nongmin daibiao huiyi] (the soviet). As long as the uprising is really supported by the masses, we must organize the soviet when it triumphs. If the peasant uprising is still in the stage of guerrilla warfare, its leading organ should be the local revolutionary committee, which has been set up as a provisional government to prepare and direct the uprising. In general, a peasant uprising ought to be organized and led by the revolutionary committee elected by the local secret peasant organizations [nongmin de mimi tuanti] (the peasant association, etc.). (An urban uprising should be led by the revolutionary committee elected by the local trade union.) We must try hard to mobilize and attract more people to participate in the struggle, adopt a policy of self-determination [zidong shou] ("the democratic style") to confiscate land, eliminate landlords and scabs, destroy all the old Chinese social orders, apply guerrilla warfare tactics, disarm the enemy's troops, and found a worker-peasant revolutionary army. If an uprising can triumph and maintain control over a certain large area, we should begin to organize the soviet (the peasant congress). If the revolutionary forces are able to take over a city or several counties or even a whole province, and the uprisings of workers and peasants have united and triumphed there, we should set up a formal soviet government. When organizing the congress of workers, peasants, soldiers, and urban poor in cities, we must make particular efforts to recruit the broad masses of the workers, artisans, and shop assistants. From the very beginning, or even before an urban uprising starts, embryo forms of mass organizations such as the general league of the strike committee [zong tongmeng bagong weiyuanhui], the workers' congress, and the revolutionary committee should be set up. We must work actively to lead such mass organizations, use them as centers to direct uprisings, and make them governing bodies to exercise the revolutionary dictatorship. If the uprising triumphs, we must transform these mass organizations into the soviet to become the organ of revolutionary power. The victory of an uprising can only be consolidated with the establishment of the soviet because this will give the mass of the workers and peasants their own government. Then they will fight even harder to defend and expand the victory of the revolution. In general, the soviet should not be organized before we have won a solid victory; otherwise, it would keep us busy with elections while neglecting military operations, and a petty bourgeois tendency of democratism might appear which would weaken the revolutionary dictatorship and even endanger the party's leadership. However, neither is it correct to postpone organization of the soviet using the excuse that the military operation has not been completed or the victory has not been consolidated. Such reasoning will lead to the growth of military opportunism in the uprising and change the worker-peasant uprising into a mere military operation concentrating only on taking cities, seizing territory, and making military deployments.

The general slogan for the armed uprising is that all political power belongs to the congress of workers, peasants, soldiers, and urban poor. The urban poor should include artisans, small farmers, and the ordinary petty bourgeoisie who do not exploit the people.

In accordance with local conditions and the preferences of the masses there, the party should organize the peasants into organizations such as a peasant association or peasant committee. These peasant organizations must be the political organs of the impoverished peasants (the poor and bankrupt peasants, tenants, farmhands, and unemployed peasants) for waging class struggle and preparing uprisings, rather than welfare organizations such as trade unions. The definite policy of our party is that once the uprising triumphs, the peasant association will be transformed into a peasant congress (the soviet). From now on, we must begin to advocate the principle of the soviet and explain the interim function of the peasant association. In fact, the principle of the soviet does not conflict with the idea of the peasant association, but the slogan that "all political power belongs to the peasant association" should be abolished. Apart from the idea of the soviet, we should also unite the peasants under the banner of the rural revolution. In those areas where the peasant insurrections have not yet been organized, the traditional secret peasant societies are useful. Our party should educate them to fight against rent, taxes, and debts, and, finally, to organize the armed uprising to confiscate the land. The general principle of our party's land policy has been elaborated on in the section on the land problem in the party program (draft).⁹⁴ We must oppose resolutely any attempts by the opportunists to give ambiguous or erroneous interpretations of, or even to revise the party's policy on, the land question. The main principle of the rural revolution is to confiscate totally the land of all landlords; distribute the land through the peasant congress to the poor peasants; a peasant should have his own land; abolish thoroughly the tenant system; unite together to fight against rent and taxes; cancel all unfair leases, exorbitant usury, and heavy debts; confiscate properties of landlords and usurers; and eliminate gentry, landlords, and all kinds of counterrevolutionaries. Our party firmly opposes any attempt to replace the aforementioned revolutionary slogans with such reformist ideas as reducing rent, confiscating only the land of the big landlords, and eliminating only the despotic gentry and the bad landlords. Our party should make efforts to add democratic elements to the peasant uprisings but, at the same time, we must ruthlessly execute without hesitation all gentry and landlords as well as the counterrevolutionaries. We should keep this in mind even in a very small-scale guerrilla war.

Regarding our slogans in the cities, in addition to the principle of the soviet, we have also put forward the following ideas for the labor question in our party program: the eight-hour [work]day, a sharp rise in wages, one day of rest per week, a social security system, and supervision over production. Moreover, we must explain to the workers and the urban poor that we will put the following policies into practice once the uprising triumphs: confiscation of all properties of counterrevolutionaries; transformation to state ownership of large factories, large shops, banks, mines, and railways of the big Chinese and foreign capitalists; factories to be run by the workers; application of the labor law; confiscation of properties of the small mill owners if they slow down production or close their mills; elimination of all scabs and counterrevolutionaries; collection of taxes on properties of the bourgeoisie; and improvement of the living standards of the urban poor by such means as building houses for workers and the urban poor. Only with such revolutionary slogans can our party organize the oppressed people into uprisings and achieve success.

X) The Struggle Against the Warlords' War and Military Issues

[[It is absolutely wrong to adopt the attitude of revolutionary "defeatism" toward the warlords' wars. Most warlords in the north are big landlords or usurers and are representatives of the largest bureaucrat-compradore bourgeoisie, while the warlords in the south represent an alliance of landlords, usurers, and the national bourgeoisie. Although they belong to different factions of the reactionary camp, their attitudes toward the working class and the peasants are the same. The task of our party during all the warlords' wars is to try to turn them into revolutionary wars. Establishment of the soviet will rid us forever of the warlords' wars. We must instigate rebellion within the soldiers' ranks. A special order has been issued by this meeting to party committees at all levels to ask them to start immediately secret propaganda work among the soldiers and lower-ranking noncommissioned officers. Our party should call on the soldiers to take part in the worker-peasant uprisings, confiscate properties of the warlords, and send representatives to participate in the government of the congress of workers, peasants, soldiers, and urban poor. Where uprisings have been successful, we should organize the Worker-Peasant Revolutionary Army.]]

XI) The Anti-Imperialist Struggle

[[Since the 7 August [1927] Emergency Conference, China has entered a period of the most unprecedented, intensified class struggle in its history. As a result, our party has been unable to devote any time to the national liberation movement against the foreign imperialists. Yet the Chinese bourgeoisie has submitted to the imperialists thus proving that only the proletariat is the true leader of the national liberation movement. Therefore, the CCP should lead the national liberation movement and expose firmly the traitorous behavior of the ruling class and the hypocritical “anti-imperialist” clichés of the GMD.]]

XII) The Evil Legacy of Opportunism

The 7 August Emergency Conference seriously criticized the opportunist and semi-Menshevik political line of the party’s former leading organ, and the Temporary Politburo has repeatedly corrected the opportunist errors of the various local party leading organs. However, the evil influence of petty bourgeois opportunism remains within the party. One of the major reasons why the Ye [Ting]–He [Long] troops failed at Chaoshan and the Nanchang Uprising lost its political significance was because the commanders at the front did not carry out the revolutionary policy. Rather, they adopted a compromising reformist policy on various major issues. For example, they only wanted to confiscate the land of the landlords with over 200 mu and maintain a reduced rent which still accounted for 30 percent of the harvest. They neglected revolutionary propaganda work among the peasant masses; forbade workers and peasants to take their own independent decisions about executing the gentry, landlords, and counterrevolutionaries; and gave up the policy of confiscation of properties of the gentry and landlords. The party’s Front Committee also made bad decisions on military issues. Their direction lacked a revolutionary dynamic and firm resolution. The lack of determination and strong revolutionary will among the leaders is the main reason for the defeat of many peasant uprisings. Characteristically, the opportunists trust neither the strength of the mass movement nor rely on the workers and peasants. They always pin their hopes on troops who are, in fact, unreliable, and they only want to collaborate with the small local warlords. The CC has decided at this meeting to use all the party’s strength to get rid of this evil legacy of opportunism, which has brought fatal dangers to our party. Since one of the main reasons why this kind of opportunism can survive is that many of the leading party members are from a nonproletarian class background, this meeting orders party committees at all levels to act resolutely to replace the leading members with people from a working-class background and to eliminate all opportunists in the party. We ought to understand that our recent failures in Hunan, Hubei, and Guangdong, as well as the failed Southern Expedition of the Ye–He troops, are largely owing to subjective errors, and that without a powerful and sound non-opportunist party leadership, the revolution cannot triumph.

Finally, this meeting believes that it is also necessary to prevent the occurrence of another kind of dangerous tendency—the underestimation of the significance of the daily economic struggles of the working class, its concentration on small matters and the work of the labor movement. In fact, the general strategy for the armed uprising does not conflict with the task of directing the working-class struggle for economic interests. On the contrary, it requires our party to work more actively to lead the working class to fight for improvements in their daily lives and working conditions. Only in this way can the CCP be considered by the masses as their own revolutionary organization.

C.10 Political Resolution of the Sixth National Congress [of the CCP] (9 July 1928)⁹⁵

I) China and the World Revolution

1. The Development of World Revolution

[[The world revolution over the last ten years can be divided into three stages. First, the October [1917] Revolution in Russia. Second, a phase of partial but temporary stabilization of the capitalist economy. Third, a phase that begins with the sharpening of conflicts between the bourgeoisie and the proletariat in capitalist countries, and between imperialist powers and the laboring masses in the colonies and semi-colonies. This third stage will witness another round of open, decisive upsurges by the working class and uprisings in the colonies, accompanied by the danger of an anti-Soviet war and the possibility of many large-scale conflicts between the imperialist powers.]]

2. The International Significance of the Chinese Revolution

[[The Sixth Congress of the CCP sees a much sharper class struggle in the world as inevitable. The struggle of the Chinese laboring masses will advance the proletarian world revolution by weakening imperialist pressure on Soviet Russia and on workers in other countries. The second stage of the Chinese revolution—the proletarian socialist revolution—will be an even more direct component of the world socialist revolution than the first stage—the bourgeois-democratic revolution. The completion of the Chinese revolution will be the prelude to victory of the world proletarian dictatorship.]]

II) The Nature of the Chinese Revolution and Its Power

3. The Nature and Tasks of the Chinese Revolution

The Sixth Congress of the CCP agrees entirely with the evaluation of the Chinese revolution by the Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Plenums of the ECCI [emphasis in the original; 29 November–16 December 1926, 20–26 May 1927, 9–25 February 1928, respectively]. The nature of the present stage of the Chinese revolution is bourgeois-democratic; it is erroneous to think of the present stage of the Chinese revolution as having already passed over into the socialist revolution. It is also erroneous to regard the present Chinese revolution as a “continuous revolution” [buduan geming], because: (a) the real unification of China has not yet been accomplished, and it has not yet been emancipated from imperialism; (b) the private landownership system of the landlord class has not yet been overthrown, and all semifeudal remnants have not been liquidated; and (c) the present political power is the governmental power of the landlords, warlords, compradores, and national bourgeoisie, an alliance of reactionary forces dependent on the political and economic strength of international imperialism; therefore, the immediate goal of the [Chinese] revolution is to solve these problems. The core of the Chinese revolution at present and the fundamental and central tasks are:

- (a) to drive out the imperialists and to accomplish the real unification of China; and
- (b) to abolish completely and popularly [i.e., through the people] the private landownership system of the landlord class and to carry out the rural revolution in which the Chinese peasants (small owners) will destroy all the semifeudal bondage in the land system.

These two tasks do not yet exceed the scope of the capitalist mode of production—but they can only be accomplished by overthrowing, through the revolutionary method of armed insurrection, the rule of the imperialists and that of the landlord-warlord-bourgeois GMD and by setting up a democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants’ soviets under the leadership of the proletariat.

(c) Therefore, the third task of the Chinese revolution at the present bourgeois-democratic stage is already the struggle to establish the rule of councils of workers’, peasants’, and soldiers’ deputies (soviets). This is the best method of inducing the vast toiling masses to participate in political rule and to realize the democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants.

The national bourgeoisie of China betrayed the revolution and joined the counterrevolutionary camp of the imperialists, gentry, and landlords. They were once (before spring 1927) a force that could weaken the imperialists and undermine the warlord system, but they have now come to strengthen and unify the imperialists and the warlord system. Therefore, the sole source of power [of the Chinese revolution] lies, at the present bourgeois-democratic stage, with the Chinese proletariat and peasantry.

China’s anti-imperialist, bourgeois-democratic revolution, which completely transforms the [existing] land system, can only be accomplished in opposition to the national bourgeoisie, which is one of the most dangerous enemies obstructing the success of the revolution.

4. The Program of the Chinese Revolution at the Present Stage

At the present stage, the major slogans of the Chinese revolution are:

- a) Overthrow the rule of imperialism.

- b) Confiscate enterprises and banks of foreign capitalism.
- c) Unify China and recognize [the principle] of national self-determination.
- d) Overthrow the warlord-GMD regime.
- e) Establish the regime of councils of workers', peasants', and soldiers' deputies (soviets).
- f) Realize the eight-hour [work]day, higher wages, unemployment relief, social security, etc.
- g) Confiscate the land of all landlords—land should belong to the peasants.
- h) Improve the livelihood of the soldiers and allot them land and work.
- i) Abolish taxes imposed by the [GMD] government, warlords, and local administrations; institute unified, progressive taxes.
- j) Unite with the proletariat of the world and the Soviet Union.

These ten great demands are the present major slogans of the CCP for winning over the masses, preparing armed insurrections, and overthrowing the regime of the gentry and bourgeoisie.

5. The Source of Power of the Chinese Revolution and Its Transition to a Socialist Future

The proletariat and the peasantry now constitute the sole source of power of the Chinese revolution, and the leadership of the proletariat has already been established in the stage of the bourgeois-democratic revolution. (The proletariat can support and guide the peasantry in the rural revolution and the struggle against the imperialists.) This will therefore open the path of the Chinese revolution toward a noncapitalist, that is, socialist, future.

World capitalism is at present in a frightened state of depression. There have been ten years of socialist construction in a country under proletarian dictatorship, the Soviet Union, whose political and economic power is growing; this will help the Chinese proletariat to win the revolution for a socialist future and guarantee its victory.

At the same time, the democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants in the form of soviet rule will be the starting point of transformation to the dictatorship of the proletariat. Only the struggle, the strength, the solidarity, and the organizational strength of the proletariat and only the comparative ratio of class strength can decide when the bourgeois-democratic stage of the revolution will end, and how it will be transformed into the process of socialist revolution of the proletariat.

III) Experiences of Past Struggles

6. The Objective Causes for the Failure of the Chinese Revolution

Despite its impressive development in the initial stage, the Chinese revolution finally failed. At this historical stage, it did not have sufficient strength to overcome the numerous difficulties of the period. Among the objective difficulties and causes [of failure], the following should be mentioned.

a) The imperialists, the archenemies of the Chinese revolution, were very strong and are the organizers and controllers of all reactionary forces. By means of their political and economic power and some puny concessions to the national bourgeoisie, they split the national United Front through coercion and bribery—using the traditional methods of bribing the warlords, of suppressing the revolution by forceful gunboat “diplomacy,” and of economic blockade. By using their powerful strength (in the form of banks, corporations, warships, and troops), they became one of the most serious obstacles to the development and success of the Chinese revolution.

b) The national bourgeoisie betrayed the revolutionary United Front. In the initial stage, the bourgeoisie participated in the revolution. This sowed the seed of its [the bourgeoisie’s] inevitable betrayal and withdrawal from the revolutionary front. The betrayal of the national bourgeoisie temporarily weakened the revolutionary forces and strengthened the counterrevolutionary alliance.

c) The Chinese army is mercenary, which is one of the characteristics of Chinese warlordism; therefore, the reactionary group possesses a numerically superior force—the kind of force which often determines victory or defeat. The revolution [itself] once utilized this type of army. But the officers of such an army are usually the spokesmen of the landlord gentry. The soldiers (in such an army) are men who have been unproductive and who have little contact with workers or peasants. The army was then an obedient tool of the gentry, the feudal landlords, and the bourgeoisie.

d) The development of the revolutionary movement [has been] uneven. The peasant movement had just begun to develop when the Chinese proletariat was engaged in other struggles (such as the May 30 Movement [1925] or the March uprising in Shanghai [1927]). [Even though] the Chinese working class was weakly organized, dispersed, and not particularly powerful, still it very early entered the arena of political struggle and was beset repeatedly by the reactionaries without receiving timely support from the peasantry. The Chinese working class failed under these attacks, without being able to hold on long enough for the peasant movement to develop on an extensive mass scale. Furthermore, the revolution also developed unevenly according to place. The peasants of Guangdong, Hunan, and Hubei in the south had already begun to overthrow the regime of the landlords and gentry and to confiscate and even redistribute the land in some localities, while the peasants in the north were only beginning to participate in the liberation struggle. This naturally made it even easier for the bourgeoisie and feudal gentry to carry out their own reactionary mission.

e) The overwhelming majority of the upper strata of the urban petty bourgeoisie are closely related to the feudal land [system] and also linked with foreign capital. These petty bourgeois elements wavered and [then] betrayed the revolution. During the rapid advance of the anti-imperialist movement and the rural revolution, the petty bourgeoisie vacillated more and more and finally surrendered to the reactionary camp of the gentry bourgeoisie.

7. The Mistakes of Opportunism

However, objective difficulties were not the only forces determining the inevitable failure of the Chinese revolution. The Sixth Congress of the CCP holds that the principal reason for the failure of the revolution was the opportunist policy of the directing organ of the vanguard of the proletariat—the CCP—which, at a critical juncture of the revolution, [adopted] a non-Bolshevik, opportunist policy, thus, in an objective sense, betraying the interests of the struggling, toiling masses. This opportunist policy was, first of all, owing to the CC's erroneous conception of the nature of the Chinese revolution and the tasks of the United Front. The independence of the CCP was not preserved; no class criticism was made of the revolutionary ally; the revolutionary forces were not mobilized; nor were the masses prepared to foil the reactionary plot of our temporary allies. On the contrary, at times [the CC] obstructed the development of the mass movement to suit its erroneous notion of the United Front. Thus the then leading organ of the CCP doomed the Chinese revolution to inevitable failure.

The CCP leadership at that time did nothing to develop the rural revolution and the class struggle of the masses, but engaged in intrigues with the [GMD-left] leaders, ignoring class conflict. It did not try to win over the army; nor did it arm the workers and peasants. It proved incapable of exploiting its participation in the [Wuhan] regime in order to fight for the interests of the masses. At the critical juncture therefore it was encircled by the enemy instead of breaking through [this] encirclement—as a matter of fact, it actually forfeited the leadership of the proletariat. This was the highest expression of opportunism, which manifested itself most shamefully during the May 21 [1927] incident [at Changsha]. Lastly, the leadership of the CCP failed to carry out the Comintern's directives, thus causing the eventual failure of the heroic struggle of the workers and peasants.

The Sixth Congress of the CCP admits that it was entirely correct for the Comintern to bypass the CC and call directly on the CCP membership [and on the] masses, in order to demand a thorough change in the party line and a reshuffling of the party leadership.

8. The 7 August Conference and the Enlarged Conference of November [1927]

The Emergency Conference of 7 August [1927] based itself on the Comintern's directive to correct thoroughly the opportunist errors of the preceding period; therefore, it was a turning-point in the history of the CCP, and of great significance—[it posed] the task of Bolshevizing the party. The 7 August Conference criticized the errors of opportunism in a frank Bolshevik spirit, raised the central slogan of the rural revolution, and designated the overthrow of the reactionary GMD central government as the aim of the proletariat and peasantry, mapped out the general strategy of armed insurrection, and began to liquidate the opportunist elements in the leadership by mobilizing the party membership [and the] masses; thus reorganizing the old leadership, it rescued the party from the mire of opportunism and [put it back] again on the revolutionary path.

It is true that the 7 August Conference still harbored some wishful thoughts about the GMD-left and that it did not deal thoroughly with the rural question. But these defects can never diminish its great historical significance. [Therefore], the Sixth Congress of the CCP wholeheartedly supports the major resolutions of the 7 August Conference.

The Enlarged Conference of November [1927] continued the work of Bolshevization. It mapped out a more detailed and thorough rural policy, raised the slogan of the democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants' soviets, and resolutely decided on an overhauling of the party and the induction of worker-comrades into responsible positions. The Sixth Congress holds, at the same time, [that] the November Conference was very correct in pointing to the necessity of well-prepared, well-coordinated armed insurrections. In evaluating the Chinese revolution, however, the resolution of the Enlarged Conference of November erroneously chose the term "permanent revolution" [see above, Doc. C.9]. This permitted the possibility of interpreting the revolution as continuously ascending, and thus resulted in false tactics. Notions about the Bolshevik policy of insurrection also remained unclarified for a long time, entailing inaccuracies of judgment and tactics and underestimation of the enemy's strength—which can all become the basis of adventurist tendencies. Consequently, the already discovered adventurist tendencies in the party were not effectively checked. (Such ultraleftist tendencies are extremely harmful.)

9. The Significance of the Nanchang Uprising, the Autumn Harvest Uprising, and the Canton Armed Uprising

The Sixth Congress of the CCP holds that the Nanchang Uprising, the Autumn Harvest Uprising, and especially the Canton Uprising definitely did not constitute adventurism from the point of view of policy.

The Nanchang Uprising was a military action against the central GMD [government], and [as such] it was a correct move. The objective cause of its failure was the overwhelming superiority of the enemy. As to the tactical errors of the leadership at that time, they were:

- a) lack of a clear program;
- b) lack of determination in the rural question;
- c) lack of coordination with the peasant movement and failure to arm the peasants;
- d) failure to destroy the old regime and replace it by the workers' regime; and
- e) sundry military blunders. These mistakes were the subjective causes of the failure of the Nanchang Uprising.

In many places the Autumn Harvest Uprising deepened the party's influence among the peasant masses and introduced the slogan of the rural revolution into the mentality of broad peasant masses. The many peasant struggles that followed and even the establishment of soviet areas generally derived from the effect of the Autumn Harvest Uprising. But the mechanical application of the Autumn Harvest policy led in some places to playing at insurrections and military putsches.

The Sixth Congress of the CCP supports the (statement) of the Ninth ECCI meeting that the Canton Uprising [Commune] has world historical significance. The Canton Uprising was a necessary, heroic attempt, a struggle to retain revolutionary gains and to deepen the revolution and to directly set up a soviet regime. But objectively speaking, the Canton Uprising became "a rearguard fight" in the stage of revolutionary failure, and this was not taken into account by the party leadership. Because the revolution had suffered a severe setback, the direction of [party] work should have been resolutely shifted from direct armed insurrection on a large scale to better day-by-day organization and mobilization of the masses. Attention should have been concentrated on overcoming adventurist tendencies, further strengthening the party's leadership in the anti-imperialist movement, and further doing away with arbitrary dictatorialness [in method] regarding the working class and the masses. The leadership at that time did not fully understand this and obviously made inadequate efforts in this direction, underestimating the power of the imperialists and the reactionaries, considerably overemphasizing the success of the peasant movement, and also underappraising the degree of failure suffered by the revolution. The plans of the uprisings in Hunan, Hubei, etc., were erroneous in that they did not evaluate the situation in this light.

IV) The Present Situation in the Revolutionary Movement and the General Line of the CCP

10. The Situation Once the Revolutionary High Tide Has Passed

The first wave of the movement of workers and peasants led for the most part by the CCP has now passed because the workers and peasants have suffered serious defeats, their revolutionary organizations have suffered severe blows (trade unions, peasant associations, CCP departments), their best cadres have been slaughtered, and their vanguard has suffered tremendous losses.

In the present situation, there is, generally speaking, no revolutionary rising tide [involving] the masses on an extensive scale. The present situation is characterized by an uneven rate of development in the Chinese revolutionary movement. The peasants' guerrilla warfare has unevenly advanced and is still only in a scattered, decentralized condition. The armies of the warlords have begun to show signs of disintegration; at the same time, the urban workers' movement has suffered great reverses, and the fighting power of the working class has been weakened because, compared with other revolutionary forces, it has received the heaviest blows from the gentry, the landlords, and the bourgeoisie.

Because the Chinese revolution has failed, because the insurrection of the workers and peasants has been suppressed, and because the national bourgeoisie has betrayed the revolution of national liberation, the power of the imperialists in China is better consolidated and stronger than in 1925–27. Japanese aggression in north China and the dispatch of [Japanese] troops to Jinan actually mark the beginning of the partition of China [among the imperialists].

The objectives of the partition policy [of the powers] are: (1) to achieve colonial, economic exploitation by noneconomic force, so as to completely destroy the revolution in China, and (2) to step up the struggle for markets. As the powers [thus] redouble their efforts to secure the China market, conflicts among the imperialist powers intensify.

Therefore, there is the danger of an imperialist war in the Pacific, and the coastal provinces of China will become the battleground. The major causes of this war will be the fight over the China market and demands for reallocating [spheres of influence] to suit the new relationship among the imperialist powers. At the same time, although there are extremely great conflicts within the imperialist camp such as that between Japan and the United States, the imperialists are at present still much stronger than the Chinese revolution and are forming again an alliance to oppose the revolutionary United Front in China. Whenever their political and economic rule is slightly endangered, they will jointly oppose the Chinese revolution.

The bourgeoisie's turning to the reactionary camp enables the reactionary forces to consolidate and strengthen the forces of the imperialists, warlords, and landlords. Consequently, [they] are able to deal a severe blow to the working class.

Although there are many, many conflicts in the reactionary camp (between the bourgeoisie and the landlords, between the bourgeoisie and the imperialists, among the various groups and cliques within the landlord class, etc.), which lead to armed clashes and warlord imbroglios, the imperialists, gentry, landlords, bourgeoisie, and national bourgeoisie form a united front to oppress the Chinese toiling masses whenever their revolutionary struggle explodes.

11. Why a Revolutionary High Tide Is Inevitable

Nonetheless, there are many indications showing that a new, extensive revolutionary tide is inevitable.

There are several prime forces accelerating and reinforcing the advance of a new [revolutionary] high tide:

(a) none of the conflicts underlying the revolution can be resolved [by the counterrevolution]; (b) the imperialists will never be willing to abandon lightly their privileges in China, such as concessions, leased territories, and tariff control; the bourgeoisie-led reactionaries cannot achieve real centralization and unification; (c) there is hardly any solution for the industrial and economic crisis; it is difficult to improve even slightly the livelihood of the working class; and there are many other difficulties [inherent] in a colonial status [such as] the aggravation of the periodical agricultural crisis, leading to a steady rise of prices for raw materials and foodstuffs, and the daily growth of the labor reserve army, [all of these] resulting in severe oppression of the industrial and working class; (d) the reformist devices of the bourgeoisie cannot solve the rural problem; there is no unused land from which to make concessions to the poor peasants, rich peasants, and tenants, because in China the small landlords constitute an absolute majority and refuse to accept even rent reductions; and (e) there are continuous conflicts within the ruling class and imbroglios among the warlords. In the future, these imbroglios are not only possible but inevitable—although on the surface the Nanjing government has unified China.

[Another] force helping the growth of the revolutionary high tide is the daily sharpening conflict among the imperialist powers. This will help to unleash the Chinese revolution. [The same is true for] the growth of the international proletarian movement and the development of the national revolutionary movement in the colonies adjacent to China (such as India).

The Sixth Congress holds that signs of a preliminary, weak new revolutionary high tide are already noticeable. First of all, there is the symptomatic revival of economic mass strikes. The working masses are rapidly losing their illusions about the GMD and are spontaneously organizing themselves from the bottom up. All this shows the deepening of the workers' class consciousness. Furthermore, the anti-imperialist movement is also developing, awakening not only the working masses but also some of the revolutionary urban petty bourgeoisie to join [the revolution].

As regards the peasant struggle, the bases in the soviet regime preserved until the present time (in the southern provinces) and their few revolutionary armies of workers and peasants will become an ever more important element in the new high tide.

The Sixth Congress also holds that the signs mentioned above should not be overestimated, because even taken together they do not make up a true rising tide, the number of people [now] participating in the struggle is still insufficient, and at present the urban working class has not yet overcome its setbacks.

The degree of consolidation of the reactionary regime in different regions is uneven; therefore, the revolution, in a general new high tide, may succeed first in one or more provinces. At present, there is no revolutionary high tide, and no such successes are possible; but such a prospect is possible. In this respect, the important role of urban leadership and the rising tide of the proletarian masses will show their decisive power and will decide how to turn the slogan "All power to the council of workers', peasants', and soldiers' deputies" into a slogan of direct action.

12. The Task of Winning Over the Masses

The new future high tide requires still more preparation for armed insurrections, and even actual insurrections, as immediate practical tasks for the party—this is the only way to accomplish the bourgeois-democratic revolution and the overthrow of the political regime of the imperialists, gentry, bourgeoisie, and the GMD.

Now is the time to rally and consolidate the proletarian forces; armed insurrection on a national scale remains for the time being a propaganda slogan. [We] should now make the masses realize, in leading them in everyday struggles, that if the GMD-warlord regime is not overthrown, the living conditions of the masses can never improve. Propaganda among the masses should also be carried on continuously.

At present, the first revolutionary wave is over, owing to repeated failures: a new [revolutionary] wave has not yet arrived, and the forces of the reaction are still stronger than those of the workers and peasants. The party's general line is to win over the masses. The party should use all its power to intensify the rallying and unifying of the proletarian masses and rally them around the main slogans of the party; it should engage in stupendous organizational work in order to consolidate the revolutionary unions and peasant associations. [The party] must do its very best to lead [the masses] in daily economic and political struggles in order to expand the mass organizations of workers and peasants. Finally, it is necessary to intensify the [work of] explaining to the proletariat the past experiences of the revolution.

The party should exploit every conflict between workers and capitalists in the factories, between peasants and landlords in the villages, and between soldiers and officers in the military camps. However small these clashes may be, they should be exploited to agitate and penetrate deeper into these class conflicts in order to win the vast masses of workers and peasants to our side. The party must exploit all the imperialists' brutal deeds in China and all slaughter and suppression of the masses by the reactionaries (naturally not calling for armed uprising on every occasion) in order to widen the resistance of the masses and to be in the position of sole leader of the revolutionary movement when the [revolutionary] high tide begins.

The task of winning over the masses is the task of preparing for armed insurrection—because the fulfillment of this task is a prerequisite for a new revolutionary high tide and for the possibility of turning the propaganda slogan of armed insurrection into that of direct practical action.

13. The Danger of Opportunism and Putschism

Winning over the masses depends on the realization by the party of a policy based on correct calculation; [it depends on] the liquidation of ultraleftist errors and sentiments (putschism, military adventurism, individual terrorism) within the party and of the GMD-style erroneous tendency to issue [arbitrary] orders to the masses.

The major dangers are putschism and commandism [mingling zhuyi]; they both alienate the party from the masses.

Putschism, in theory, means a few individuals wishing to attack an obviously far superior enemy by continual military actions, blind and impetuous measures which forsake and ignore the masses. Of course, sometimes it also derives from an overestimate of the rate and degree of disintegration in the counterrevolutionary camp and to neglecting all the prerequisites of insurrection, which is lightheartedly undertaken without serious preparations. A putsch in practical action is an insurrection by a few “party members” without the necessary day-by-day economic and political preparation, a brutal struggle that relies entirely on military strength, in the nature of a military adventure. Naturally, such a putsch usually forces the masses into military insurrection, often resulting in unorganized, sporadic acts of terrorism. This will lower the party’s prestige among the masses and end in the unrequited loss of the vanguard units of the workers and of communism.

Putschism represents class-alienated elements, rural and urban poor (unemployed, bankrupt petty bourgeoisie, some of the revolutionary intelligentsia), and mercenary soldiers who recently joined the revolution; it is an expression of their ideology and [way of] action. It thus shows the influence of the petty bourgeoisie on the working class and contrasts with the characteristics of discipline and organization among the proletariat.

At the same time, the CP must not look down on the poor; they are a great and powerful force in the revolution. The task of the party is to carry out maximum organizational work among these poor masses and raise their political consciousness, especially regarding the urban and rural semiproletarian class. The party must do its utmost to absorb these poor elements into the general revolutionary movement under the leadership of the industrial proletariat. However, the party must also constantly increase its efforts to oppose the influence of petty bourgeois ideology on the working class and the CP.

Besides putschism, there are other dangerous tendencies. Elements in some party organizations, in dealing with some problems, hold views that make the party incline toward the bankrupt peasants, the urban poor, and the lumpenproletariat and alienate it from its proletarian base. For example, there are erroneous notions regarding the relationship between the working class and the peasantry, which falsely conceive of socialism as equalization of property (in villages, equal distribution of land; in the cities, of goods). Also, a tendency to burn down cities has appeared in some peasant uprisings, and leadership by the urban proletariat (of the urban and rural petty bourgeoisie) has been held in low esteem. These tendencies in the party should be firmly opposed.

Furthermore, working merely through commandism is also a dangerous tendency, alienating the party from the masses. The attitude of the party toward the working class would become the gentrylike GMD method of dealing with the masses. Commandism means the direction and compulsion of the masses by commandism without educating or convincing them. Formerly, under opportunism, (the party), on behalf of the GMD, ordered the masses not to act. Now, under putschism, the masses are ordered never to remain inactive in order to oppose the GMD.

Even in the workers' movement such methods have been used, with orders being issued everywhere. Appointments by order of union leaders or leading organs have generally been a top-to-bottom working method. Consequently, cadres were not raised from the masses. Even in party membership drives and in carrying on the labor movement, a method of approaching a few workers' leaders in order to influence their masses was adopted. As a result, genuine mass work was confronted with tremendous obstacles.

A similar tendency exists in party organizational matters, resulting in the unusual shrinkage of intraparty organization and the mere issuing of orders to the membership and to the masses. If such commandism is not resolutely and utterly liquidated, the party cannot become a fighting party capable of leading the masses. Commandism and the winning over of the masses cannot coexist.

Past experiences should enable the party to conquer ultraleftist sentiments and GMD-style commandism. At present an incorrect tendency regarding the question of the petty bourgeoisie may still arise.

Among the tasks of the party, the urban petty bourgeoisie is to be induced to participate in the anti-imperialist, antiwarlord movement. Among the tasks of the party, the peasant masses who own private property (owner-peasants) should also be induced to join the struggle for the confiscation of the landlords' land and against taxation by warlords. [But] misunderstandings of this policy may lead to an even more undesirable tendency; when the movement against rich peasants is not emphasized, too many concessions to the rich peasants in the villages or interference with the revolutionary movement of the workers and urban poor for the sake of compromise with shopkeepers and the petty bourgeoisie will result in subjecting this movement to the leadership of the petty bourgeoisie and actual loss of the [revolutionary] leadership [by the party] in the name of preserving the United Front.

When the interests of the workers and shop employees clash sharply with those of urban shopkeepers and the petty bourgeoisie, or when poor and middle peasants clash with rich peasants in the villages, the CP should always stand with the laborers against the exploiting class.

The Chinese revolution being a semicolonial revolution, the anti-imperialist struggle has a major function [in it]. It is a serious mistake to neglect the developing anti-imperialist movement by not assuming its leadership. Furthermore, class relations in the new stage of the Chinese revolution (soviet stage) are entirely different from what they were in the May 30 period [1925]. The deeper penetration of the revolution calls for greater attention to the anti-imperialist and the antimilitarist struggle of the future, which will result in direct mass action a dozen times more drastic [than the present]. We must not neglect these future prospects. It is a serious error to neglect the anti-imperialist movement and the anti-imperialist struggle of the vast lower strata while wanting to strengthen the opposition to the reactionary classes inside the country.

Furthermore, in the process of intense class differentiation [attendant on] the class struggle, and in the process of a thoroughgoing rural revolution, the most reliable ally of the proletariat in the general revolutionary front of China is no other than the peasantry. Therefore, neglect of the leadership of the peasantry by the proletariat and of the revolutionary role of the peasantry, as well as “tailism” [weiba zhuyi], which follows peasant petty bourgeois ideas, are all very dangerous tendencies.

The above-mentioned tendencies—such as putschism, commandism, the doctrine of equalization of property, conciliationism, neglect of anti-imperialism and of the revolutionary role of the peasantry—are all non-Bolshevik paths.

The Bolshevization of the CCP was assured by opposition to the opportunist leadership and to opportunist tactics. Now [we] must continue the antiopportunist struggle, especially against ultraleftist defections. These so-called leftist dangerous tendencies are only another aspect of the opportunist petty bourgeois ideology which has affected the working class and the CP.

V) The Tasks of the Party

14. Tasks for Inner-Party Work

At present the party's major tasks, after its fighting strength has been weakened by losses owing to defections, are to strengthen its fighting power and to proletarianize itself:

a) Revive destroyed party branches [zhibu] and party departments at all levels. Special attention should be paid to the establishment and development of party branches in big industrial establishments and factories, for they are the major places of assembly for the working-class masses.

b) Actively recruit party members among workers, continue to promote worker-comrades and “activists” to the leading organs of the party, and make sure the leading organs possess the characteristics of the working class. Attention, of course, should also be paid to the correction of any bias and false tendencies in these matters.

c) Realize true democratic centralism [minzhu jizhongzhi]; maximum democracy within the party should be guaranteed within the limits of secrecy; decide important issues through collective discussions and collective decisions; (but) at the same time oppose the tendency toward extreme democracy, because it can destroy party discipline, encourage an attitude of irresponsibility, and damage confidence in the party leadership.

d) Resolve all intraparty disputes and liquidate tendencies toward regionalism and “clique-ism” [xiaotuan zhuyi] because these tendencies damage party unity and lower its fighting power. Abolish the so-called punishment system; a comrade who commits mistakes in work should be corrected and retrained through work, unless he or she insists on upholding his or her mistakes with a system or a line. If a comrade can correct himself after committing an error, he should be given work to demonstrate his having reformed.

e) Intensify the training of party members and of the masses, raise their political level, systematically propagate Marxism-Leninism, and study the lessons of past stages of the Chinese revolution.

f) Intensify propaganda for correct concepts of armed insurrection and for the general task of setting up the regime of councils of workers’, peasants’, and soldiers’ deputies (soviets).

15. The Relations Between the Party and the Working Class and the Question of the Labor Movement

a) The major task of the party is to win over the majority of the working class, secure their active support for the vanguard of the proletariat, the CP, and induce them to believe in the CP and consciously accept its leadership. Full attention should be paid to the labor movement, especially to industrial workers. Only thus can the leadership of the working class over the peasantry be strengthened.

b) In order to accomplish this task, some old false notions concerning the relationship between the party and [the working] class should be corrected immediately. Such false notions seem to hold that the party is a special force standing ahead of the [working] class and is in a position to help and command that class; what is not realized is that the party is only the most conscious and the most advanced element of the working class itself.

c) Firmly oppose compulsion and orders imposed on our own class, [such as] the method of compulsory strikes and compulsory armed uprisings. The Congress holds that such methods are contrary to the interest of the proletariat and of the CP and will ruin the Chinese revolution.

d) The utmost effort should be made to revive revolutionary unions. Party members should join unions that have a real mass following in order to achieve the goal of winning over the laboring masses, even if these unions are reactionary.

e) Work systematically with every effort in various organizations in order to have the working masses discard their illusions about the GMD. Give the masses a detailed explanation of the lessons of the Chinese revolution and the policies and tasks of the CCP.

f) All these are necessary for winning over the masses and should be carried out in the course of the struggle. The leadership of the masses in their daily economic struggles should be greatly strengthened.

16. The Major Tasks of the Party in the Peasant Movement

a) The central slogan of the peasant movement is the confiscation of the landlords' land for disposition by the peasant congress (soviet).

b) The tactical line is [as follows]: the archenemy being the gentry landlords, the basic strength of the proletariat in the villages lies with the poor peasants and the middle peasants. They are solid allies. It is wrong to step up intensely the struggle against the rich peasants because that would confuse the major conflict between the peasants and the landlord class. This, however, does not mean that the class struggle against the rich peasants and the semilandlords is to be abandoned.

c) Support the guerrilla warfare of the peasants and further its penetration [among the masses] and consolidation. Lead the peasants into organized struggle and into the struggle for the conscious establishment of soviet regimes and the carrying out of the rural revolution. Coordinate the peasant movement in rural areas with the struggle of the working class in the cities.

d) It is not only possible but necessary to organize revolutionary armies of workers and peasants in the present guerrilla areas. Because of singular political circumstances, this task is now the central issue in the peasant movement, deserving special attention by the party. The success with which this task is carried out may give an impetus to the growth of a new revolutionary high tide—[it may be] one of the major sources of power determining the new revolutionary high tide.

e) Pay more attention to the mass organizations of the peasants (such as peasant associations, peasant congresses, and peasant secret societies). Consolidate the guiding role of the proletariat in the peasant organizations.

f) Support and give leadership to the peasant masses' partial demands in refusing to pay taxes, rent, and debts, and in demanding rent-reduction, etc., so as to organize the vast peasant masses.

17. The Party's Task in the Soviet Areas

In the past, the error of neglecting the development and expansion of revolutionary areas was committed in many of the soviet areas. There was also an erroneous tendency to supplant the soviet by the party.

Henceforth our tasks are:

a) To expand the soviet bases and to capture and consolidate new areas which will serve as bases for further expansion.

- b) To develop, with maximum effort, a regular revolutionary army of workers and peasants—the Red Army.
- c) To carry out fully the party's rural program.
- d) To set up soviet regimes and to induce the broad masses to participate in their administration.
- e) To liquidate resolutely counterrevolutionary plots and to wipe out completely the political and economic power of the ruling class.
- f) To protect commodity transactions in business and to overcome any tendency toward equalization of property (i.e., the tendency to split up for equal distribution the property of the petty bourgeoisie, small merchants, artisans, etc.). Such a procedure will accentuate economic disruption and upset the soviet regime. But [we] should realize that sabotage by shopkeepers and the petty bourgeoisie is possible; and proper preventive measures should be taken. There must be a correct economic policy.
- g) To guarantee, to the highest possible degree, coordination with neighboring cities and the workers' movement.
- h) When the soviet regime can be extended to the urban centers, the livelihood of the working class must be thoroughly improved. Every means must be used to induce the laboring masses to participate actively in the soviets and to realize the leadership of the proletariat in the soviets.

18. The Anti-Imperialist and the Antiwarlord Struggles

a) Fight actively for the leadership of the anti-imperialist and antimilitarist struggles. Induce the vast laboring masses and the petty bourgeois masses to participate [in these struggles]. Expose the guilt of the national bourgeoisie, which supports the imperialists. Coordinate the struggle against imperialism with that against the warlords and the GMD government. Actively lead the masses of soldiers and poor petty bourgeoisie to fight a harsh struggle against the warlords.

b) In [the course of] the anti-imperialist movement, fight openly or secretly for the existence of the revolutionary unions. Boldly demand freedom for the mass movement, and show initiative in translating this freedom into action.

c) Utilize the slogans against the imperialists, those against the oppression of warlords, and the slogans for maximum tax and surtax reductions. By fighting against usury (through the establishment of credit, producers' and consumers' cooperatives), do not alienate the vast majority of people who do not exploit others, such as the laboring petty bourgeoisie of the cities; propagandize them and coordinate their organizations with the proletariat. Make them understand that it is necessary, after the victory of the revolution, that society should organize them for collective production.

19. On the Question of [Our] Relationship with Other Parties

a) [[All GMD groups are reactionary. The major task of our party with respect to the GMD is to prepare for its overthrow. Parties such as the “Third Party” [of Tan Pingshan and Deng Yanda] must be opposed as they blur the workers and peasants’ class consciousness.]]

20. The Military Question and the Soldiers’ Movement

The high significance of military power in the Chinese revolution, the great necessity of preparing for military techniques in armed uprising, and the coming of a new revolutionary rising tide oblige the CCP to pay special attention to the military question and to the soldiers’ movement.

The tasks of the party are (as follows):

a) To extend the movement against the warlords’ wars; to break up the armies of the warlords; to bend all efforts toward winning their soldiers for the revolutionary camp; to raise such slogans as “Soldiers should get land or work,” “Improve the livelihood and treatment of the soldiers”; and to stir up mass struggles of the soldiers.

b) To establish revolutionary armies of workers and peasants in the soviet areas; to expand the regular army of the revolution; and to consolidate the party’s leadership of the army.

c) To intensify the military training of workers and party members as much as possible and to establish, with utmost effort, secret military units for the workers’ self-defense (pickets, etc.).

d) To train military personnel in the party, and to raise the most reliable officers from workers and party members.

e) To intensify [party] work among workers connected with military affairs (such as munitions factories, etc.), and among transport and communications workers. Systematically coordinate the above work with that in the armies.

f) To begin systematic work of sabotage among the imperialists’ naval and land forces stationed in China. Special attention should be paid to the soldiers’ movement among the Indian and Indo-Chinese soldiers.

21. The Question of Liaison Between the CCP and the CPs of Other Countries

[[To improve liaison, reports should be regularly exchanged, CCP delegations should visit other parties for consultations. Liaison with the Japanese CP should be strengthened.]]

The Sixth Congress of the CCP entirely accepts the resolution of the Ninth ECCI Meeting on the China question, which also forms the basis of this resolution. These two resolutions are to be regarded simultaneously as the principles by which all policy is to be guided during this period.

C.11 Resolution on the Question of the Organization of Soviet Political Power (10 July 1928)⁹⁶

I) Work in Preparation for the Establishment of Soviet Political Power

The party's essential task in preparing for uprisings lies in creating prerequisite conditions for maintaining and strengthening the political power of the soviets. After seizing political power in certain areas, the party's main difficulty is precisely the problem of maintaining and consolidating this political power. Therefore, apart from winning over the masses to participation in uprisings, the party should take all necessary measures beforehand to organize the nuclei of future political power in the cities and countryside so that these nuclei can prepare for various necessary actions after the seizure of political power. This nuclear organization will become the organization of state power after the seizure of state power. Its significance has already been pointed out by Lenin in his pamphlet Can the Bolsheviks Retain State Power? Lenin said: "If the creative enthusiasm of the revolutionary classes had not given rise to the soviets, the proletarian revolution in Russia would have been a hopeless cause, for the proletariat certainly could not retain power with the old state apparatus, and it is impossible to create a new apparatus immediately."

The entire course of the Chinese revolution has already shown us that there is little possibility for repetition in China of a situation of "dual power" like that in Russia prior to the October Revolution (the soviets on the one hand, and the provisional government on the other). On the eve of the October Revolution, the nucleus of the revolutionary regime did coexist with the old regime. However, it will be difficult to achieve this in China. Moreover, we expect that a new regime will appear immediately after the uprisings and the seizure of state power by the workers and peasants. This means that the situation will be different from that in Russia in 1917, when the soviets could openly exist before [the October Revolution]. Therefore, the CCP must, on the one hand, take necessary measures to establish secretly nuclei of state power in advance and, on the other hand, take necessary measures to ensure that, after revolts, organizations of state power can be established resolutely and quickly.

The C[C] should make use of the experience in establishing soviets and widely extend this experience to party members and the broad masses so as to prepare cadres in advance for the prompt establishment of a state apparatus. The party should enunciate in advance, extensively and clearly, the theory of soviets in areas that have been chosen for revolt and should propagandize all concrete forms and concrete tasks of the soviet regime so that the people in given areas will be prepared for revolts and be able to establish the soviets quickly. Apart from propaganda work, the party should carry out organizational work. Here we may follow the example of Shanghai in making secret selections of members to the Assembly of the People's Representatives before the seizure of political power. However, it is difficult to say whether it will be possible to make selections to political organizations in this way under present clandestine conditions in China. Probably, suitable conditions will not exist. Therefore, in every enterprise and on every street, through party branches, party members, or reliable workers, the party should prepare cadres to elect soviets and become government representatives, in these areas, enterprises, and streets. The party should draft in advance the general plan for the division of work of the future revolutionary committee [geming weiyuanhui] and the directives to be issued in the near future. The party should dispatch representatives to various large villages to carry out the work of organizing local governments. These representatives should make contact with the peasant associations, guerrilla forces, and active and prestigious peasants and should make them control political power in their areas and join the local revolutionary committees. [The party] must ensure absolutely its influence among these elements in order to organize revolutionary committees.

The formal name of the soviet should be the soviet of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies (in rural areas it may be abbreviated to Soviet of Peasants' Deputies). The formal name of the state power of the Chinese soviets should be the Government of the Chinese Soviets of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies.

II) The Task of Seizing Political Power

The basic task after seizing political power lies in establishing a state organ that can ensure the existence of the new regime and the implementation of its revolutionary policies. It would be wrong to regard this organ as merely a technical organization for the execution of resolutions of the Soviets of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies. The tasks and functions of this organ are much broader than those of a technical organization. [[Lenin said that apart from the 1 million who have voted for us we have a "magic weapon" the capitalists could never possess. This is to draw the working people and the poor into the state administration. Revolutionary democracy is needed to ease the burdens of war, and revolutionary methods of distribution must be employed. The oppressed and the working people must believe in their own strength.]]

III) The Soviet and the Revolutionary Committee

Before the organization of the formal Council of Deputies (soviet), the initial form of political power is provisional, that is, the revolutionary committee. The revolutionary committee must be composed of the representatives of the various organizations taking part in preparing for [a given] uprising. At the very beginning of our work, we must distinguish clearly the responsibilities of the committee and of the staff headquarters of the uprising [baodong zan moubu]. The staff headquarters of the uprising should accept the direction of the revolutionary committee and should be capable of quickly being converted into a headquarters of the Red Army [Hongjun silingbu], which commands all military activities in its region, prepares the mobilization of the workers, organizes military supply and other needs of the Red Army, and safeguards general matters in its region. As to the revolutionary committee, it should be converted immediately into an organization of political power to meet the general needs of the people. On the first day of its establishment, the revolutionary committee should announce the establishment of the new political power and start to organize the regime of the formal Council of Deputies.

The revolutionary committee is a provisional government; the "Council of Deputies" (soviet) is a formal government.

The revolutionary committee is like a committee preparing for [the establishment of] the "Council of Deputies." It should immediately prepare for the convening of the inaugural meeting of the "Council of Deputies," which symbolizes the establishment of the formal government. The composition of the revolutionary committee must guarantee absolutely the fulfillment of party directives. Elements having influence among the soldiers or the local people must be allowed to take part in the revolutionary committee. However, if after their entrance into the revolutionary committee they cannot firmly safeguard the organization of our party, then from the very first day we must take measures to isolate them and prepare various means of expelling them from the revolutionary committee at the appropriate time. The revolutionary committee should take various measures to establish contact with the masses and prepare for the establishment of the regime of the Council of Deputies. Therefore, the revolutionary committee should, at regular intervals, convene meetings of the workers', peasants' (poor peasants'), and soldiers' deputies and report to them its own work. It should utilize members of these meetings to implement and encourage the fulfillment of its resolutions. The revolutionary committee should also report its work at general meetings of the broad masses of workers, peasants, and handicraft workers in its region. After the regularly operating government of the formal Soviet of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies has been established, political power in that region will then be consolidated and can win over sufficient and real support of the people and allow the people to guarantee the revolutionary composition and policies of the soviet of deputies.

IV) Organization of the Red Army

On the first day that the revolutionary regime is established, we must try to organize the Red Army, using the troops taking part in a given revolt as the basis of a regular Red Army. With the help of the trade unions and the peasant associations, the revolutionary committee must organize a regular Red Army with the troops taking part in the revolt. It should also enlist the revolutionary elements of the peasant associations and the trade unions to become the Red Army's future cadres, the most reliable cornerstone of the Red Army. Troop recruitment should start with unmarried youths. When the Red Army has just been established, it can only recruit the general revolutionary elements, that is, members of the party, the CYL, the trade unions, and the peasant associations and reliable strong persons. After it is set up, it will carry out conscription, setting age limits for drafting soldiers into the Red Army. (This concerns only young men.) The conscript soldiers should live in barracks.

The existing guerrilla troops that take part in a given uprising should also use the same method of recruitment. The officers and political workers should be reorganized into a regular Red Army.

V) Composition of the Military Officers and Political Workers

[[Military commanders must come from among the workers and peasants. Military training courses should be set up immediately by the revolutionary committee. We can make use of men from the old armies to be officers, but for the most part they should be drawn from the low-ranking officers. In the political department, only CCP members can hold staff and commissar positions.]]

VI) Political Work in the Army

Within the army we should organize party branches and CYL cells. The latter should be under the direct control of the former. In order to guide political work, political departments should be organized. The political department should not limit itself to work within the army and agitation among the people but should also organize revolutionary regimes in various regions at the front lines. Therefore, within the political department, political affairs divisions should be established.

In various regions at the front lines, the directives of the political departments should be the highest political authority. The revolutionary committee and the political department should prepare the foundations for soviets within their region.

VII) Supplies and Services for the Army

[[Military headquarters should work with the local revolutionary committee to organize military supply organizations for their region. The rich peasants will be called on first to supply coolie labor.]]

VIII) The Struggle to Oppose Counterrevolution

In the cities we should arrange for special organizations to struggle against counterrevolutionaries. Under these organizations there must be special troops organized by the workers. We must study the past experience of the terror in Canton. Although the terror in Canton was extreme, it was somewhat unsystematic. During the terror, only the counterrevolutionary lackeys were killed, but not their chiefs. Although many were killed in Canton, military leaders and counterrevolutionary leaders in Canton were completely unharmed. Terror must be systematic; it should strike at counterrevolutionary leaders. On the first day of the victory of a given uprising, the organization for opposing counterrevolution should arrest several dozen or several hundred leaders of the local bourgeois landlords, warlords, and vagabonds as hostages; at the same time, it should announce to all people that these hostages must be responsible for local peace and order. In the villages, they should arrest some landlords and gentry as hostages.

The organizations for opposing counterrevolution should register the guns possessed by the people in order to prepare for an unanticipated collection. On the first day of the victory of a given uprising, we must disarm the merchants' corps, vagabonds, and bandits. All those who hide weapons should be put to death. On the first day, the organizations for opposing counterrevolution should carry out registration of the people and gather statistics on those who have been in military service or who have worked in military organizations, because there is a possibility that in the future these may become cadres of the troops that oppose the uprising of the soviet regime. All organizations of the local gentry, big merchants, and landlords should be dissolved. Any attempt by the reactionary elements to form any organization should be punished severely.

The struggle against counterrevolution in the countryside should be carried out by special peasant self-defense organizations. Members of the peasant associations, those who take part in the uprising, and reliable rural elements all can join the peasant self-defense organizations (village militia). Their responsibility is to maintain order, to suppress bandits and counterrevolution. In the cities, the common people's militia should be organized, but the police will not be allowed to serve in the militia.

IX) Our Relationship with Military Groups Before the Soviet Regime Is Established

[[We should completely reorganize, or at least remove, officers and political workers of the surrendered troops.]]

X) Our Relationship with Bandits

[[Before a given uprising, we can form an alliance with bandits. After the uprising, we should disarm them and eliminate their chiefs.]]

XI) Our Relationship with Superstitious and Semisuperstitious Peasants' Armed Organizations (Red Spears, etc.)

[[We should win over the masses, isolate their chiefs, and take advantage of any opportunity to reorganize them.]]

XII) Militia

[[Expel their officers and send their troops to fight in the front lines.]]

XIII) Realization of the Uprisings' Slogans

On the first day of its establishment, the revolutionary committee should promulgate a land law and directives that will improve the lives of the workers and peasants. In addition, it should arrange for specialized organizations to implement these directives. During the initial period, the implementation of these directives is particularly important. On the first day, the revolutionary committee should provide the workers and peasants with practical benefits, such as confiscating the houses and clothing of the rich and distributing them among the poor masses and providing relief to the unemployed workers. Before promulgating these directives in its region, in order to make these directives correspond with the slogans of the uprising, it should consider them carefully.

In order to consolidate our financial resources, we should immediately confiscate the properties of the landlords and warlords [living] in the cities. First, we should nationalize the banks. This is a powerful weapon for controlling finance and the market. The following matters should also be carried out immediately: the replacement of the trust bonds of the old banks with the trust system of the new government; an accounting of the capital of the local bourgeoisie; the complete centralization of the power of financial control in the hands of the government; an accounting of the total sum of silver, copper, and other currencies; the prohibition of the export of cash outside the soviet areas; the severe punishment of violators by the organizations opposing counterrevolution.

Governmental organizations should immediately try to strengthen the finances of the soviets. In order to achieve this goal, we may demand temporary contributions from well-to-do families, confiscate the properties of the counterrevolutionaries, and carry out a system of progressive income taxation. The soviet regime should take into consideration beforehand the possibility of economic resistance by the bourgeoisie. Therefore it should set down various measures in advance, such as organization of supplies, establishment of cooperatives, establishment of national stores, etc., and should supervise them itself.

XIV) Workers' Control

[[Where the workers are in control, a fair tax system may replace confiscation. Workers' control must be carried out through organizations of the laboring masses. The people's economic department [guomin jingjibu] should be set up to manage all economic matters in a given region.]]

The slogan of implementing control by the proletariat has a very great significance. In an essay, Lenin said: "The important thing will not be even the confiscation of the capitalists' property, but nationwide, all-embracing workers' control over the capitalists and their possible supporters. Confiscation alone leads nowhere, as it does not contain the element of organization, of accounting for proper distribution. Instead of confiscation, we could easily impose a fair tax, . . . taking care, of course, to preclude the possibility of anyone evading assessment, concealing the truth, or evading the law. And this possibility can be eliminated only by the workers' control of the workers' state."

2) Control of workers must be carried out through the organizations of the toiling masses.

Control of workers must be carried out through the trade unions, the factory committees, the unions of handicraft workers, and other organized toiling masses in general.

3) Establish an economic department to manage various aspects of the economy.

Furthermore, we must establish an appropriate organization to manage and control all economic matters in a given region and to make an accounting of all economic resources in the region. This organization is the people's economic department. This department should have the broad worker masses participate in its work, and its staff should be elected from among the workers in large factories. The people's economic department should make an accounting of all economic resources, factories, enterprises, and workshops and should call on the workers in general to carry out the control of these economic activities.

XV) Organization of the Soviets

Once local political power is consolidated, the soviet should be organized immediately. The party committee should estimate local conditions and appraise the opportunity for organizing the soviet. Before and after a given uprising, however, the party should make various preparations for organizing the soviet. The soviet should be organized on the basis of direct election by the laboring masses. Certainly it should not be like that in Canton (where in fact there was only a revolutionary committee and no soviet), which comprised representatives of only the higher organizations. Election should be carried out by factory workers, various street workers and the poor, union workers, handicraft workers (by general meetings of handicraft workers and not by the executive committees of trade unions), and students. It should include also local lower-strata organizations, trade unions, and party representatives. The distribution of the composition of representatives should enable the majority of those being elected directly to be the workers and the poor. Furthermore, election regulations are determined by local conditions so as to protect the revolutionary influence in the soviet. Strategy toward the petty bourgeoisie should depend on the extent of the intensification of the revolution at various places, the extent of the consolidation of [our] political power, the extent of class divisions, etc. The soviet should include representatives of the lower-strata elements of the petty bourgeoisie. The soldiers of the revolutionary army stationed at a given place should also participate in the election of the soviet. In the election of the soviet and in the execution of its work, the industrial workers should have some privileges so as to guarantee their leadership function in the soviet.

We must remember well Lenin's following definition of the soviets:

The soviets are a new state apparatus which, in the first place, provide an armed force of workers and peasants; and this force is not divorced from the people, as was the old standing army, but is very closely bound up with the people. From the military point of view this force is incomparably more powerful than previous forces; from the revolutionary point of view, it cannot be replaced by anything else. Second, this apparatus provides a bond with the people, with the majority of the people, so intimate, so indissoluble, so easily verifiable and renewable, that nothing even remotely like it existed in the previous state apparatus. Third, this apparatus, by virtue of the fact that its personnel are elected and subject to recall at the people's will without any bureaucratic formalities, is far more democratic than any previous apparatus. Fourth, it provides a close contact with the most varied professions, thereby facilitating the adoption of the most varied and most radical reforms without red tape. Fifth, it provides an organizational form for the vanguard, i.e., for the most class-conscious, most energetic, and most progressive section of the oppressed classes, the workers and peasants, and so constitutes an apparatus by means of which the vanguard of the oppressed classes can elevate, train, educate, and lead the entire vast mass of these classes, which has up to now stood completely outside of political life and history. Sixth, it makes it possible to combine the advantages of the parliamentary system with those of immediate and direct democracy, i.e., to vest in the people's elected representatives both legislative and executive functions. Compared to the bourgeois parliamentary system, this is an advance in democracy's development which is of worldwide historic significance. . . . The soviets will be able to develop properly, to display their potentialities and capabilities to the full only by taking over full state power; for otherwise they have nothing to do; otherwise they are either simply embryos (and to remain an embryo too long is fatal), or play-things. "Dual power" means paralysis for the soviets.

This definition by Lenin explains very clearly the functions of the soviets in the past and present. From the above, we may also realize the relationships between the soviet system and other organizations.

Deputies (councilors) of the soviets (Councils of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies) should be mentioned in connection with the work of the soviets: implementation of the resolutions of the soviets or supervision of the implementation of the resolutions.

The soviets should not be general meetings of the masses such as the Shanghai Municipal Assembly was in the past. Nor should they be like the Canton Soviet, which resulted in an organization guided directly by its high-level leaders only. The reason the Canton Soviet was this way was that it was narrowly based (it had fourteen to sixteen members).

From the first day of its establishment, the soviet regime should rally the broad toiling masses to oppose any faults that managers of the soviet regime may commit, such as bureaucratism, tardiness in management, arrogation of power, etc.

The soviet plans the major policies for given places and for the entire nation. In order to increase the general efficiency of its members, it should establish various departments to carry out various duties:

- a) department of military affairs—organizes the defense forces and the Red Army;
- b) department of finance—takes charge of the confiscation of properties and of their disposal;
- c) department of municipal administration—manages schools, water works, relief for the sick, etc.;
- d) department of social security—[concerns] labor laws and distribution of good housing to the poor people and the work of the workers and peasants;
- e) department of the people's economy.

Soviet deputies should report their work to their electors at regular intervals. The electors have the right to remove former deputies and replace them with new ones. A city soviet should include the peasants in its suburbs and the peasants' representatives of the entire region so as to make itself the revolutionary nucleus of that rural area. In order to carry out revolutionary work in the cities, it should elect an executive committee including the representatives of important organizations in that city or that region: the army, the trade unions, and persons who suppress the counterrevolution and supply necessary goods. The number of members of the executive committee should range from eleven to twenty-seven. A standing committee should be elected from the executive committee, which is virtually the actual government in that given locality. The number of members of the standing committee ranges from approximately five to seven.

All party fractions [dangtuan] of these organs absolutely must fulfill the directives of the party. All their major policies must be approved by the party committee in the given area.

XVI) Relations of the Soviets to the Trade Unions, the Uprising Headquarters, the Revolutionary Army, etc.

[[The soviet should be a real political power. We must not repeat the mistake in Shanghai of March 1927 when the municipal assembly was not a real political power. Real power was with the unions and the General Headquarters of the Workers' Pickets. The trade unions became a new form of political power thus losing their links to the workers' economic struggles. We should attack the "yellow" unions and win over their membership. In Canton, we made the mistake of treating their leaders and members the same. The Workers' Pickets and the headquarters of the Red Army should obey the soviets.]]

XVII) Relations Between the Soviets and the Party

In the soviets at various places, the party must have party and league organizations. By means of these party and league organizations—through statements of party members—the party's opinion on various questions of soviet work is expressed. At any time and any place, the party should act as the ideological leader of the soviets, and it should not limit its own influence. However, the party should take precautions against the danger of either replacing the soviets with the party or replacing the party with the soviets. The party should plan ahead to guarantee its leadership function in the organs of the soviets. Therefore, the party should organize prestigious and efficient party and league [fractions] within the soviets to carry out party directives. However, it would be dangerous if the local party fractions were to replace the party and the league. The party and the league [fractions] only implement party directives. When the balanced influence of the party and the league and the local party headquarters cannot be maintained, and the functions of the latter are comparatively minor, the danger of replacing the party with the soviets will arise. During the first few years following the Russian Revolution, the function of the party in some places was reduced to a minimum. This experience must be taken into account. In China, as well, there exists the danger of replacing the party with the soviets. The correct organization of the soviet regime must be based on the condition of the party's firm leadership. In order to achieve this goal, we must pay attention to the organizational behavior of the party and should not allow it to show any sign of softness. Therefore, the comrades who work at the party headquarters should not be weaker than those who work in the soviets. Under any conditions, by means of the comrades [working] in the soviets and other organizations, the party should promote and consolidate the party's influence openly within the soviets and in the work of the soviets.

XVIII) Organization of the State Apparatus in the Villages

When an uprising occurs in a given village, a revolutionary committee should be organized in the same region. The organization of the committee should be determined by the local party headquarters before the uprising. The revolutionary committee must absorb the most resolute revolutionary leaders of the peasant movement, particularly the industrial workers living in the villages and the workers who are originally from the cities or have returned from the cities. These industrial workers are a mainstay in the party's work in rural areas. Therefore, the party should be very careful in utilizing every worker to work for the revolutionary committee.

We should choose areas affected by the revolutionary movement of the broad masses of peasants and rural workers as the sites of the revolutionary committees. These workers can be particularly resolute in advocating various revolutionary policies and can be the most reliable base of the CP. It is even more important to have a foundation for revolutionary committees in the peasant associations. The revolutionary committees should become the revolutionary power by basing themselves on the peasant associations. They should not make the peasant associations the political power. (In form, the revolutionary committee should be elected by the peasant associations before a given revolt.) The work of the revolutionary committee among the people of its region, particularly among members of the peasant association, should be as easily understandable as possible. In order to avoid any conflict between the peasant association and the revolutionary committee, leaders of the peasant association may be included in the revolutionary committee, and all those who are responsible for the peasant association should be absorbed into governmental organizations. The leadership function in the revolutionary committee of the peasants who take active part in a given revolt should be protected.

Once local political power, particularly political power in the cities, is consolidated, the soviet elected by all the laboring peasants in the region should replace the revolutionary committee and should carry on its regular work. The rural workers and the laboring elements in the region should have special and additional deputies [to the soviet].

The standing committee elected by the soviet should include the most important leaders of the region. This naturally will further protect the party's influence in the standing committee.

The administrative center of the soviet regime does not have to be at the site of the former government. (Such places always have many local bureaucrats.) We should select a place that offers better protection for the revolutionary influence of the workers and peasants.

If it is in a small city where there are no workers, then the city soviet should be united with the peasant soviet in the suburbs so that the leadership function of the soviet can belong to the poor peasants.

XIX) The Peasant Association and the Soviet [[Conflict between the peasant association and the revolutionary committee should be avoided. The peasant association is the basis of the revolutionary committee. Where no peasant associations exist, soviets should be organized directly.]]

XX) The Party Organization in the Soviet Areas

In the soviet areas, the work of the party itself and the majority of the party members themselves should be known to the public in general. Only a small organization should be kept secret. In its composition, the party should expand itself to become a mass organization. But it should be very strict in absorbing [new] party members. In the soviet areas, it is possible as well as necessary to eliminate the rich peasants and villains who have hidden themselves. The workers and rural workers who have taken part in a revolt should be given preference in joining the party.

The party should pay special attention to the organization of the peasants and workers, because they are the essential supporters of the party's policies in the villages. The party should always have prepared measures that it may be necessary to take in a retreat, and it should preserve its operating power and plan ahead to establish secret party headquarters and the workers and peasants' organizations.

XXI) Expansion of the Soviet Areas

[[The soviets must unceasingly broaden their own territories, either by military expansion or by striving to aid armed insurrections in neighboring regions. However, parochialism and regionalism should be avoided.]]

C.12 Resolution on the Peasant Question (9 July 1928)⁹⁷

I) The Development of the Peasant Movement at Present

[[The living conditions of the peasantry are deteriorating daily with the result that class contradictions in the countryside are intensifying drastically. At present, the peasant movement has a local and unbalanced nature caused by the looseness and disorganization of the peasant masses and the lack of centralized leading organs of the CCP within it. In south China, the struggle centers on opposing landlords, obtaining land, and fighting for political power. In north China, the struggle centers on opposition to warlords, bureaucrats, and gentry exploitation and aims at the overthrow of the warlords' political power.]]

II) Class Differentiation in the Villages and the CCP's Tactical Line

1) The more advanced the peasants' struggle, the more glaring the class contradiction. The experience of the peasant movement in the past teaches that in the struggle against warlords, landlords, gentry, and other forms of feudal exploitation, it may be possible for the whole peasantry to form a united front politically. When the movement advances and develops, however, a class conflict arises extremely rapidly between the rural proletariat and rural bourgeoisie, between poor and rich peasants, especially at the time of land redistribution after the victory of the uprising.

2) The characteristics of Chinese rich peasants and [our] tactics concerning them. In the course of the peasant movement, the attitude of the rich peasants often has been defeatist, neutral, or hostile, and they finally have joined the counterrevolutionary camp. This is owing to the characteristic of the Chinese rich peasants who employ [both] capitalist and precapitalist, semifeudal modes of exploitation. They usually engage in exploiting hired laborers in agricultural, as well as in industrial and commercial, enterprises; or at the same time they rent out a part of their land to exploit the tenants in the usual cruel manner, or else exploit the poor peasants through usury. The party must anticipate that the peasants will inevitably continue to differentiate into subclasses and the rich peasants will inevitably join the counterrevolutionary camp. Therefore (the party) should prepare, at the beginning of the peasant movement, for the struggle at the next stage.

In places where the rich peasants have already become reactionary forces, the struggle against rich peasants should be carried on simultaneously with the struggle against warlords, landlords, and gentry.

As long as the rich peasants have not yet lost their revolutionary potentialities, as long as they struggle against the oppression of warlords and bureaucrats, the CCP should endeavor to absorb rich peasants into the struggle against warlords, landlords, and gentry. Where the rich peasants waver between revolution and counterrevolution, the party, so far as the struggle of poor peasants and hired farmhands is not handicapped, should not intensify the struggle against the rich peasants, thus driving them all the more quickly into the counterrevolutionary camp and making them aggressive enemies of the revolution. The task of our party at the present stage is to neutralize this type of rich peasant in order to reduce the strength of the enemy; but the struggle of the poor peasants and hired farmhands should be carried on simultaneously, and no concession should be made to the rich peasants for the sake of the united front.

3) The alliance with the middle peasants is the main condition guaranteeing the success of the rural revolution. The main forces of the rural revolution are the poor peasants and rural proletariat struggling under the leadership of the working class, and the alliance with the middle peasants is the chief factor guaranteeing the success of the revolution. The CCP platform of confiscating the land of all landlords for distribution among landless peasants or peasants with small landholdings will win the support of the numerous middle peasants, because the middle peasants are themselves a part of the masses oppressed by the landlords and other feudal exploiters.

4) The tactical line of the CCP at the present stage of the revolution. At the present stage of the revolution, the major tactic of the CCP should be to create a united front which would embrace the overwhelming majority of the peasant masses, from hired farmhands to middle peasants who are exploited by the feudal remnants. Under all circumstances, special attention should be paid to the work among poor peasants, preventing the rich peasants from seizing the leadership in peasant organizations, and consolidating the ideological and organizational leadership of poor peasants and hired hands.

III) The Problem of Equal Distribution of Land

1) [The CCP] should support the slogan of equal distribution of land but should also criticize it. In the areas where there are many unemployed and poor peasants, a movement for "equal distribution of land" is bound to arise. If this slogan is supported by the majority of the peasant masses, the CCP should support it. For it is a slogan that leads to the complete liquidation of all feudal remnants and delivers a direct blow to the system of private property.

At the same time, however, this slogan is an illusion of petty bourgeois socialism. The party must criticize it in order to make the peasants understand fully that under the present capitalist system real equality is absolutely impossible. Only after the victory of the proletarian revolution will a truly socialistic reconstruction be feasible.

2) "Equal distribution of land" should not be applied forcibly in the areas where middle peasants constitute a majority. In areas where middle peasants and small landowners constitute the majority of the rural population, "equal distribution of land" will decidedly contravene the interests of the numerous middle peasants, and it is emphasized that it should not be enforced.

IV) The Rural Proletariat

1) The rural proletariat must have its own organization and platform. The proletariat and semiproletarian classes are the foundation of the party in the countryside. To organize the rural proletariat (hired farmhands), to map out a clear platform, and to lead it in its class struggle will be the urgent tasks of the CCP in the villages. The peasant movement in the southern provinces is already led by the poor peasants. In the peasant organization in these areas, cells of hired farmhands should be organized so that the leadership of hired farmhands in the peasant organization can be strengthened. In the areas where a rich-peasant economy and landlord economy already exist, it is better to set up an independent organization of the rural proletariat (the union of hired farmhands). [The union] should also join the peasant associations and establish liaison with the county (xian) workers' union. If no independent organizations [for the hired farmhands] are set up, there should at least be strong cells of hired farmhands within the peasant organizations of mixed elements. Workers in the handicraft industries may join the hired farmhands' union. Work should also be strengthened among the immigrants to Manchuria and Inner Mongolia because they are all landless peasants from various provinces migrating there as farm workers.

V) The Functions of Women in the Peasant Movement

In the struggle of the peasant movement toward victory, it is very important to absorb peasant women into the struggle. They participate directly in the economy of the village, constitute an important element among the hired farmhands, and play a very important role in the life of the peasants. Therefore it is imperative that they join the movement. The experiences of the peasant movement in many areas in the past show that peasant women are the bravest participants among the struggling peasants. Scorning absorption of peasant women into the movement will definitely result in the failure of the rural revolution. The main task of the party is to recognize peasant women as extremely active participants in the revolution and to absorb as many as we can into all the revolutionary organizations of the peasants, especially the peasant associations and soviets.

VI) The Functions of Youth in the Peasant Movement

[[The peasant youth have played a tremendous role in the rural revolution, and we should strengthen their role.]]

VII) Publicize the Land Policy [of the Party] and Local Demands

[[The CCP must popularize its land policy and coordinate it with the special conditions of various localities.]]

VIII) Peasant Associations and Other Peasant Organizations

1) The [CCP] should do its best to enlarge and consolidate the organization of peasant associations. In the last few months, in the peasant movement in southern and central China, the organization and leadership of peasant associations have shown signs of decomposing. This is because the mode of peasant struggle has shifted to a more radical guerrilla warfare, thus lacking a close liaison with the broad masses. Peasant associations in the provinces of central and southern China have been revolutionary organizations with a long history, leaving a deep impression among the peasant masses. The CCP should work for the expansion and consolidation of the peasant associations, rally the hundreds of thousands of peasants, and lead their struggle to prepare for the coming of a new revolutionary high tide. The peasant associations should retain their characteristics as broad organizations of the peasants and use the slogan of rural revolution to mobilize the peasant masses. In the villages ruled by reactionary forces, the peasant associations should take the form of illegal organizations, leading the peasants in various forms of struggles—ranging from resistance to rent and tax collection, or the killing of gentry and landlords, to the preparations for armed revolt. The organization of the peasant associations should be as democratic as possible. The practice of appointment of the executive members of the peasant associations by the party should be corrected, making the peasant associations true organizations of the masses.

2) The peasant associations and the soviets. Since the peasant associations serve as executive organs leading the masses in revolt, they naturally should become the core of the new regime of "peasant deputies' committees" (soviets) after the victory of the revolt. After the establishment of the soviet regime, all political and economic power in the villages should be concentrated in the hands of the soviets.

3) Tactics concerning the Red Spear Society, the Big Sword Society, etc. In many places, the Red Spear Society, the Big Sword Society, etc. are very powerful among the peasant masses. Their leadership is usually in the hands of the gentry, landlords, and rich peasants. But these organizations do possess the characteristics of being close to the masses and against the warlords, thus performing, objectively, revolutionary functions. Our party must continue to strengthen its work among the lower strata of the masses in order to seize the leadership in these organizations. Also it must propagate the major slogans of our party among the poor and middle peasants in these organizations and gradually change their nature.

4) Organizing peasant associations and other organizations. In addition, it is necessary to further the organization of peasant associations. If, in some places, the peasant associations are not supported by the masses, then other names or temporary organizations can be used. Or if it better suits local conditions, peasant organizations already in existence should be utilized (such as the Antiwarlord League, Tax Resisting League, etc.).

IX) Guerrilla Warfare

1) The party must actively lead guerrilla warfare, which will be the chief instrument of struggle. In places where the class struggle has reached an intensive stage, every minor struggle for livelihood leads to armed conflict. Thus guerrilla warfare has become the chief instrument of struggle in these places. Therefore the CCP must actively and resolutely lead these struggles, giving them better organization and closer liaison with the masses as a whole.

2) The major tasks of guerrilla warfare, the realization of the slogans of the rural struggle, etc. The major tasks of guerrilla warfare are: first, the immediate realization of the slogans of the rural struggle (such as confiscation of the land of the landlords for distribution among the peasants, killing of oppressive gentry and landlords, setting up of peasant committees and village soviets, etc.) in order to mobilize more peasant masses to join the fighting front of the revolutionary struggle; second, the setting up of the Red Army! The brave young fighters, particularly those of proletarian and semiproletarian background, should be gradually absorbed, during the course of guerrilla fighting, into the guerrilla units in order to expand them gradually into a worker-peasant revolutionary Red Army; third, the weakening of the strength of the reactionary elements (through such methods as the confiscation of the firearms of the village guards, of the police forces, etc.).

3) The weaknesses of guerrilla warfare: looseness, lack of close liaison with the masses, destruction of cities and villages, wanton killing and destruction. In the course of guerrilla warfare in the past, many weaknesses and undesirable tendencies were discovered. These weaknesses and tendencies will hamper or even destroy the effectiveness of guerrilla warfare and therefore must be corrected. First, the conduct of guerrilla warfare separated from the masses has the effect of making them misunderstand the meaning of guerrilla warfare, or even responsive to the propaganda of the landlords that guerrilla warfare is banditry. Hence, from now on, guerrilla warfare must begin with the spontaneous demand of the masses and must be carried on simultaneously with propaganda and agitation work. Second, the tendency to destroy cities and kill, burn, and rob purposelessly. This tendency is only a reflection of a lumpenproletariat and peasant mentality, which may hamper the development of the party among the peasant masses or even among the proletariat. Therefore, every effort should be made to erase this erroneous concept within the party. Of course, our party should actively lead the peasant masses in their struggle to liquidate the landlords and gentry and to weaken the counterrevolutionary forces. What is opposed by the party, however, is purposeless killing and burning, which are irrelevant to our revolutionary mission. "Burning and killing for their own sake" and not for the real benefit of the revolution is objectionable. Third, looseness and lack of organization. From now on, [we] must direct the peasant associations in a planned, organized, and centralized manner.

4) When guerrilla warfare develops into local uprisings, the party must take into consideration the objective conditions and the subjective strength and lead with suitable tactics. The resolution of the Ninth Plenum of the ECCI states that "the spontaneous guerrilla warfare of the peasants in various provinces and districts . . . can be a starting point in the nationally victorious mass revolt only on the condition that it is carried on in alliance with a new revolutionary tide among the proletariat in the cities." Past experience has proved this to be an extremely valid statement. In the increasingly intensified class struggle at present, the setting up of a soviet regime in one county [xian] or several townships [xiang] is possible. It is not necessary that guerrilla warfare turn into local uprisings. Only when, during the process of struggle, the vast peasant masses are mobilized, when there arises a genuine demand on the part of the masses for a political regime of their own, and when the reactionary forces in the area are actually tottering can guerrilla warfare develop into local revolts. Therefore when the guerrilla forces have brought a large area under their control, have secured the participation of a large number of people, and the conditions are ripe for producing a county or municipal local revolt, the party must consider carefully its objective conditions and subjective strength, and proceed with the uprising prepared, well organized, well planned, employing suitable tactics, and under the leadership and with the cooperation of the workers of the county or municipality. After the success of the uprising, the slogan of the mass struggle should be put into effect, and all the reactionary forces should be liquidated so that still greater numbers of peasants and workers may be mobilized and the policies of the soviet regime be realized. Particular attention should be paid to the extension of the uprising to the adjacent areas.

5) The party should lead the spontaneous peasant uprisings. At present, when the suffering of the peasant masses is increasing daily, spontaneous revolts easily occur. The party must give genuine leadership to spontaneous revolts. It should particularly intensify its work among handicraft workers and shop employees in the county cities or towns, to enable them to understand the significance of the peasant uprising and to help to lead such uprisings until the establishment and the expansion of the soviet regime.

X) Tactics Regarding Militia Corps and Bandits

[[The party should publicize the land policy among the militia corps and bandits, establish cadres (within them), and absorb their members.]]

XI) Working-Class Leadership of the Peasantry

The consolidation of working-class leadership among the peasantry is a prerequisite to the success of the rural revolution. A close liaison between the peasant movement and the workers' movement and the consolidation of the ideological and organization leadership of the working class and the CCP in the peasant movement are prerequisites to the success of the rural revolution. Therefore the liaison between the peasant movement must be tightened, and proletarian members should be drawn into the peasant movement and its leading organs. To achieve this purpose, constant intercourse should be maintained between the workers' organizations and the peasant associations, and propaganda should be directed at the vast peasant masses regarding the significance and aims of the working-class struggle, in order to make them realize that liberation can be achieved only under the leadership of the proletariat. Work should also be done among the unemployed workers who have returned to the villages from the cities.

XII) Party Work in the Villages

1) The main task of the village party headquarters is to consolidate the leading role of the working class in the peasant movement. To secure and consolidate the leading role of the working class in the peasant movement is the main task of the village party headquarters and the general policy in all practical work. In all peasant struggles and work, the party branch should strive to secure its leading role. In propaganda and agitation work, the party branch should explain the functions of the CCP and its present tasks.

2) The party organization in the villages should be composed of proletarian and semiproletarian elements. The organization of the CCP in the village should be expanded among the rural proletariat and the progressive elements of the semiproletariat (handicraft workers, hired farmhands, poor peasants). If all the revolutionary masses are absorbed into the party organization, then the peasant organizations (peasant associations) would be replaced by the party organization.

The revolutionary peasant masses must be gathered into the peasant associations or the soviets. The past tendency of replacing the peasant associations and the soviets with the party and accepting petty bourgeois peasant mentality should be rigorously corrected. The party should never directly command the masses but should only influence the peasant associations and the soviets through the functions of the party branches and the youth corps.

In order to carry out this work, the party must mobilize some active elements to work in the villages. The peasant committees of the central and provincial party organizations in particular should strengthen their work.

C.13 Constitution of the CCP (10 July 1928)⁹⁸

Chapter One: Name

1. Name: The Chinese Communist Party, a section of the Comintern, is named the “CCP” and is a branch of the Comintern.

Chapter Two: Membership

2. Qualifications for joining the party: Those who acknowledge the Comintern and our party’s program and Constitution, join and work in certain party organizations, obey all Comintern and party resolutions, and pay party dues regularly are eligible to become members of our party.

3. Procedures for joining the party: To join the party, new party members must be accepted by party branches [dang zhibu] and be approved by the relevant county party committee or the district party committee equivalent to the county party committee organization. The conditions for joining the party for different groups are as follows:

- a) Factory workers must be sponsored by one party member and be accepted by the party branch of the relevant production unit.
- b) Peasants, handicraft workers, intellectuals, and lower-level staff members of various organs must be sponsored by two party members.
- c) Senior staff members of various organs must be sponsored by three party members.

Notes: (i) Sponsors should be responsible for those sponsored. Incidences of untruthfulness in the letters of introduction can be punished by party sanctions including expulsion from the party. (ii) Before being approved as a formal party member, new party members may be assigned to certain jobs by the relevant party organizations [dangbu] in order to examine them and their understanding of the party. (iii) Members of the CYL, when joining the party, should be sponsored by their CYL committee. Procedures similar to those above must also be followed, i.e., being accepted by a meeting of all the party members of the relevant branches or approved by the superior party leading organs. (iv) Under certain special conditions, party committees at all levels have the right to recruit or accept new party members directly.

- d) Those who leave other political parties (the GMD, etc.) to join our party must be introduced by three party members with over one year's party membership. Those who were ordinary party members of other political parties in the past may be approved by provincial party committees. Those who were responsible persons of other political parties in the past must be approved by the Party Center.

4. Changes of organization: When other political organizations or entire political groups or party organizations join or transfer to the CP, they must be approved by a Party Center resolution.

5. Transfer of party members: when party members transfer their scope of work (a district or town) from one party organization to another, they should be transferred to the organization of the new location and become members of the new organization. All procedures transferring party members from one organization to another and from one county to another must conform to the regulations promulgated by the Party Center.

6. Expulsion from the party: The decision to expel a party member must be adopted by a meeting of all party members of the relevant party branch and can take effect only on the approval by the superior party committee. Prior to the approval of the expulsion by superior organs, those expelled should immediately stop all party work. Those who do not accept the expulsion may appeal to the party's highest organ [zuigao dang de jiguan]. Party committees at all levels have the right to directly expel those party members who engage in antiparty activities. However, the lower-level party branches to which the expelled persons belong should be notified of the expulsions.

Chapter Three: The Organizational System of the Party

7. Organizational principle: As with all other branches of the Comintern, the organizational principle of the CCP is democratic centralism. The basic principles of democratic centralism are as follows:

- a) Lower- and higher-level party organizations [dangbu] are elected by the plenum of party members, congresses, and the National Congress.
- b) Party organizations at all levels should make regular reports to those party members who elected them.

- c) Lower-level party organizations must unreservedly accept the resolutions of the higher-level party organizations, strictly adhere to party discipline, and carry out quickly and effectively the resolutions of the ECCI and the party's leading organ [dang de zhidao jiguan]. The organization responsible for a certain region [quyu] is the superior organ for all other organizations in the region. Debate by party members on certain party issues may be held only before the adoption of decisions on these issues by the relevant organs. Certain Comintern Congress, Party Congress, or party leading organ decisions must be carried out unconditionally. Even if some party members or several local organizations disagree with the decisions, they must carry them out unconditionally.

8. The designation of leading organs: Where conditions of secrecy make it necessary, lower-level party organs may be appointed by superior organs. With the approval of superior organs, new committee members may be appointed to party organization committees.

9. The regional division of the party: The party is divided into units along regional lines. The organization that is responsible for all organizations in one region is the superior organ of the region. Party members are not distinguished on the basis of ethnicity or nationality, and all should join the local party organizations to become CCP members.

10. The executive power of organs at all levels: Within the scope of the Comintern's and our party's decisions, party organizations have discretionary powers to make decisions concerning local matters.

11. The highest organs of party organizations at all levels: The highest organs of the party at all levels are the plenary meeting of party members, congresses, or the National Congress.

12. Executive committees at all levels: The plenum of party members, congresses, or the National Congress elect the executive committees of the relevant party organizations. These executive committees are the leading organs between the convocation of two plenums and guide all the routine work of the relevant organizations at all levels.

13. The issue of approval: All newly formed party organizations (branches, county committees, etc.) must be approved by their superior organs.

14. The organizational system of the party is as follows:

- a) All factories, workshops, shops, streets, small towns, army units, etc.: the plenum of party branch members [zhibu dangyuan dahui]—branch secretariat [zhibu ganshihui].
- b) Urban or rural areas: the plenum of party members of areas or area congress—area party committees [qu weiyuanhui].
- c) Counties or cities: county or city congress—county or municipal committees [xian huo shi weiyuanhui].

- d) Special districts (including several counties or a part of a province): special district congress—special district committees [tebie qu weiyuanhui]. Whenever necessary, organizations of special districts may be established by a resolution of the provincial committee.
- e) Provinces: provincial congress—provincial committees.
- f) National: the National Congress—the CC.
- g) To facilitate the guidance of the work of all party organizations, the CC may, in accordance with circumstances, set up a central executive bureau [zhongyang zhixing ju] or appoint a special representative of the Party Center [zhongyang tepaiyuan] to cover a number of provinces. The executive bureau and special representatives are appointed by the CC and are accountable only to the CC.

15. The units of party organizations: To carry out various special party tasks, party committees at all levels may set up various departments or committees, i.e., the organization department, the propaganda department, the labor movement committee, and the women's movement committee. All departments and committees are under the jurisdiction of party committees, work under the committees' leadership, and implement their resolutions through party committees. The organization of various departments under party committees is determined by the Party Center.

Note: To facilitate work among the workers and peasants of other nationalities by using their own languages, work departments for national minorities may be established under local party committees. These departments should work under the guidance and supervision of local party committees.

Chapter Four: Branches

16. Basic organization: Branches are the party's basic organization (in factories, mines, workshops, shops, streets, the countryside, army units, etc.). All party members should join the branch in their place of work. New party branches may be formed where there are three or more party members, contingent on approval by county or district committees equivalent to the county committee organization.

17. The special organization of branches: In cases where there are one or two party members working in an enterprise, these party members may join the production branches nearest to their enterprise or form a branch together with party members in neighboring enterprises. Party members working in all kinds of enterprises, such as handicraft workers, self-employed workers, household helpers, intellectuals, etc., should organize street branches [jiedao zhibu] in accordance with the principle of residence. With regard to the rural branches, rural economic enterprises such as small mines, and certain types of agricultural workers may organize branches in line with production relations.

18. The tasks of branches: Branches are organizations that establish links with workers and peasants. The tasks of branches are (a) to employ systematic communist propaganda and agitation among nonparty worker and peasant masses for the purpose of implementing the slogans and resolutions of the party and to enable workers and peasants to stand on the side of the party. (b) To use the force of party organization to participate actively in all political and economic struggles of workers and peasants, to discuss their demands from the viewpoint of the revolutionary class struggle, to organize the revolutionary activities of the masses, to struggle for leadership over all revolutionary actions by workers and peasants, and to work hard to include workers and peasants in the common revolutionary struggle of the proletariat in China and in the world. (c) To collect dues and educate new party members, to distribute party publications, and to carry out cultural and political educational work among party members and nonparty workers and peasants.

19. Branch secretariats: Depending on the number of party members, a branch elects three to five persons to form the secretariat to carry out the party's daily tasks and arrange the tasks of the party members. Tasks include propaganda work, the distribution of printed materials, party and YL work in trade unions and peasant organizations, work among women, and maintaining contacts with the CYL branches. The branch secretariat elects one secretary and implements the decisions of the party members' meeting or branch meetings and the instructions of superior party organizations.

Chapter Five: Organizations at the Urban and Rural Area Level

20. Area congresses: Within the scope of urban and rural areas, the party's leading organ is the party members' meeting or the congress of delegates from various branches in the urban or rural area. The party members' meeting or the congress receive and approve the reports of area committees, elect area committees and the delegates to attend the congresses of counties, cities, special districts, and provinces.

21. Area committees: When the party members' meeting or congress is not in session, urban and rural area committees guide all party affairs in their own areas. Within the scope permitted by the conditions of secrecy, the standing committee of urban and rural committees should hold frequent meetings, at least once a fortnight. When the area committee is not in session, work is led by the standing committee of the area committee. Members of the standing committee should be elected from the members of the respective area committee.

Chapter Six: County and City Organizations

22. County congresses: The superior organ of the party within a county is the county congress, which is convened once every three months. An unscheduled county congress may be held by the county committee at the request of over half of the organizations in the county or in accordance with resolutions of the provincial committee (or special district committee). County congresses receive the reports of county committees and county supervisory committees, elect the members of county committees and of county supervisory committees, and elect the delegates to attend the special district or provincial congresses.

23. County committees: County committees are elected by county congresses. When the county congress is not in session, they are the highest party organ in the county. In addition to delegates from towns in the county, delegates from branches in the rural areas and important villages should also participate in the county committee. County committees themselves may decide when to convene plenums, although they should be held at least once a year. County committees recommend a standing committee to administer routine work. Each county committee elects one secretary to handle routine work. Secretaries of county committees must be approved by superior party organs.

24. The organs of county committees: County committees implement the resolutions of county congresses, provincial committees, and the CC. To exercise leadership, they should strive to establish various departments or committees (such as a department for organization, propaganda, agitation, women's movement, peasants' movement, etc.). If they publish a newspaper, county committees should appoint an editor. County committees carry out party business within the relevant county. Prior to and after the convocation of county congresses, county committees are accountable to the superior party organs and should frequently report on their work to their superior party organs.

25. The cities where county committees are located need not set up city committees. The city's work should be guided by county committees directly. Cities may be divided into city districts. City district committees are responsible for leading the work of city districts.

26. City committees: City committees as well as county committees, with the exception of those subdivided into city districts, should have jurisdiction over suburban rural areas or suburban branches directly under them. Cities where provincial committees or special district committees are located need not set up city committees. The city committees' work should be guided by provincial committees or special district committees directly.

27. Special district committees: In places where special district committees have already been established, the special districts should conduct their work in accordance with the organizational rules and regulations governing county committees. In places which have no provincial committees, special districts should maintain direct contact with the Party Center and conduct their work in accordance with the organizational rules and regulations governing provincial committees.

Chapter Seven: Provincial Organization

28. Provincial congresses: The highest organ within a province is the provincial congress. Provincial congresses should be held once every six months. An unscheduled provincial congress may be convened by the provincial committee at the request of over half of the provincial organizations or in accordance with a proposal of the Party Center. Provincial congresses listen to the reports by provincial committees and provincial supervisory committees, discuss party business and societal work within the respective provinces, and elect members of provincial committees and provincial supervisory committees and delegates to attend the National Congress.

29. Provincial committees: Provincial committees are elected by provincial congresses. When the provincial congress is not in session the provincial committee is the highest party organ in the province. Delegates from organizations in the provincial capital and important local provincial party organizations should all participate in the provincial committee. Provincial committees may decide when to convene their own meetings. There must be a meeting at least once a fortnight. To facilitate work, a provincial committee may elect a standing committee from among its members and one secretary to conduct routine work prior to and after the meeting of the provincial committee.

30. The functions, powers, and organs of provincial committees: Provincial committees implement the resolutions of provincial congresses and the CC. Provincial committees set up all party organs in their respective provinces and appoint editors of provincial party newspapers. Provincial committees control the party's forces and finances in their respective provinces, manage the party's accounting sections, and guide the work of the party and the league in nonparty organizations. Provincial committees should frequently report on their work to the Party Center and notify lower-level party organizations of their activities. In order to research various important issues, provincial committees may establish various departments or committees, such as departments of organization, propaganda, and agitation and the labor movement committees. Normally, the director of a department should be a full or candidate member of a provincial committee and work under the direct guidance of the standing committee of the provincial committee.

31. Provincial committees work in the cities where they are located through and in conjunction with the city committees. Therefore, county committees situated in the locations of provincial committees must confine their work to their respective counties and towns.

Chapter Eight: National Party Conference [dang de quanguo huiyi]

32. The National Party Conference is normally convened twice a year. The composition and the size of constituencies (how many people elect one deputy) is decided by the CC.

33. The resolutions of the National Conference come into force only after review and ratification by the CC.

34. If the National Conference convenes just before a World Congress of the Comintern, it may, with the ECCI's permission, elect delegates to the World Congress of the Comintern.

Chapter Nine: The National Party Congress [dang de quanguo dahui]

35. The party's supreme organ is the National Party Congress. Normally, the National Party Congress is convened by the CC once a year with the permission of the Comintern. An unscheduled session of the National Party Congress may be convened by the CC at its own request or by a proposal of the ECCI or at the request of the deputies who participated in the first session of the National Congress and party organizations that represent over half of all party members. However, the convocation of an unscheduled congress must be approved by the ECCI. The National Party Congress may adopt resolutions only when the deputies present represent over half of all party members.

The size of the constituencies of the National Party Congress is decided either by the ECCI, by the CC, or by a party conference held prior to the National Party Congress.

36. The National Party Congress:

- a) Receives and reviews the reports of the CC and the Central Supervisory Committee.
- b) Decides on the party's program.
- c) Decides on the adoption of resolutions on all political tactics and organizational and other matters.
- d) Elects the CC, the Central Supervisory Committee, etc.

37. Deputies to the National Party Congress should be elected by provincial party congresses. However, because of the need for secret work, with the permission of the Comintern, deputies may also be designated by provincial committees. If the ECCI approves, the National Party Congress may also be substituted for an unscheduled National Congress.

Chapter Ten: The CC

38. The size of the membership of the CC is decided by the National Party Congress.

39. When the National Party Congress is not in session, the CC is the party's supreme organ. It represents the party in establishing relations with other political parties, sets up various party organs, guides all the party's political and organizational work, appoints editors of newspapers of the central organs under the guidance and supervision of the CC, dispatches special CC representatives to various provincial party organizations, and establishes executive bureaus of the CC according to circumstances, implements the work of the printing bureau and other causes that are significant for the whole party, distributes the party's finances and forces, manages the CC's accounting section, etc.

The CC should meet in plenary session regularly—at least once every three months.

40. The CC elects from among its members a Politburo to guide the party's political work when the CC is not in plenary session. It elects a standing committee to conduct routine work.

41. In accordance with different sectors of work, the CC sets up various departments or committees, such as the departments of organization, propaganda, and agitation, and committees for the labor movement, the women's movement, and the peasant movement. The tasks of the various departments or committees should be implemented by the respective work units in accordance with the instructions of the CC. The CC appoints the directors of all departments and all commissions. As far as is possible, these directors should be appointed from among CC members.

42. In line with economic and political conditions, the CC specifies the scope of activities of various local party organizations and determines the level of units of various regions in line with the administrative units of the whole country.

Chapter Eleven: The Supervisory Committee

43. To supervise the finances and accounting of party organizations and the work of all units, the National Party Congress and provincial, county, and city congresses elect supervisory committees at the central, provincial, county, and city levels respectively.

Chapter Twelve: Party Discipline

44. Strict party discipline is the most important duty of all party members and organizations. Decisions of the Comintern, the National Party Congress, the CC, and other superior party organs must be quickly and correctly implemented. However, with respect to differences within the party before a decision has been made, there can be completely free discussion.

45. Nonimplementation of decisions by higher party organs and committing other mistakes as judged by the party shall be punished by disciplinary measures taken by appropriate party organizations. For organizations, disciplinary measures include reprimands, formation of a temporary organization, disbanding the organization, and reregistering party members. For individuals, disciplinary measures comprise various forms of reprimand, warnings, open criticism, temporary cessation of important party work, expulsion from the party, or prolonged supervision.

Breaches of discipline are examined by the party members' meeting or the party organizations at all levels. Committees at all levels may set up special commissions to examine matters concerning discipline in advance. The decisions of such special commissions should take effect once approved by the relevant party organizations. Expulsion from the party should be decided in accordance with the procedures specified in Article 6 of this Constitution.

Chapter Thirteen: Party Finances

46. Expenses of party organizations are paid from membership dues, special donations, subsidies from the party's publishing units, and higher party organizations.

47. Dues for joining the party and being a member should be determined by the CC. Unemployed and destitute party members may be totally exempt from party dues. Nonpayment of party dues for three consecutive months without adequate reason is considered to represent voluntary withdrawal from the party and should be announced at the party members' meeting.

Chapter Fourteen: Party Fractions

48. In congresses, conferences, and organs of nonparty organizations (i.e., trade unions, peasant associations, social groups, cultural organizations), party fractions should be organized where there are three or more party members. Their tasks are to increase the party's influence, to carry out the party's policies, and to supervise party members' work in nonparty organizations. Party fractions should elect secretaries to carry out routine work. Party fractions can handle their own internal affairs and routine work. When there is a difference of opinion between the party committee and a party fraction, the party committee should help the representatives of the party fraction to reexamine the issue and adopt a decision. The decision should be implemented at once. If the party fraction disagrees with the decision and appeals, the issue should be settled by the next highest party organ. However, during the period of appeal, the decision of the party committee should still be carried out.

49. When questions related to a party fraction are being discussed by a party committee, representatives of the party fraction should be allowed to participate in the meeting and have the right of speech.

50. Secretariats elected by party groups should be approved by the party committee directly above them. The secretariats are accountable to the party committees at the same level regarding the work of the party groups. Party committees may dispatch their own members as representatives to participate in the secretariats and have the right to recall their members but they must notify party fractions of the reasons for the recall.

51. Staff members working in the various party fraction organizations may be proposed by the party fraction with the permission of the local party committee. Transfer of party fraction members to another fraction should also be settled in the same way.

52. All issues that need to be resolved in organizations that have party fractions should be discussed first in party fraction meetings or the secretariat meeting of party fractions. Decisions by party fractions must have the unanimous support of members and should be voted on in the meetings of the fractions. Party members who violate this provision must be penalized by party organizations in line with the party Constitution and party discipline.

Chapter Fifteen: Mutual Relations with the CYL

53. All leading party and YL organs (from branches to the Party Center) should exchange delegates with the right to speak and to vote. Similarly, the YL may elect delegates to all party congresses on the basis of the number of league members.

C.14 Political Resolution of the Second Plenum of the CC—The Current Situation of the Revolution and the CCP's Mission (June 1929)⁹⁹

I) The Deepening Crisis of the World Revolution

[[Events of the past year have shown that the view of the Sixth Party Congress and the Comintern's Sixth Congress that the world revolution had entered its third phase with the crises entering a period of unusual intensity was correct. They stated that this situation would help the Chinese revolution. First, the crisis of an imperialist war has worsened. Second, the consolidation and development of the socialist economy in the Soviet Union has enabled the world's proletariat to see the bright future of socialism. This has boosted their courage for struggle. Third, class struggle in each country and the revolutionary movement in colonial nations have also intensified.]]

II) The Fundamental Contradictions in the Current Political Situation in China and the Development of the Revolutionary Situation

[[Observation of the real situation in China reveals that the imperialists are the de facto rulers of every facet of political and economic life. Since the failure of the great Chinese revolution, especially since the GMD conquered Beijing, imperialist rule in China has grown stronger daily. But rivalry among the different imperial nations in China creates continuous conflicts among China's warlords. This is the first fundamental contradiction in China's current political situation.]]

4) At present, the feudal class still has a strong basis in the Chinese economy; the majority of the population—the peasantry—still suffers from the cruel exploitation of the landlord class. Because of the development of a currency economy, the system of feudal exploitation has been dealt a heavy blow and is collapsing, but it is still in a dominant position. In particular, imperialist aggression has produced a huge mass of unemployed and bankrupt people, who have become the foundation of the system of feudal warlords. This has allowed a temporary resurrection of the state feudal system. In addition, because of manipulation and support by the imperialists, the system of warlords and the feudal and semifeudal superstructure are still the principal forces driving political change in China. China's basic problems will not be solved without a democratic revolution that will fundamentally eradicate feudalism and semifeudalism. The weak Chinese bourgeoisie, which is itself related to the [system of] feudal exploitation, has to ally with the warlords particularly because of the bourgeoisie's attempt to rule the whole country. This creates a coalition regime composed of compradores, landlords, the bourgeoisie, and warlords. Therefore, the Comintern's opponents now consider China's current [government] a completely bourgeois regime and the Chinese revolution a wholly socialist one. This is utter nonsense which glosses over the real relationships of economic exploitation in China. Therefore, the CC plenum resolutely denounces this type of view and the extremely mistaken tendencies similar to such a view.

[[5] The revival of economic activity in the last year has only helped the imperialists' industry and commerce to recover. The tendency for an independent national bourgeoisie to emerge means that it will resist attempts by the imperialists to subjugate China. Therefore, although the bourgeoisie has betrayed the revolution, it has not thrown in its lot totally with the imperialists. The Chinese bourgeoisie will continue with its reformist political programs. Yet reformist policies such as a 50 percent rent reduction will be resisted by medium and small landlords who live increasingly in the shadow of bankruptcy. Conflicts cannot be resolved because of the existence of different warlord cliques. Their collusion with one another and the imperialists means that endless wars are waged in China. This is the second fundamental contradiction in the current political situation in China.

6) This contradiction should never be exaggerated. The reformist political program of the bourgeoisie is a program of compromise with the imperialists and the forces of feudalism and is a program to subjugate China to the oppression of the imperialists and the forces of feudalism. But the bourgeoisie cannot adopt a unified policy when dealing with the imperialists. The ties of sections of the bourgeoisie to the feudal forces means that they cannot act in a unified fashion to deal with them. Because the bourgeoisie is relatively weak it will be forced gradually to betray the national interest and compromise with the feudal forces. Thus, while it is wrong to see no conflicts between the bourgeoisie and the imperialists and feudal forces, it is an even greater mistake to exaggerate these conflicts and to believe that the bourgeoisie can continue to play a revolutionary role.

7) The direct cause of wars in China is warlord competition but the main driving force behind such conflicts is the struggle between the warlords. Internal conflicts mean that it is impossible for peace to last for long. This makes it impossible for the bourgeoisie to use peaceful means to implement its reformist policies to bring about the unification and liberation of China. The three great missions of driving out the imperialists, eradicating feudal forces, and unifying China can thus be fulfilled only after the revolutionary struggle of the worker-peasant masses has won its complete victory.

8) Since the Chinese bourgeoisie is incapable of demanding concessions from the imperialists and feudal forces, and since it must continue to compete with the goods produced by the imperialists, its only solution is to increase the exploitation of the workers. The living conditions for the workers in the past year have become much worse than before. The imperialist oppression has led to an increase in struggle that will form a huge tidal wave of revolution that will drive out the imperialists, overthrow the ruling class, and found a China ruled by a soviet of workers, peasants, soldiers, and the poor people. The conflict between the reactionary rulers and the revolutionary masses now is the third fundamental contradiction in the current political situation in China. It is the most serious. The Sixth Party Congress gave an impetus to the struggles of the workers and peasants, particularly the struggles of the workers in big cities. In the countryside, the struggles by the peasants have not stopped. The soviet areas have not altogether disappeared; the Red Army of Zhu [De] and Mao [Zedong] continue to exist in areas controlled by the reactionaries.]]

Several important phenomena are developing in these struggles: First, minor, everyday struggles have evolved into great strike movements. Second, economic struggles against the aggression of capital have evolved into struggles for freedom and to oppose the GMD. Third, the deceptive influence of the leaders of "yellow" labor unions and reformists has greatly decreased; the masses in several "yellow" labor unions with considerable followings in Shanghai have waged fierce struggles against their leaders. Fourth, the CP and red labor unions have greatly increased their influence among the masses. All this has proved that the struggles of the urban workers have begun to revive and the movement of a land revolution in the countryside is also gradually expanding—the entire revolutionary movement is marching forward. Therefore, it is an evidently erroneous notion to think that the mass struggles are only of a temporary nature and without the possibility of future, continual development. Although we should not overestimate these phenomena, the sign of a new revolutionary high tide can indeed be seen. Moreover, the party leadership has made some progress in the difficult working environment during the past six months.

There are numerous weaknesses in these mass struggles; for example, the influence of reformism still exists among the masses; the notions of defeatism and legalism have not declined among the masses; the number of "yellow" mass organizations is still rising; in particular, there has not been much improvement in the phenomena of the party's weak leadership and its isolation from the masses. Therefore, if one believes that the revolutionary high tide is about to arrive or will do so in the near future, this would be to commit revolutionary impetuosity. This plenum resolutely points out that if we do not remove these weaknesses, the newly revived workers' struggles will surely suffer setbacks and their progress will be delayed. The land revolution will certainly suffer continuous setbacks without the leadership of the urban workers. The party's limited progress will encounter new obstacles. Theoretically speaking, therefore, we do not deny the possibility that the direct victory of the revolution has to be postponed, out of necessity, for a few years. However, it is a great mistake to believe that China will undergo long "peaceful" development without experiencing serious crises stemming from the fundamental contradictions that exist in Chinese society. It is also a great mistake to believe that the arrival of the revolutionary high tide will have to be postponed to some distant future. Our party must correct all kinds of [wrong] analytical methods based on extreme assumptions among our comrades. We must insist that only through struggle and our efforts to win over the strength of the masses can the speed and course of the arrival of the revolutionary high tide be determined.

III) Our Party's General Line and Basic Tasks

9) The above analysis and the estimation of the current political situation have proved completely correct the view of the Sixth Party Congress [June-July 1928], the Comintern's Sixth Congress [July-September 1928], and the recent letter of the ECCI [8 February 1929] that the party's General Line should be to win over the majority of the masses to prepare for armed uprising. The results of the party's work in the past year have expanded considerably its political influence and enabled it to improve greatly its relations with the masses. However, GMD influence among the masses has not yet been completely broken. Reformism still casts a great spell over the masses. The fighting strength of the mass organizations is still very weak. The party's authority among the masses still lacks an extensive and solid base. Therefore, the party should continue to execute, more resolutely, the General Line to win over the masses to prepare for armed uprising.

10) Based on the current revolutionary situation, on the weaknesses in revolutionary subjectivism, and on the experiences gained in the struggles of the past year, the party must make great efforts to win over the majority of the masses and firmly execute the following tasks:

a) Strengthen the struggle against imperialism in connection with opposition to another world war and support for the Soviet Union. The imperialists' aggression has furthered the interest of the GMD in betraying the nation. This has aroused indignation among the masses, so the party must resolutely wage and lead all struggles against imperialism in order to rally the majority of the masses around the party. At the same time, the party should point out the pressing crisis of another world war caused by the partition of China and seizure of other colonies by the imperialists as well as demonstrate that the Soviet Union is the only leader of the world revolution against imperialism. We must expose the imperialists' plot to invade the Soviet Union and call on the majority of the masses to wage resolute struggles against [this plot]. Only this will unite the majority of the masses under the party's political influence and with the forces of the world revolution, so as to reach our final victory by overthrowing imperialist rule. Several basic theoretical and strategic concepts in our struggle against the imperialists must be emphatically pointed out: First, the primary tool the imperialists use to rule China is the remnants of the feudal and semifeudal forces. Therefore, if we cannot fundamentally eradicate these, we will not be able to overthrow imperialist rule. Similarly, if we fail to overthrow imperialist rule, we will never complete the land revolution. Therefore, the overthrow of imperialist rule and leading the land revolution to its completion are two inseparable primary missions at this stage of the revolution. Second, it would be a major mistake to think that there is no independent mass anti-imperialist movement besides the struggle of the land revolution. The majority of the masses suffer oppression by the imperialists and will surely rise up to join the struggle. Thus, we must resolutely and regularly strengthen the anti-imperialist struggle. The expansion of the anti-imperialist struggle will certainly give an impetus to the development of the labor movement and the peasants' struggles. At the same time, there must be a strong foundation underpinning the labor movement and the peasants' struggles in order to achieve an extensive development in the struggle against imperialism. Therefore, the anti-imperialism movement has a role to influence and promote the economic struggles of the workers and peasants' movement. If we pay no attention to the daily struggles of the workers and peasants and simply dream of setting off a huge, anti-imperialist movement that will revive the labor and peasant movement, this will be an extremely wrong notion. Third, in our previous anti-imperialist movements we did not put sufficient emphasis on propaganda and the struggle to oppose another world war and support the Soviet Union. This is an obvious flaw which the party must correct. In all mass movements, and the anti-imperialist movement in particular, we must pay close attention to propaganda and the struggle to oppose another world war and support the Soviet Union. Only then can we lead the masses' revolutionary struggle and carry out our party's mission in the world revolution.

b) Resolutely lead and develop all mass struggles against the rule of local tyrants, the gentry, compradores, the bourgeoisie, and the GMD. We must march resolutely toward this general objective. All crimes committed by the GMD in colluding with the imperialists, compromising with the feudal forces, and engaging in cruel exploitation and oppression have already been exposed to the majority of the masses. In all mass struggles, only through raising the slogan of overthrowing the GMD and leading all the struggles toward this general objective can our party destroy the GMD's remaining influence among the masses, reinforce the courage of the masses in their revolutionary struggles, and rally them around the party.

c) Expand opposition to the warlords' wars. The warlords' wars have directly brought unspeakable sufferings to the people. Our party must use every opportunity, in all cities and villages, to launch and expand the struggles against warlords. This struggle is certain to involve the majority of the masses, who will act in unison rallying around the same slogans. At present, this is a particularly important task. The general line in opposing the warlords' wars is to adopt the principle of "defeatism," which is to say that we must point out that these warlords' wars are simply ones between robbers—internal conflicts within the ruling class over exploiting the workers, the peasants, and the poor working people. They have no revolutionary or progressive meaning whatsoever. Therefore, our party must resolutely call on the people to rise to this confrontation and attack every participant in these wars in order to bring about their defeat. At the same time, we must determinedly propagate the slogan that only a revolutionary mass uprising can exterminate wars. However, in our actions to implement this strategy, we must use the miseries caused for the masses by the warlords' wars to mobilize the majority to join the struggle. These miseries include imposing levies to pay the soldiers, requisitioning labor power and vehicles, closing factories, increasing hours of work, dismissing workers, and exploiting the soldiers' demand for pay. Only after these struggles have mobilized the majority of the masses, and only after the struggles of the workers, peasants, and soldiers have broken out on a tremendous scale can they be merged into the revolutionary uprising of the masses that will destroy the future of the warlords' wars. Therefore, it would be an obvious mistake to issue an unconditional call for soldiers to kill their officers as soon as a warlords' war breaks out without taking into account the development of the workers and peasants' struggle.

d) Strengthen and lead the expansion and deepening of the struggle in the land revolution. After the failure of the Great Revolution, instead of decreasing the exploitation of the peasantry by the landlord class has intensified. The bourgeoisie has implemented none of its land reform policies and, thus, the struggle of the land revolution continues, and the spontaneous struggles by the peasants in individual provinces all have revolutionary significance. It has been two years since the defeat of the Great Revolution, but soviet areas still exist in Guangdong, Jiangxi, Hubei, and Hunan. The workers and peasants' revolutionary Red Army continues to expand. The ruling class cannot achieve stability, as the continuation of the warlords' wars is a major cause of turmoil. However, the persistent development of the struggles by the majority of peasants in the land revolution is the fundamental cause [for such instability]. Therefore, the total completion of the land revolution will take place after victory of the armed uprising and seizure of power by the workers and peasants. However, it is a mistaken notion to believe that there will be no land revolution in the countryside before the victory of the nationwide uprising by the workers and peasants. On the contrary, under the current political and economic circumstances, developing the land revolution and organizing the Red Army in the course of the land revolution is one of the foremost conditions for advancing the revolutionary high tide and determining the final victory of the workers and peasants' uprising throughout the country. Therefore, our party should continue resolutely to initiate and lead the struggle by the peasant majority for the land revolution. Especially, in the soviet areas and amid our guerrilla wars, we should intensify the implementation of the land program of the Sixth Party Congress. Only then can we win over the majority of the peasants to the calls of the party and destroy the influence of bourgeois reformism.

e) Continue our relentless struggles against bourgeois reformism. The reformist political program amounts to a total compromise with the imperialists and the feudal forces. It is the best guarantee for prolonging imperialist rule and exploitation by the feudal forces. Therefore, if we do not exterminate the reformist influence among the masses and overthrow the rule of the imperialists, local tyrants, evil gentry, and the bourgeoisie, we will never fulfill the mission of expelling the imperialists and eradicating the feudal forces. Because of the periodic outbreak of the warlords' wars, the GMD's step-by-step surrender to the imperialists, public retraction of the promise to reduce rent to 50 percent of the harvest, and escalation in the exploitation of the masses, the influence of bourgeois reformism has significantly declined among the masses. That is why the factions in the reformist camp such as the "reorganization clique"¹⁰⁰ and the "third party"¹⁰¹ have run into difficulties or collapsed. However, it is wrong to think that reformism is already dead and no longer a dangerous enemy of the revolution. It is obvious that illusions about reformism still express themselves in the mass struggles everywhere. The number of "yellow" labor unions is still increasing. Especially in the north, the enemies have fooled the majority of the masses. Moreover, there are many subjective weaknesses among the masses. The party has a very weak power of command over the masses. These are the conditions that allow reformism to continue to develop. Also, the bourgeoisie will not easily give up its policy. It will certainly step up its methods of deception and propaganda. Thus, at present, reformism remains the most dangerous enemy of the revolution. We must continue to wage a fierce and determined struggle against it. However, if we go to the other extreme and exaggerate the role of reformism, or even believe that reformism has great possibilities, that will also be an extremely serious mistake. Because the GMD is unable to gain any concessions from the imperialists and feudal forces, or to resolve the fundamental contradictions in the Chinese revolution, it is easy to expose to the masses the deceptive character of reformism. Its influence will not last long. Therefore, as long as we can implement the right strategies, we will certainly overcome the reformist influence among the masses. The most important antireformist strategy is to lead resolutely the struggle of the masses and expose the deceptiveness of reformism; it is not enough to rely on propaganda and agitation to exterminate the reformist influences. This will depend mainly on the political experience of the masses themselves. On the other hand, it is a very important project to launch a comprehensive theoretical attack against reformism. In the past there have been serious deficiencies in this work. The party should pay special attention to this.

f) Strengthen our leadership of the everyday struggle of the masses and channel all types of struggles into the general struggle of fighting for liberty and against the imperialists, the GMD, and the warlords. At present, it is still an important task for the party to initiate everyday struggles of the masses because a deep sense of defeatism still lingers among a majority of them. Their courage for the struggle has yet to be stimulated. The party can only begin the mass struggle by raising issues of the masses' everyday miseries and by correctly applying the strategies for struggle to gain successive victories. Only then can we gradually raise the masses' courage and rally the majority around the political slogans of our party. Under the present circumstances, however, we must never limit ourselves to the slogans used in everyday struggles. Rather, we should more determinedly lead the masses to expand their small everyday struggles into major strikes, to move from economic to political struggles. With good planning, we should also prepare to channel all individual mass struggles into a general struggle for freedom. As many struggles over daily affairs have begun among the masses, their courage has been raised considerably. Especially, since all these struggles have been repressed directly by the GMD, the masses are forced to appreciate the urgent need to fight for the freedom of assembly, association, speech, publishing, and strike. Therefore, the party should resolutely lead every kind of mass political struggle that fights for freedom and against the GMD. We must lead and expand the minor struggles in individual factories and workshops into a major strike in the same industry or profession. Only such efforts will raise the masses' courage, expand the class and political understanding of the masses, and unite greater numbers together. If we limit ourselves to the slogans used in everyday struggles and are afraid to lead the masses and expand their struggles, this will amount to obstructing the mass struggle, surrendering the masses to the seduction of the GMD's reformism, and giving up our task of winning over and leading the masses.

g) Strengthen our work in the labor union movement and the "yellow" unions. If our party does not have a secure basis among the working class, or an extensive organizational basis in each factory and labor union movement, we will not be able to hold on to the leading position in the revolution. Therefore, the party's primary task is to strengthen our work in the labor movement and, in particular, among railway workers, sailors, miners, and other workers in important industries. At present, when the number of "yellow" unions continues to grow, if we want to establish our party's basis in the labor movement, we have to penetrate the "yellow" unions and intensify our efforts in exposing the deceptions made by the average "yellow" union leaders and the GMD. In this way, we can overcome the influence of "yellow" unionism and rally the majority of the masses around the political slogans of the party. If we think that only work in our branches forms the basis of party work and neglect work in the labor union that is part of a mass movement, and if we think that only the red labor unions are the focus of our efforts while neglecting work in the "yellow" labor unions or overlook its influence and fail to penetrate and work inside them, these would be extremely dangerous notions that would harm the party in its capacity to fulfill its fundamental task of winning over the masses. The party must carry out its secret branch work and its public or semipublic work in the labor union movement simultaneously; only then will our branches become the true nuclei leading the masses and organizing the majority. We must step up our efforts in the "yellow" labor unions to help expand the influence of the red labor unions.

The central strategy in the labor movement is to fight for the legalization of the red labor unions and oppose the method of licensing and registration used by the GMD to deprive the masses of their freedom. We must strengthen our work in the "yellow" labor unions, fight the leaders of these unions, organize leftist cadres who accept our influence, win over the majority of their followers, and change them into red unions. We must pay attention to initiating everyday struggles of the masses and organizing concerted strikes in the same industry or profession. We must correctly use the strategy of the factory committee to win over the majority of the masses. At the same time, we must step up our work among the workers in important industries such as the railways, among sailors, and in munitions factories. These strategies should be explained in detail in the resolution on the labor movement. Our party organizations at each level must resolutely execute these strategies.

h) Strengthen our leadership over the peasant movement and plan the execution of our work better. In the past year, the peasant movement has made continuous advances, but it lacks effective leadership and planning by the party. Most of the peasant struggles were spontaneous, and the majority are developing in remote areas, while there is hardly any development in the peasant movement in crucial rural regions and around important cities. Of course, there will be great difficulties in building a central foundation for the peasant movement. This is a particularly vital flaw in terms of the party's ultimate task of seizing political power. Therefore, in the future, the party must strengthen its leadership over the peasant movement and plan its work better. The central slogan of the peasant movement is undoubtedly confiscation of the land of the landlord class and turning it over to the peasant congress for disposal. However, in light of the past two years' experiences in the land revolution and the situation of the class struggle in the countryside, we must, strategically, recognize that the poor peasants are the backbone in this struggle and that the middle peasants are our solid allies. Under the special economic conditions in China, the rich peasants engage in a semifeudal and semilandlord type of exploitation, and therefore their behavior ranges from oscillation to counterrevolutionary in the course of the land revolution. Thus, we must firmly oppose the rich peasants and thoroughly complete the land revolution. When the rich peasants still remain inside our camp to oppose the warlords, landlords, and gentry, our party must do its best to develop the ideological, organizational, and combative influences of the farmhands and poor peasants to compete with the rich peasants for leadership. At the same time, we must pay attention to developing the organizations of farmhands and leading their struggles. This has become an urgent task for the party not only because the farmhands and poor peasants are the leading force in the land revolution, but also because in the next stage of the revolution—the socialist revolution—victory over the rural bourgeoisie can only be won through the determined struggles of the farmhands in a strong alliance with the poor peasants and with the neutrality of the middle peasants. At present, the famine in the country, and particularly in the north, persists. This provides a great possibility for developing the rural struggle. However, among the peasant masses in the north there are deeply entrenched notions of peaceful development and, among those in the south, strong escapist sentiments of defeatism and backwardness. On the other hand, the previous policy of killing and burning by unorganized remnants of [peasant rebels] still exists, so the guiding principle of the party's work in the countryside must be resolute opposition to the dangers of right opportunism while at the same time never relenting in its rectification of the policy of killing and burning by unorganized remnants [of peasant rebels]. Our party must resolutely initiate the everyday struggles of the peasant masses, promote class divisions in the countryside, and use guerrilla warfare to reunite the majority of the peasants and launch organized struggles, thus marching toward the goal of establishing soviets and deepening the land revolution. Of course, as much leadership as possible should be sought from the urban working class to direct these struggles. We must step up efforts to organize the peasantry in these struggles, expand the peasant armed forces through guerrilla warfare, and prepare for the final victory of the revolution.

i) Lead guerrilla warfare, expand the soviet areas, and establish the Red Army. The Sixth Party Congress pointed out that under the political and economic circumstances in the Chinese countryside, the peasants' struggles are apt to lead to armed conflicts. Therefore, the party should resolutely lead guerrilla warfare and spontaneous uprisings and establish a revolutionary Red Army of the workers and peasants in the course of the guerrilla wars. The congress also pointed out that the party's strategy in the soviet areas is to implement its land program resolutely so as to mobilize the majority of the masses and enlarge the soviet areas. At the same time, the party must do everything possible to expand the organization of the Red Army. This is the primary factor conditioning the [arrival of the] high tide of the Chinese revolution. In the course of the past year's struggles in the countryside, spontaneous peasant uprisings have broken out continually in all provinces; the guerrilla movement has continued to expand; the organization of the Red Army, despite several encirclement campaigns by the warlords, not only has escaped destruction, but has renewed expansion. All this has proved that the instructions of the Sixth Party Congress have been extraordinarily correct. In the future, our party should resolutely follow this line. However, our party should simultaneously make sure that guerrilla warfare is better organized; that slogans in the peasant struggles are applied correctly; that the policy of killing and burning by unorganized remnants [of peasant rebels] and other wrong activities are corrected. Only this will win us the support of the majority of the masses. As to whether the Red Army should follow a strategy of concentration or dispersion, the answer must depend on all objective and subjective conditions, such as the situation of the warlords' wars, the peasant struggles, the organization of the Red Army, and the geographical conditions. We should not mechanically order a strategy of concentration or dispersion.

[[j) Strengthen our work in the soldiers' movement. The cruel treatment of the soldiers by the warlords has led to mutinies in some areas. Efforts to win over the troops should be a normal main task of the party. In general, since the Sixth Party Congress, party organizations at all levels have neglected work on the soldiers' movement, so we must step up this work and develop secret party organizations among the troops. Also, work among the imperialist marines stationed in China should be stepped up.]]

k) Consolidate party organization and expand its proletarian basis. As a result of our work in the past year, [we] have overcome many difficulties, and the progress of the party is evident. However, party organization and, in particular, branch organization has yet to pull itself up. The party's foundation is still very weak among the proletarian classes and especially among the railway workers, sailors, and miners. Such a situation will never enable the party to become a strong leader of the mass struggle—or the vanguard of the industrial proletariat. Therefore, the party should devote all its energy to overcoming many difficulties, consolidating its party organization, and expanding its basis among the proletariat. These are also important tasks for the party during the revolution.

[[1] Tasks in propaganda and education. This has been neglected in the past, and propaganda work should be developed to explain the significance of overthrowing the GMD and establishing a soviet regime. In this way, when the revolutionary high tide arrives, the party will be able to mobilize the majority of the people to complete our revolutionary mission. Theoretical explanations must not be divorced from reality.]]

m) Expand the party's influence among the urban poor and pay special attention to the student movement. The urban poor are ideal urban allies for the working class, as well as an important force in the revolution. In the past year, in objective terms, the movements of the urban poor, such as the struggle against harsh levies and multiple taxes, have made much progress; boycotts and strikes occurred everywhere. This is clear evidence that the urban poor have begun to break away from the influence of the GMD and march along the road of revolutionary struggle. However, there is universal neglect of this movement within the party. In the future, the party must step up its propaganda and agitation among the urban poor and aid their organizations. The party should try to penetrate their struggles and take over the leading role. The students' struggles have also developed dramatically. The student masses have become increasingly radicalized. It is a mistake to believe that the student masses lost their role in the revolution after the revolutionary high tide between 1925 and 1927. Of course, the development of the labor movement has been driven by the momentum of revolutionary struggles. Now, however, with the worsening fundamental contradictions in the political situation and the increasing bankruptcy of the GMD, the student masses, except for a few reactionary elements, are still in favor of the revolution. In particular, the movement against imperialism and for freedom [by the students] is the powerful ally of the working class. Our party must resolutely oppose wrong views and expend more energy to step up work in the student movement, in order to expand the party's political influence and rally the majority of the students around the party's political slogans. However, we should take care that the vacillating ideas of the petty bourgeoisie do not influence the workers or the party.

n) Pay attention to the work with youths and women. In the course of the development of the current political tendencies, the young have especially demonstrated their role in revolutionary struggles and their unique mission.

In the past year, the number of young and women workers has drastically increased, while their living conditions have deteriorated. The majority of the young soldiers and young peasants have been forced onto the battlegrounds by the warlords' continuous wars and the economic bankruptcy in the countryside. The development of the struggles by the young and the poor students against imperialism and for freedom have revealed the following trends: (i) a deterioration in living conditions for the young and an intensification of political oppression; (ii) an increase in the number of young and female workers in industries; (iii) therefore, the rising anger of the youth and their need for organization and struggle. These factors are shown by the active participation of youths in previous struggles. However, the youth league's work has been inadequate in this respect. Work among the young workers is particularly weak. For example, in past struggles, [the league] has neglected: (i) the special interests of young workers, and (ii) the mass organization of young workers. All this shows that the party must make continuous efforts to work among the young workers. It should vigorously help and supervise the youth league in this line of work to bring the majority of the young people under our own flag. Therefore, the work of the youth league should: (i) actively create the league's young proletarian organizational basis; (ii) strengthen the political life of the league members and expand the party's political influence among the masses through the organization of the league; (iii) get rid of the previous forms and methods of work that do not suit the young, and invent new forms and methods of work for them in order to win over the majority of the young workers to the side of the red labor unions and actively fight for the special interests of the young workers in the course of the struggle; (iv) strengthen the work against imperialism. The party should give consideration to the interests of the young and women in all struggles. In particular, we should strengthen our work in the women's textile workers' movement.

[[o) Increase the military training of party members and organize military training for the masses. We must remember that during the Canton Uprising [December 1927], the masses did not know how to use many of the weapons they seized. To arm only the masses' brains and not their hands would be to commit a Menshevik mistake.]]

IV) Strategic Line

11) The relationship between open and secret activities. Under the present circumstances of the GMD's cruel repression of the masses and the initial revival of the struggles of the masses, the party's strategic line is to use all possibilities to pursue open activities while stepping up the party's secret work, so that open activities can be closely related to secret work. Only by using all opportunities to pursue open propaganda and agitation, openly organizing the masses, and openly calling on the people to struggle can we influence and mobilize the majority of the masses. At the same time, we should pay special attention to intensifying the party's secret work—the work of the party branches and fractions—so that we can further consolidate the party's strength of leadership. Only by strengthening the party's secret work can we assist the expansion of the party's open work; the expansion of open work can also facilitate the expansion of the party's secret work. Therefore, secret and open work are parts of the same strategic line, and not two opposing strategies. Only rightist and leftist thinking will split and juxtapose these two types of work, or weigh the relative importance of one of them in order to abandon the opposing type. This is absolutely wrong. When objective conditions permit, we should pay special attention to trying to go aboveground. However, while maintaining the principles of our struggle, we should not surrender to the GMD's laws in order to seek legality. On the other hand, if one disregards the situation of the masses or objective conditions and thinks that we must display all the basic political slogans of the party at the outset of any work, this will certainly frighten away the masses. In fact, this is a method of eliminating open work as a course of action. During the demonstrations in Shanghai between May Day and 30 May, the application of this strategic line gained outstanding results and proved that the line was extremely correct. Therefore, in the future, the party must resolutely follow this line in order to fulfill the task of winning over the majority of the masses.

12) In fulfilling these missions, in strategic terms the party is confronted by the development of rightist thought within the party. The danger of this rightist thought not only is a continuation or revival of opportunism in the party, but has a basis that must not be neglected under the present circumstances. Since the ruling class resorted to repression through the reign of terror and the reformists used deception and launched a desperate propaganda and organizational attack against the masses, within the party there have been expressions of defeatist sentiment, incorrect views, and petty bourgeois thinking among a part of the masses in the party. Under these circumstances, the rightist ideas of peaceful development and legal activities have gained an increasing following. In terms of theory and analysis of reality, [these views] exaggerate the strength of the bourgeoisie, erroneously believe that the bourgeoisie, with the help of American imperialists, can obtain power in the counterrevolution, and neglect all the irreconcilable fundamental contradictions within the ruling class. These views deny the beginning or revival of the revolutionary struggles of the workers and peasants, or the existence of the party's strength; they even claim that the ruling class is beginning to stabilize or that the revolutionary high tide is something in the very distant future. Expressed in terms of strategy and perspectives, such views propose peaceful development and legal activities, downgrade our political slogans, and accept the deceptive policies of the bourgeoisie. In terms of organization, these views advocate peace within the party (these views are designed to stop our party's struggle against all incorrect tendencies and are thus politically most dangerous) and abandonment of the red unions as our pivotal organizations. At the same time, the party's proletarian organizational basis will be weakened; our cadres are all drawn from intellectuals. The low political standards of party members provide the organizational basis of the rightist views. Of course, we must make use of every possibility to seek open activities in our work among the workers and peasants; moreover, we have gained some results up till now. However, this is no more than a need for a new type of working method under illegal circumstances so that we may strive for the realization of the party's basic goals. By no means does this represent the abandonment of our original basic tasks or lowering of our political slogans to accommodate objective conditions in order to seek our legal existence unaffected by interference from the ruling class. This latter view is fundamentally a product of the opportunists. If this idea is put into practice, we will not only become a third party or even the tail of the reformists, but also drive the masses into the trap of incurable reformism. In the end, this will complete the union of the tendencies of the liquidationists [of the revolution] and the oscillating, hesitant, and negative mentalities in the party and among the masses; the revolution and the party will then be abandoned; [these views] are diametrically opposed to the leadership and organization of communism. Of course, this does not mean that the rightist danger in the CCP has reached the stage of its final maturity, or that a dangerous faction has emerged, but in light of the objective conditions and its possible future development, the rightist tendency is especially dangerous. Our party must follow the correct line, resolutely fight, and correct this particularly dangerous tendency that is emerging in the party.

13) On the other hand, leftist dangers within the party have gradually lost their basis for development since the Sixth Party Congress. However, if we believe that "leftist" dangers have been thoroughly eliminated, this would mean allowing leftist elements to remain in the party. This would pose similar dangers to the execution of the party's correct line. At present, the most serious leftist danger is the unwillingness to pursue everyday struggles, or to recognize the necessity of pursuing these struggles, or to fight for open activities, or to join the masses' "yellow" unions to win over the masses. Leftist dangers also lie in the survival of the spirit of arbitrary leadership, in the raising of empty and exaggerated high-sounding slogans (slogans such as those used now), in the illusion about the arrival of major struggles—all this will not only prevent our party's influence from expanding among the masses, but on the contrary will diminish such influence. Therefore, we must overcome the party's tendency of divorcing itself from the masses. Instead, we must win over the masses, particularly the workers, revolutionize them, and resolutely eliminate the leftist danger. This is why it is obviously a mistake to think that the party should relax its attacks on leftism when the rightist tendencies are a particular danger.

V) The Organizational Question and Inner-Party Life

[[14] The party has many weaknesses, the most important being the weakening of the proletarian base and incorrect relations with mass organizations. The correct organizational line is: expand the party's proletarian base; treat party branches as the basic unit and the nuclei of the masses; local party organizations must concentrate on organizational work; party organizations must be distinct from those of the masses.]]

15) After the Sixth Party Congress, a new esprit de corps has expressed itself in party life (the new work spirit under the correct line of the Sixth Congress). However, because some comrades did not understand the resolutions, this gave rise to incorrect organizational proposals. Some comrades advocated peace within the party; some comrades were for radical democratization, which would damage the principle of democratic centralism; some comrades developed negative organizational views. Under the current conditions of secrecy, all our enemies—imperialists, warlords, the GMD, reformists, and leaders of the third party—have tightly surrounded us, while nonproletarian ideas within the party are quite strong. Our party must pay attention not only to the correct application of our political line but also to safeguarding iron discipline within the party. All fallacious tendencies greatly affect the existence of the party. Refusal to execute the party's resolutions is tantamount to weakening the fighting strength and leadership of the party. Instigating unprincipled quarrels within the party is hindering its progress. Denying the party's old basis and looking down on its organizational strength are equivalent to developing the tendencies of abolitionism. We must lead all party comrades to fight resolutely fallacious tendencies. There is no such thing as peace within the party. Violation of party discipline is never allowed by a Bolshevik party. Of course, whenever the CC or other levels of party organization encounter erroneous tendencies, we must examine these tendencies before we resort to disciplinary measures. In particular, we must enable all comrades to reach a correct understanding. Recently, small opposition organizations of international Trotskyites have been discovered in our party. These small organizations now have become instruments used by imperialists to sabotage the Soviet Union and fight the world revolution. No doubt, these opposition groups in China will also become the tools of the Chinese ruling class to repress the revolution and sabotage the party. Therefore, our party must severely punish [these groups] and make our party's organization secure.

[[16] In a short space of time the party has been rescued from a situation of slackness and disorganization. Right policies and the correction of mistakes will guide us to ultimate victory.]]

C.15 Letter from the ECCI to the CCP CC (26 October 1929)¹⁰²

Dear Comrades:

Recent developments in China have made us feel that we must inform you of our views on the current situation and not wait for your report on the party's activities and the current political line. Meanwhile, we have made the following initial instructions concerning some of the significant tasks faced by the CCP.

I) China has entered a period of deep national crisis, which is revealed by the following facts: (1) War has again broken out because of the internal strife among the different warlord cliques. Behind these warlord blocs are the various imperialist powers whose own conflicts are gradually intensifying. (2) The GMD-Reorganization faction has been formed and is in contention with the GMD regime based in Nanjing. Headed by Wang Jingwei and Chen Gongbo, this faction has stepped into the political arena with the support of Zhang Fakui's warlord bloc. (3) The regime's adventuristic act against the Soviet Union has intensified various contradictions at home and abroad, and these contradictions have in turn complicated the situation.¹⁰³ (4) The plans to attract large-scale foreign investment and to revise the unequal treaties that the imperialists imposed on China have all come to nothing. (5) The GMD's domestic policy is clearly bankrupt. It has failed to wipe out the revolutionary mass movement despite its use of an unprecedented white terror. On the other hand, it has neither improved China's financial situation nor brought about military unification. (6) The increasing influence of foreign capital on China's economy has caused a recession in several branches of industry. (7) The oppression of the bourgeois-landlord system means that there is no end to the prolonged agricultural crisis. (8) The already intolerable living conditions of the working class and the ordinary peasants have worsened. (9) The labor movement has again surged ahead. It is the prelude to the arrival of the revolutionary high tide. (10) The peasant struggle, particularly the guerrilla war, has developed rapidly.

The bourgeoisie-landlord alliance planned to establish and consolidate a unified state controlled by the national bourgeoisie on the basis of the counterrevolutionary victory. However, this attempt has failed totally. The signs at the beginning of the Nanjing regime that the rule of the Chinese bourgeoisie might be stabilizing have disappeared. The influence of imperialism is increasing, the economy is deteriorating, the ruling regime is disintegrating, and the worker-peasant mass revolutionary movement is rising. As a result, the various original conflicts that disappeared have again fully resumed. Although it is difficult to predict whether the national crisis can be rapidly turned into a direct revolution, we can and should help the masses of the people prepare to overthrow, by revolutionary means, the bourgeoisie-landlord regime in the future and set up a Soviet-style dictatorship of the working class and the peasantry. We should also actively wage and expand various forms of revolutionary class struggle such as mass political strikes, revolutionary demonstrations, and guerrilla warfare.

II) In forming a counterrevolutionary front, the imperialists, the landlords, and the bourgeoisie intended to suppress and eliminate the worker-peasant revolutionary movement at the end of 1927. The alliance continued to exist after the initial triumph of the bourgeoisie, landlords, and reactionaries, but now it has gradually disintegrated because of its intensified internal contradictions and conflicts. Currently, the alliance has divided into two major political camps despite the fact that all the exploiting classes have a common interest in suppressing the revolution and they have adopted basically the same attitude toward China's domestic problems and foreign relations.

The first camp is composed of warlords, feudal landlords, and the big bourgeoisie—mainly the compradore bourgeoisie and bankers, but also including some other capitalists. Currently, the political representatives of this camp are the ruling clique of the GMD and the non-GMD landlord-bourgeoisie cliques such as the Chiang Kai-shek group, the Western Hills group, the Anfu clique, Feng Yuxiang, Yan Xishan, and the Guangxi warlord clique. Differences in economic structure have created disequilibrium in the development of capitalism in different regions in China, and that phenomenon has, in turn, meant that the political groups in these regions have different class backgrounds. Though they all submissively obey the foreign imperialists, domestically they represent the interests of different factions of the landlords and the big bourgeoisie. As feudal separatist rule continues and as China remains the arena of imperialist rivalry and contention, there will never be harmony within this political camp and the warlords' wars will surely break out one after another.

The second political camp is composed of the reformists representing the interests of the intermediate stratum of the Chinese national bourgeoisie, that is, certain industrial and commercial capitalists. At present, they have put on a show to rival that of the ruling clique of the GMD and have tried to increase their influence on such groups as the small and medium capitalists and entrepreneurs, the small landlords who feel discontented, and the upper stratum (the exploiting class) of the rural and urban petty bourgeoisie. The Reorganization faction (Wang Jingwei and Chen Gongbo) in the GMD is the political representative of this camp. Now, it is whipping up social opinion and putting forward hypocritical slogans such as the struggle for nationalism and democracy in order to make use of the growing discontent of the urban petty bourgeoisie and the broad masses of the people to reform the Nanjing regime and prevent the outbreak of a new revolution. In essence, this camp and its representative—the Reorganization faction—are a counterrevolutionary clique and are the die-hard enemy of the worker-peasant revolutionary movement. While hostile to the Soviet Union, they have made total concessions and adopted an out-and-out submissive attitude to the imperialists and the warlords. This attitude is clearly reflected in the fact that the Reorganization faction has relied on its own warlord (Zhang Fakui) to carry out warlord acts and has allied with military leaders in the north (Feng Yuxiang and others). Although the various elements in this camp want to find an escape from the prolonged crisis hampering the development of capitalism in China, they are too weak and incapable to realize this. Similarly, despite their desire to change the social background of the present regime, they lack the strength and the determination to complete this task. Once the independent worker-peasant revolutionary movement surges ahead and the proletariat and the peasants rise up to launch a resolute class struggle, this camp will immediately abandon its opposition to the present regime and join the first camp to form a unified bourgeois-landlord, counterrevolutionary alliance.

Nevertheless, because the Reorganization faction still possesses a mild desire to “reform” the GMD, it has not yet entirely shown its true colors to the laboring people. In this sense it is urgent for us to fight resolutely against this faction's reactionary tendency toward compromise so that we can further strengthen the revolutionary struggle and establish proletarian leadership.

Opposed to these two reactionary political camps is the sole revolutionary camp, made up of the proletariat, the peasants, and the urban poor, and led by the working class and its vanguard, the CP.

As a result of the betrayal by the bourgeoisie in 1927 and its submission to imperialism and feudalism, the social basis of the various political groups inside the GMD, particularly the social background of the "GMD-left," has changed drastically. Any attempt to equate uncritically the current different political groups within the GMD with those during the Wuhan period is clearly a thorough opportunist position. By no means must we consider the tentative and conditional separation of the reformists of the intermediate stratum of the national bourgeoisie from the big bourgeoisie-landlord alliance to represent an independent act of the petty bourgeoisie or the revolutionary act of national bourgeois reformists. However, the rightists in the CCP have done just the opposite. They keep talking about the various changes and the new factions appearing in the bourgeois camp but are never willing to do any practical work for the workers and peasants' revolutionary mass movement.

In fact, this reformist faction of the intermediate stratum of the national bourgeoisie did not separate from the Nanjing regime until the latter became completely bankrupt. It is simply a new plot by the Chinese bourgeoisie to get out of the political crisis, reduce the people's will to fight, and slow down the outbreak of the revolution through its claim to attempt to reform the GMD. To this end, the Reorganization faction has described its participation in the warlord war as a struggle for democracy and nationalism, as well as for the restoration of the "true GMD." The real purpose in waving the banner of "reorganizing the GMD" is to save the reactionary bourgeois-landlord forces from doom rather than to wipe out the counterrevolutionary forces.

III) The political reorganization inside the ruling clique and the formation of the Reorganization faction within the GMD indicate that a deep national crisis has occurred in China.

Both the national crisis and the high tide of revolution are the distinguishing characteristics of China's present situation.

Zhang Fakui's act and the war between Chiang Kai-shek and Feng Yuxiang¹⁰⁴ indicate that the national crisis has once again broken out into military and political conflicts. The war between different warlord blocs is the direct continuation of the counterrevolutionary policies of the bourgeoisie-landlord alliance, but objectively it has weakened the regime of the ruling clique, involved the masses of people in political struggle, and inspired them to fight more actively against the imperialist war and its outcome. In this way, the warlord war has helped promote the independent worker-peasant movement.

The peasant war is another factor revealing the national crisis and the high tide of revolution. The reactionary forces of the bourgeoisie and the landlords have failed to wipe out the peasant revolutionary movement. Although uprisings such as that of the Hui nationality and that of the Red Spear Society are led by the reactionaries, objectively they have played a revolutionary role thanks to the participation of the broad masses of the people. Particularly, the mass rural revolution, which has swept over most provinces in China; the soviet movement, which has survived, expanded, and strengthened recently; and the guerrilla war, which has never stopped in the south, have all become the basis for the Chinese revolutionary movement to continue to surge ahead in the future. The most reliable and important sign indicating the continuous progress of the revolutionary struggle, however, is the revival of the labor movement, which has recovered from the serious setback of 1927. Economic strikes by the proletariat have occurred more frequently, and they have gradually turned to political struggle and demonstrations. The development of the labor movement has strengthened the CP, which successfully led the revolutionary demonstrations and strikes on 30 May, 1 August, and 1 September 1927.

Unfortunately, the ideological and political influence of the CP and the extent of organization of the working class lag behind the ever-increasing discontent of the workers, their growing revolutionary enthusiasm and increased spontaneous struggle. Most red trade unions have not yet become mass organizations, while the GMD's yellow trade unions remain powerful. In the north, the Reorganization faction has an even greater influence on the yellow trade unions. So far the CP has not done any serious work among the yellow trade unions or succeeded in uniting around itself the revolutionary labor cadres in major industrial fields. Moreover, the party has not completed the task of winning over the majority of the working class or solved the most important problem at present of how to take over the leadership of the spontaneous economic and political struggles of the proletariat. The party has not yet directly mobilized, organized, and led the broad masses of the people to wage a revolutionary struggle.

Within the CP, the leadership's attitude toward basic issues such as party strategy and policy still seriously wavers. For example, Chen Duxiu's liquidationist group wants to ally with the Reorganization faction and the officials of the yellow trade unions, and there is also the tendency to deny the necessity of supporting and leading the peasant war. These tendencies have jeopardized the party's capacity to lead effectively the independent struggle of the masses in the new situation of the high tide of revolution.

The weakness of the party's work among the masses of the working class—the development of the revolutionary trade unions and the party's organizational capability have lagged behind the rapid development of the spontaneous struggle of the working class—is the greatest danger for the further progress of the revolutionary struggle in China.

IV) The above has analyzed the CCP's current work. As a supplement to the two previous letters (on the peasant question and the trade union question),¹⁰⁵ we think it is necessary to remind you of the following basic tasks that the party faces under the current conditions.

First, we must try our best to take advantage of the present war among the warlords to strengthen the independent revolutionary mass movement. We should make every effort, through publications, leaflets, and oral propaganda among the masses, to expose the reactionary nature of the various factions inside the GMD. The party should call on the people to overthrow all kinds of warlord regimes that dominate the different areas (the Nanjing clique and the Zhang Fakui clique in the south, the Yan Xishan clique, the Feng Yuxiang clique, as well as the Liaoning clique in the north). Slogans such as "Turn the warlord war into the domestic class war" and "Overthrow the regime of the bourgeoisie-landlord alliance" ought to be the main and practical slogans for party propaganda work among the masses.

Second, in the struggle to win over the masses of the people, that is, to gain leadership over the working class, we must aim first of all at the so-called Reorganization faction, which is attempting to make use of the discontent of the masses. This faction is the major danger to the further development of the worker-peasant revolutionary movement at present. We must launch immediately a resolute struggle against it and try to attract as many people as possible to participate in it so as to eliminate all influence of the Reorganization faction and expose its counterrevolutionary nature. We should also work hard to lay bare the schemes of its labor program and land program because in fact these programs are against the interests of the workers and the rural revolution and they protect the system of capitalist exploitation and the landlords' landownership. In particular, we must explain to the people the servile behavior of the Reorganization faction toward the imperialists. Such behavior is reflected clearly in its wild, fascist slander of the Soviet Union during the conflict over the North Manchurian Railway [Chinese Eastern Railway]. We should constantly unmask the pseudo-democracy of the Reorganization faction. For instance, its call for the principle of the "party-right" really means to exclude the masses from participating in political life, and its opposition to Chiang Kai-shek's dictatorship is for the sake of the dictatorship established by other warlords. Obviously, we must never set up any kind of alliance with the Reorganization faction, for if we ally with it, it means we are handing over the leadership of the independent proletarian movement to the reactionary national bourgeois reformists. That will surely cause the failure of the revolutionary struggle. Now it is more important than ever to work hard to establish the independent worker-peasant movement under the direction of our party.

Third, our party ought to pay special attention to the workers' strikes. We must combine the economic struggle with the political struggle, concentrate all our efforts on developing political strikes, and prepare to launch a nationwide, general political strike. In areas where the GMD's reactionary rule is weak and where the revolutionary forces are growing, we should try to draw the revolutionary trade union movement out from its underground status.

Fourth, the party should spend even more energy waging and leading the anti-imperialist struggle, especially the movement against American imperialism. We must use all the savage acts of the imperialists to raise the revolutionary consciousness of the masses, to organize political demonstrations and strikes, and to mobilize the broad masses of the working class to participate in the movement. We must also try to attract the urban petty bourgeoisie to take part in the struggle. In this way it will be able to get rid of the influence of the reformists of the national bourgeoisie. A vigorously developed anti-imperialist struggle will certainly encourage the rising labor movement a great deal and provide it with a revolutionary dynamic. Because of the conflict in Manchuria, it is urgent to organize an open campaign under the slogan to "defend the Soviet Union" and to unmask the true colors of the various factions in the GMD, including the Reorganization faction. They are all the agents of the imperialists.

Fifth, strengthen and expand guerrilla warfare, especially in Manchuria and in the areas where Mao Zedong and He Long have been active. We must fight firmly against the tendency in the party to overlook the revolutionary significance of the peasant struggle (particularly guerrilla warfare), emphasize the importance of military work, capture the weapons of the warlord troops and their supplies in order to arm the worker-peasant forces, seize and consolidate the places that the warlords have abandoned, and build up the soviet base areas in the places where the peasant revolutionary struggle is active and well developed. In areas that have established soviet political power, we should enhance the work to confiscate the land of landlords, arm the peasants, and set up a soviet conference. It is necessary to coordinate the separate operations of the worker-peasant armed forces in Guangdong, Fujian, Hunan, and Hubei; wage actively the mass peasant movement all over the country; and lead and strengthen the daily struggle in the countryside against the GMD, landlords, and the warlords. The party should also improve its work on organizing uprisings such as that of the Hui nationality and the Red Spear Society, try to help the masses of the working class understand the significance of the peasant struggle, and do the best to strengthen proletarian leadership over the peasant movement.

V) Only by improving the fighting capability and the initiative of the communist vanguards of the proletariat can we complete the aforementioned task smoothly. The basic and major task of the CP in the new circumstances is to take over the leadership of the revolutionary movement. In order to avoid repeating the putschist mistakes that we have generally overcome, the party should go all out to enhance and intensify class conflicts, lead the masses to launch insurrections, put forward more advanced goals when conflicts become further intensified, and guide the revolutionary struggle to develop to the more advanced stages. All these tasks require the Communists to unite as one person, act dynamically, recruit boldly the outstanding and brave revolutionary fighters of the proletariat into the party, and oppose firmly any opportunist tendencies to deviate from the party's General Line.

At present, it is more important than ever for the party to uphold a Bolshevik ideology and to wage a resolute struggle against Chen Duxiu's liquidationist program. This program denies the rising revolutionary tide and does not even admit the objective presupposition that the revolutionary high tide will surely arrive.

We must continuously work hard to expose the counterrevolutionary nature of Trotskyism and at the same time point out that the so-called Trotskyite theory of the "socialist" revolution in essence complements the views of the rightist liquidationists. The party must purge from its ranks hidden Trotskyites and liquidationists. The main danger in the party now, however, is right opportunist views and tendencies, because such views and tendencies can weaken the struggle against the Reorganization faction. Seeing the Reorganization faction as the representative of the petty bourgeoisie, these views and tendencies overlook the significance of the peasant war, ignore and hinder the revolutionary enthusiasm and initiatives of the masses, and jeopardize the independent position and leading function of the proletariat and the CP. Because of their capitulationist attitude toward the counterrevolutionary bourgeoisie, such views and tendencies have nothing in common with Leninism and in fact are really intended to deny the right of the proletariat to lead the Chinese revolution. If the CP fails to overcome all kinds of petty bourgeois vacillating viewpoints inside its own ranks, it will not be able to fulfill the role of mobilizing, organizing, and leading the new high tide of the revolution.

C.16 Politburo Decision Concerning Opportunist and Trotskyite Opposition in the Party (5 October 1929)¹⁰⁶

Currently, when the Soviet Union is faced by an extremely serious crisis caused by imperialist attack and our domestic revolutionary struggle has become increasingly tense, the opportunist and Trotskyite opposition inside the party is taking the opportunity to intensify its attacks and sabotage against the party in political, organizational, and all other realms. It was as if its attacks were coordinated with those of our enemy. This is indeed a serious problem. All our party's comrades should clearly realize that only by resolutely eliminating the erroneous ideas and factionalist activities of the opportunists and Trotskyites inside the party can the party's tasks of "supporting the Soviet Union" and leading the revolutionary struggle be smoothly carried out in the present serious situation. At the same time, only by resolutely carrying out the tasks of "supporting the Soviet Union," leading the revolutionary struggle, and promoting the development of the revolution can the thinking of the opportunist and Trotskyite opposition be thoroughly eliminated.

The opportunist and Trotskyite opposition has adopted a liquidationist stand on the fundamental issues of the Chinese revolution. The recent letter from Comrade Chen Duxiu is a very good example.¹⁰⁷ The viewpoint expressed in his letter completely negates the Leninist line that has been consistently pursued by the Comintern in guiding the Chinese revolution and completely negates the basic policies of the Sixth [CCP] Congress and the CC concerning the revolution. It represents an extremely shameful liquidationism.

1) He believes that past opportunism resulted from "the failure to observe the development of the bourgeoisie and its effect on the revolution and its danger and the wrong class analysis of the GMD in particular.” Therefore he totally repudiates the Leninist line of the Comintern that states that in the early stages of national revolution in semicolonial China, it is permissible to ally temporarily with the bourgeoisie and join the GMD. This was the view with which Trotsky attacked the Comintern. The opportunist mistakes in the Chinese revolution were the results of failure to compete with the bourgeoisie for the leadership of the revolution and of making extreme concessions and even shamefully surrendering to the bourgeoisie contrary to the instructions of the Comintern. This transformed the Leninist theory of nationalist revolution in colonial countries pursued by the Comintern into a Menshevik opportunist line. There were no mistakes of the basic line in a temporary alliance with the bourgeoisie and participation in the GMD coalition of various classes at that time. By refusing to learn historical lessons correctly, trying only to avoid responsibilities and even vilifying the basic line of the Comintern as opportunism under the cover of the Trotskyite banner, Comrade Duxiu, like the Trotskyites, has gone further in his opportunist liquidationist views.

2) The fundamental liquidationist viewpoint is expressed in their belief that “the Chinese revolution has failed and the bourgeoisie has won by achieving political superiority over other classes and by gaining concessions and assistance from the imperialists.” According to this view, as the feudal forces have been overcome by the bourgeoisie and the imperialists have made concessions, capitalism should be able to develop smoothly without the hindrance of the feudal forces and economic interference by the imperialists. Politically, without the contradiction between the feudal forces and imperialism, the ruling class will naturally be firm and not shaky. This easy abandonment of the struggle against imperialism and feudal forces naturally leads to the complete abandonment of the entire revolution. In fact, the failure of the Chinese revolution is a defeat not of the proletariat but of the entire bourgeois revolution and the victory of the imperialist and feudal forces. The bourgeoisie may have won victories against the proletariat, but it has yielded to the imperialists, resulting in intensified imperialist aggression against China. Its accommodation with the feudal forces has again led to their temporary recovery. Therefore, the tasks of opposing imperialist and feudal forces have not at all been accomplished. Without the elimination of imperialist and feudal bondage, the present revolution is still bourgeois in nature. As the current contradictions remain unresolved and have intensified rather than abated, a revolutionary upsurge will inevitably come.

3) He holds the view that “the bourgeoisie has won victories against both feudalism and imperialism.” The corollary of his view is that “the current regime is a purely bourgeois one and the GMD is a purely bourgeois party.” History shows that this view is totally erroneous. By betraying the revolution, surrendering to imperialism, and accommodating feudal forces, the bourgeoisie has gained some political power. It has not overthrown imperialist and feudal rule and established the rule of its own class. Therefore, the present ruling class is a coalition of landlords, compradors, and the bourgeoisie under the direction of the imperialists. The GMD is a concrete form of such a coalition that contains all manner of irreconcilable contradictions. Imperialists from various countries are scrambling to rule China; compradores, landlords, and the bourgeoisie are competing for the leadership of the counterrevolution, and warlords from different regions are competing for territories and causing endless wars. Thus, day by day, the coalition is moving toward collapse.

4) He does not understand this view and has reached the very strange conclusion that no contradictions exist between the bourgeoisie and the feudal forces and that the fighting among warlords is caused by clashes between various bourgeois factions such as between heavy industrial and light industrial capital. This statement reveals his ignorance of basic economic knowledge. Economic reasons may cause conflict of interest and political factionalization within the bourgeoisie in a country, but will not result in civil war. Their close economic interdependence overrides their contradictions. All civil wars in countries that transformed from a backward agricultural state to a capitalist one inevitably exhibit the contradictions between the bourgeois and feudal forces, e.g., the American Civil War for the emancipation of black slaves and the Japanese Southwest War to overthrow the feudal system. Comrade Duxiu treats all these wars as internal wars of the bourgeoisie. This is unheard of! Fighting among the warlords in semicolonial China is mainly the consequence of clashes among the imperialists and reflects the contradictions between the bourgeoisie and feudal forces. For example, both sides in the current anti-Chiang [Kai-shek] war are cliques of compradores, landlords, and bourgeoisie. However, the bourgeoisie on the different sides support the war only to expand its spheres of influence. The feudal forces on the different sides also serve their own class interests by using warlords to preserve their feudal exploitative position. However, the bourgeoisie on both sides must accommodate the feudal forces and collude with the imperialists, thus playing a counterrevolutionary role. Therefore, such wars are devoid of any revolutionary significance and are out-and-out reactionary.

5) Proceeding from abstract views and disregarding facts, his economic analysis asserts that "feudal forces have experienced the final assault with the encroachment of commercial capital and expansion in the rural areas of the imperialist commodity economy, especially after the Great Revolution. They are only remnant feudal forces." They can no longer maintain their feudal exploitation, and they "try hard to become the bourgeoisie." The conclusion is that "feudal forces have completely submitted themselves to bourgeois leadership and have no contradictions with the bourgeoisie." This is simply an illusion. Even after a lengthy period of change (mainly caused by erosion by commercial capital and peasants' uprisings), although capitalist landownership has acquired a dominant position, land relationships in China are still mainly characterized by the exploitative or feudal relationship between landlords and peasants. The imperialist commodity economy has hit the rural areas like a thunderstorm, crushing the seminatural economy and shaking feudal landlords. However, the landlords' feudal exploitation of the peasantry has become more ruthless. The Great Revolution dealt a heavy blow to such exploitation, and the revolution's defeat caused another temporary recovery in this feudalist exploitative relationship, affording an opportunity for the landlord class to relax. In the current situation in China, the factors that dominate the national economy are: (a) the encroachment of the imperialist commodity economy; (b) feudal exploitation; (c) capitalist exploitation by the Chinese bourgeoisie. Although the bourgeoisie attempts to develop capitalism and feudal landlords want to transform themselves into the bourgeoisie, they are both restricted by imperialism, thus frustrating the hopes of the feudalists. Therefore, the bourgeoisie must continue its struggle to reform their political programs. (However, the fear of liberating workers and peasants means that the struggle will inevitably be based on collusion with imperialism and accommodation with feudalist forces.) It is a clear objective fact that the feudal forces will intensify their efforts to maintain their feudal exploitation. Any person who can do away with illusions and prejudices and carefully study Chinese economic relations will understand this correct viewpoint.

6) Therefore, there are different meanings between what he acknowledges as "the possibility of another revolutionary upsurge" and what the Sixth [Party] Congress and the CC point out as "the inevitability of the revolutionary upsurge." The directive of the Sixth Congress implies that the bourgeois revolution has failed totally, with imperialism continuing its extremely brutal rule over China and the feudal class still stepping up its ruthless exploitation. With the bourgeoisie failing to win concessions from imperialist and feudal forces and escalating its attacks against the workers, the masses of suffering people have no alternative but to rise up in a revolutionary upsurge to oppose the imperialist and feudal forces. Thus, the present rise of anti-imperialist and feudal forces. Thus, the present rise of anti-imperialist movements, the development of workers' struggles, and the continual peasant uprisings are in no way "the opposite side of the revolutionary upsurge." They are obvious signals of a new revolutionary upsurge. They (Chen Duxiu et al.) refuse to accept this premise and hold that imperialism has retreated and even helped the bourgeoisie develop capitalism (therefore so-called imperialism trampling on China is merely empty words), and that there is no feudal exploitation. There will be no democratic revolution against imperialism and feudalism, only the workers' revolution against the capitalists. They deny that the current mass movement against imperialism and the continual peasant uprisings are signals of a revolutionary upsurge, and they deny the existence of revolutionary signs. The fundamental contradictions pointed out by the Sixth Congress and the CC remain unsolved, and thus the ruling class is heading toward an upsurge. They deny the fact that the ruling class is in a shaky situation and that the revolutionary struggle is beginning to revive. All they recognize is the contradiction between workers and capital. At the same time, they believe that the present workers' struggle is "only the opposite side of the revolutionary upsurge." Therefore the "strong possibility of another revolutionary upsurge" is a statement of no significance to practical policies, just like statements such as "we shall inevitably win the final victory" and "communism will certainly triumph in the end." They hold that the "liquidationist viewpoint argues that the revolutionary upsurge will never come.” The argument that the revolutionary upsurge will never come is not only a liquidationist viewpoint, but also an illusion of a mad person or of the bourgeoisie. The so-called liquidationist viewpoint is none other than their belief that the ruling class is not in a shaky position and that the revolutionary upsurge will only occur after the ruling class has consolidated its position.

7) According to his view, which denies the shaky position of the ruling class and the revival of revolutionary struggle, what will inevitably come is not a revolutionary upsurge but the consolidation of the position of the ruling class. A policy line based on this point of view will naturally tend toward adopting legal actions and replacing the soviet banner with calls for a “national conference.” However, Comrade Duxiu is very timid and does not dare, like Trotsky, to advocate openly legal movements and a national conference. He only attacked the line of the party CC in a passive way, denouncing the CC’s call for demonstrations on “30 May” and “1 August” as reckless and playful actions. They refrain from publicly putting forward any positive proposals. In fact, according to their view, only legal struggles and compliance with the law are not reckless. That is why he borrowed Lenin’s words “bloodless legal measures” to reveal his own view. If his stand were similar to that of Lenin in his time, he would not consider the CC’s actions reckless. Yet the CC opposes only legalism (bloody legal measures) and does not renounce all legal methods that can be employed. Furthermore, it positively points out the need for using open and legal possibilities to mobilize and organize the broad masses. However, since the ruling class is heading toward collapse and the mass struggle is beginning to revive, it is not enough to rely only on legal possibilities to organize the masses and to focus attention only on leading the routine struggle of the masses. It is necessary to lead the mass struggle toward political demonstrations so as to expand the party’s political influence among the people. If these actions are called reckless, it is only in terms of his liquidationist methods derived from his liquidationist views, which are fundamentally no different from the slogans of the third party.

8) Their analysis of China’s rural economy asserts that the rural economic relationships are basically ones of capitalist exploitation and that the essential contradiction in the rural areas is the struggle between farm laborers and poor peasants, on the one hand, and rich peasants and commercial usurious capital, on the other. They give secondary importance to feudal exploitation by landlords. They even treat this as insignificant. Therefore, they believe that “rich peasants are reactionaries, that middle peasants are the vacillating elements in the center, and that only farm laborers and poor peasants are the pillars of the revolution.” Based on this belief, their policy line is one of uniting poor peasants, neutralizing middle peasants, and opposing rich peasants. This is another liquidationist concept with regard to the rural revolution and policies of rural struggle. In fact, the main economic relationship in China’s rural areas is the feudal exploitation of the broad masses of peasants by landlords and warlords. The exploitation by commercial usurious capital is carried out only in conjunction with the exploitation of peasants by the landlord class through tenancy and is carried out mainly by large-scale gentry landlords. The exploitation of farm laborers by rich peasants is of only secondary importance in the entire rural economic relationship. Therefore, the key contradiction in the rural areas is the confrontation between the broad masses of peasants and the landlord class. The Chinese peasants, however, engage in an exploitation characterized partially by that of landlords and partially by feudalism. As a result, they cannot resolutely participate in the struggle to oppose feudalism. At present, peasants ranging from farm laborers to middle peasants are all revolutionary masses under feudal exploitation; rich peasants are vacillating elements or even reactionaries. Therefore, our main slogan of struggle in the countryside is rural revolution, and the tactics of struggle are to rely on farm laborers as the foundation, to unite with middle peasants, and to oppose rich peasants. If we do not use the slogan of opposing feudal exploitation by warlords and landlords as our central slogan, we cannot mobilize the broad masses of people. If we do not form a strong alliance with the middle peasants, we shall weaken the revolutionary forces and shall in no way be able to overthrow the ruling class. Therefore, their policies are the best methods of abandoning revolution.

9) The extent of democratization of the party depends on objective and subjective conditions. When faced by objective conditions such as the extremely serious white terror, to demand democratization beyond what is possible is only to "help the tsarist gendarme," as Lenin once said. When the subjective proletarian basis is weak, to expand democratization in the party will only permit the petty bourgeois tendency of vacillation and accommodation to grow inside the party. At present, the situation of the CCP is that subjectively the revolutionary foundation is still weak while objectively the white terror has never been so brutal, domestically and externally, in history. The revolutionary struggle has become extremely tense, with the party facing the warlords' war domestically and the war against the Soviet Union internationally. At the present time, demanding open discussion of all manner of opinions, the publication of views opposed to the decisions of the National Congress in the party newspapers, and the holding of democratic elections from the party branch level to the CC level is tantamount to requiring the party to abandon its concrete tasks of revolutionary struggle in the present situation, to indulge in empty talk, and to relax the party's strong rules on organizational secrecy, enabling the police to engage in large-scale sabotage. To call the CC's demand that the entire party membership obey party decisions and coordinate their actions according to party policies "commandism" or "the habit of commandism" is out-and-out anarchist thinking. One should not allow a Leninist party's fundamental principle of submitting to the majority and to all decisions and instructions of superior party organizations to be undermined by such anarchist ideas. The proposal for peace inside our party is a demand that the party give up its criticism of all incorrect tendencies and let these tendencies develop inside the party. Smearing the CC as using "police tactics" is nothing less than the worst method of sowing discord learned from Trotsky's attack on the Russian party. More's the pity that this is a foolish act, because using these words in the context of the CCP will only cause all party comrades to respond with sneers and anger.

In light of the above analysis, their viewpoints and line have been consistently liquidationist. Their analysis of the causes of failure of the revolution runs counter to the entire line of the Comintern; their analysis of the Chinese economic and political situation implies abandoning the struggle against imperialism and feudal forces and the rural revolution; their analysis of the revolutionary situation denies the shaky position of the ruling class and the revival of the revolutionary struggle, thus fundamentally abandoning revolution. Therefore, it is natural for them to propose the tactics of abandoning all illegal struggles and suggest that strikes and demonstrations are all willful and reckless actions. Organizationally, it is natural for them to foster anarchist ideas, rejecting discipline and compliance with the decisions and instructions of superior party organizations and advocating internal peace and freedom to propagate all erroneous ideas inside the party. This is a complete opportunist and Trotskyite policy line. It is in very obvious opposition to the Comintern, the Sixth Congress, the CC, and the entire party.

The CC holds that the development of such ideas inside the party will not only jeopardize the implementation of the party's urgent current revolutionary tasks, but may also lead to the disintegration and demise of the party. The CC calls on the entire party membership to stand firmly by the decisions of the Comintern, the Sixth Congress, and the CC to oppose resolutely such liquidationist ideas and to work for their complete elimination.

There is a serious tendency toward compromise inside the party. For example, it is argued that because "Trotskyism is a system of theories," "we should not criticize it in a simplistic manner," and that "although they are wrong, the CC is not entirely correct either." Such views are held by comrades who are muddle-headed. They urge relaxation of the party's attack on liquidationists and cover up the development of liquidationist ideas within the party. They attempt to shake the party's will to fight for the correct principles and the Leninist line by focusing on certain technical and nonpolitical issues. Their difference with the liquidationists is like that between 50 percent and 100 percent. Both are weakening the party's line. Without eradicating the tendency toward compromise, it is impossible to carry out the struggle against the liquidationists. Therefore, the struggles against ideas of compromise and against liquidationism are of equal importance.

The organizational principle of a Bolshevik party requires that before convening a new national congress, the entire party membership must absolutely obey the decisions of the last congress and opinions contrary to those decisions are in no way allowed to be freely discussed within the party. At the present time when the revolutionary struggle is extremely tense, to promote discussion of views different from the principles of the party will undoubtedly obstruct the revolutionary struggle and undermine the party, thus helping the enemy. Therefore, the CC believes that these ideas must be eliminated quickly and that it is even more important not to let such discussions weaken the leadership of the mass struggle.

Now, the opportunist and Trotskyite opposition has not only deliberately provoked discussions in the party, but has also engaged in factionalist behavior. The opposition has printed and circulated its secret publications inside the party. Comrade Duxiu also circulated his letter [8 August 1929] to the CC freely among the comrades before the CC made a decision on the matter. This is an act of sabotage against the party which cannot be tolerated by a Leninist party. Therefore, the CC has made the following organizational decisions.

a) Party organizations at all levels must immediately disband any such factions as soon as they are discovered, and comrades who participate in such factions must be subjected to organizational sanctions.

b) After discussions, those who still persist with their liquidationist ideas, refuse to implement the party's tactics and policies, and disobey decisions will be unequivocally expelled from the party.

c) Comrade Duxiu must immediately comply with the CC's decisions, accept the CC's warning, work in accordance with the party line, and cease all antiparty propaganda and activities.

In the CC's opinion, the above decisions in the current tense situation of revolutionary struggle are the essential means through which the party can resolutely exercise its leadership of the revolutionary struggle. The CC calls on all comrades in the party to unite in supporting the CC's decisions and eliminating the liquidationist ideas and all antiparty factions within the party.

C.17 An Outline of Our Political Views. Chen Duxiu et al. (15 December 1929)¹⁰⁸

I) The Cause of the Past Failures of the Chinese Revolution— The Comintern's Opportunist Leadership

Since Comrade Lenin's illness and death, a serious opportunist crisis has occurred in the leadership of the Comintern and the Soviet CP controlled by Zinoviev, Stalin, and Bukharin. Politically, they have used the conservative theory of building socialism in one country to replace proletarian internationalism. They have used Soviet bureaucratic diplomatic strategy to replace the world revolutionary class struggle. They have used the strategy of compromise with top leaders to replace that of developing the revolutionary mass struggle at the grass roots. They have used the Menshevik strategy of allying and supporting the bourgeoisie to replace the Bolshevik strategy of independent leadership of the peasant revolution by the proletariat. Finally, they have used the Menshevik mechanical theory of developing revolution by stages to replace the theory of continuous revolution. Organizationally, they have used bureaucratic and authoritative formalism to replace proletarian democratic centralism. In this way, they have ruined the consciousness and initiative of the proletarian fighters in their political activities. [[These errors led to the defeat of the German revolution and the Bulgarian revolution in 1923, the ruin of the revolutionary labor movement in Britain, and caused the huge crisis in the Soviet Union.]] However, the most disastrous defeat under the opportunist direction of Stalin and Bukharin was that of the Great Chinese Revolution from 1925 to 1927.

In general, the failure of the 1925-27 Chinese revolution was caused by the fundamentally erroneous understanding of the counterrevolutionary nature of the bourgeoisie and the class distinction of the GMD. This erroneous understanding led to adoption of the wrong strategy, that is, helping and supporting the bourgeoisie while forbidding the Chinese proletariat to establish a genuine independent political party of its own which could consistently lead the revolution through to the end.

[[The GMD is a typical bourgeois political party as revealed by its actions, policies, etc. Its advocacy of world revolution, support for the interests of workers and peasants, and alliance with the Soviet Union is only a trick to win the proletariat's sympathy and help. Without an independent party, the proletariat has often fought on behalf of the bourgeoisie, only later to be suppressed by it.]]

Unfortunately, directed by the erroneous policy of the Comintern and the CCP, the Chinese proletariat became nothing more than an unconscious tool of the bourgeoisie and fought as a coolie for the bourgeoisie to overthrow the rule of the northern warlords, the bureaucrats, the compradores, and the capitalists, for only the bourgeoisie could make a deal with the imperialists. As soon as it controlled power, the bourgeois GMD began to persecute its former supporters—the proletariat—using unprecedented white terror. In this sense, our participation in the GMD and long cooperation with it have achieved nothing. On the contrary, it concealed from the proletarian masses the bourgeois reactionary intentions of the GMD, caused the vigilance of the workers and peasants against the enemy to slacken, raised the GMD's political position, and helped the bourgeoisie establish and consolidate its rule over the workers and peasants. As a result, the GMD is finally able to slaughter the workers and peasants in large numbers and its regime is surprisingly strong.

[[Because of our policy toward the GMD, our desire to stay in it and forge a long-term class alliance, we made endless concessions. For example, the 1924 decision that a GMD international liaison committee should examine first any policies and orders from the Comintern to the CCP. Also, there was the capitulation to Chiang Kai-shek after he launched the 20 March 1926 coup.]]

These facts indicate that by then the bourgeoisie had already openly forced the proletariat to obey its leadership and follow its direction. There was no alliance at all. Despite such circumstances, however, the Comintern continued to restrain the proletariat from acting independently in the face of bourgeois attacks. Moreover, it chose the most shameful capitulatory policy: sternly forbidding the CCP to withdraw from the GMD while not even allowing us to make preparations. Further, it spared no effort to arm Chiang Kai-shek. The Comintern representative [Borodin] also fiercely insisted that we use all our strength to assist and support Chiang Kai-shek's military dictatorship. From that time onward, the proletariat submitted to the bourgeoisie and degenerated into complete dependence on the bourgeoisie. After Chiang Kai-shek launched the massacre on 12 April 1927, the Comintern continued to support Feng Yuxiang and Wang Jingwei, claiming that Feng was from a working-class background and Wang was the leader of the rural revolution. The Comintern continued to oppose CCP withdrawal from the GMD in order to establish Soviet political power. Prior to Chiang Kai-shek's betrayal, the Comintern ordered us to replace strikes with labor-capitalist arbitration and to avoid clashes with Chiang's army. Afterward, it forbade us to confiscate the land of army officers in the rural revolution and ordered us to restrain the party's power and limit the so-called extremist activities of the workers and peasants. Finally, when the whole GMD had openly turned counterrevolutionary, the Comintern ordered us to withdraw only from the Nationalist government but not from the party. Even the Nanchang Uprising was launched in the name of the GMD-left. Such a policy forced the CCP to rip up its own banner, obey GMD leadership, and become its tool in restraining the workers and peasants. From beginning to end, such a policy was clearly one of unprecedented and most shameful opportunism and obviously betrayed class interests. In no way was it similar to the policy adopted by the Bolsheviks in 1905, which firmly opposed any compromise with the bourgeoisie, led the peasants to act independently, made preparations for armed insurrection to seize power, and practiced the worker-peasant democratic dictatorship.

After the Comintern forced the CCP to merge with the GMD organizationally and claimed that "the idea of overthrowing GMD leadership represents a dangerous tendency of skipping a stage in the development of the revolution," how could it later accuse the CCP of giving up its organizational and political independence? In fact, ordering us to join the GMD ruined our independence and jeopardized our ability to carry out an independent policy. In following the Comintern's opportunist policy, the CCP had to submit bit by bit to the GMD and give up its organizational and political independence. This is an obvious and logical truth. How could we maintain any kind of independence while observing the Comintern's instructions on these practical issues?!

The bankrupt policy of the Comintern toward the GMD was made on the basis of its fundamentally erroneous understanding of the relationship between the bourgeoisie in the colonial countries and the imperialists. It thought that since the bourgeoisie in the colonial countries needed the revolution to resist the oppression of the imperialists, this would surely make the various progressive classes in the country form a united front for the national revolution. Thus, the Comintern regarded the GMD as the form for such a united front and called it "the alliance of various classes" or "the alliance of four classes." However, the GMD was an organizational mixture of different classes rather than an alliance formed by two independent political parties for joint action at a certain period or in a certain movement. The Comintern did not understand that imperialism had penetrated into China's capital and markets so deeply that the Chinese bourgeoisie had to rely on the imperialists both economically and politically for its very survival. Hence, the immature Chinese bourgeoisie would have to exploit more cruelly the workers and peasants in order to resist industrial and commercial competition from the more advanced imperialist countries. This meant that a clash between the Chinese bourgeoisie and the workers and peasants was inevitable and made class war in China all the more likely. The initial motive of the bourgeoisie for participating in the national revolution was to bring the worker-peasant movement under its control and use it to bargain with the imperialists to gain maximum benefit for its own class. (The past policy of the Comintern only provided the bourgeoisie with such an opportunity.) However, once the bourgeoisie discovered that the masses of workers and peasants had acted in accordance with their own class interests, taken the leadership of the revolution into their own hands, and begun to violate the interests of the bourgeoisie, it realized immediately that in comparison with the imperialists, the worker-peasant revolution represented a more serious and fundamental danger. Thus, the bourgeoisie quickly turned against the revolution. Such a change was inevitable because of the class distinction of the Chinese bourgeoisie. We can conclude from the above analysis that the oppression of the imperialists could only intensify the domestic class struggle but would never ease it or pave the way for class alliance. In essence, the GMD is a tool used by the bourgeoisie to deceive the masses of the people. It advocated the abstract idea of "the national revolution" (under the condition that we would abandon the struggle against the bourgeoisie) for the purpose of blunting the vigilance of the workers and peasants so that they would not organize their own independent armed forces and merely fight to seize the power for the bourgeoisie. In this way, the bourgeoisie could take power alone. After achieving this goal, it immediately began to slaughter the workers and peasants. This is an overt reality which no one can deny.

The other reason why we participated in and remained in the GMD was that we wanted to use it to win over the masses of the petty bourgeoisie and ally ourselves with them. This is also a typical example of the opportunist attitude. The most reliable ally of the proletariat is the lower petty bourgeoisie, that is, the impoverished people in urban and rural areas. Assuredly, as the revolution develops and the situation changes, the proletariat will unite all the revolutionary elements. Nevertheless, we must always first of all aim at winning over the poor people, particularly the masses of the working people, rather than the democratic parties led by the bourgeoisie or the upper petty bourgeoisie. In order to attract the broad masses of the working people to our side, the proletariat should, above all, have its own independent political position and clear-cut aims. Sometimes we may or even have to ally with the bourgeois democrats for a certain limited program. Nevertheless, we must always keep in mind that the essential function of such an alliance is to use our independent political position to expose the compromising and fraudulent nature of the bourgeois democrats so as to make clear our party's political influence upon the broad masses of the working people. We should not conceal our political identity or yield to the bourgeois democrats, still less merge with them organizationally for the sake of “concentrating revolutionary strength”!

[[Both Lenin and Marx had supported alliance rather than merger with other political parties.]] The Comintern completely abandoned the instructions of Marx and Lenin in its past policy toward the GMD and followed the ideas of the Second International. It asked us to perform within the GMD. Such an alliance based on an organizational merger restrained our actions and confused our political identity. It could not help us to attract the broad masses but could help us to lose people from our own class.

The best form for the proletariat to build an alliance with the petty bourgeoisie—the impoverished people in urban and rural areas—at the climax of the revolution is through the soviet, that is, the soviet congress comprising representatives elected by the workers, peasants, urban poor, and soldiers. Its task is to arm the masses and it functions as the leading organ directing the people to seize power in the political struggle. At the climax of the revolution, the leadership of the Comintern abandoned completely the interests of the working people in order to follow the big bourgeoisie and the upper petty bourgeoisie, dreaming that it would be possible to form a united front with them. It followed the GMD’s political program for struggle and accused anyone who disagreed with the idea of being an “extremist.” It left all the organizations of the peasants, shop assistants, and small merchants to the GMD and forbade us to establish a soviet government. The leaders of the Comintern even claimed: “At this stage, the function of the GMD in the Chinese revolution is just like that of the soviet congress in the Russian revolution in 1905.” “The GMD in Wuhan is the center of the revolutionary movement.” “The Wuhan government is revolutionary.” “It would be of direct help to Chiang Kai-shek and Zhang Zuolin if you began to set up the soviet right now, refuse to support the Wuhan regime and plan to overthrow it, and put forward the slogan of establishing a dual-power government” (Stalin). Bukharin also declared that “even in the future when China enters the stage of the proletarian revolution, you can still use the GMD as the state form for the proletarian dictatorship.” These wrong views of the Comintern leaders were caused by their blind trust in the Menshevik theory of developing the revolution by stages. Without analyzing the content of the GMD’s national regime and the circumstances of the rapid development of the mass revolutionary struggle at that time, they blindly opposed the establishment of the soviet government, and they entirely failed to understand that not only the GMD in Nanjing had openly turned counterrevolutionary, but that the GMD and the Nationalist government in Wuhan had also gradually moved over to the reactionary camp, particularly after the “Horse Day” incident [21 May 1927]. From this time, there was no difference between the Wuhan regime and Chiang Kai-shek and Zhang Zuolin because by now the GMD and the bourgeoisie (including all the big and small capitalists who exploited the laborers) had already ended their participation in the democratic revolution. Meanwhile the worker-peasant movement, which both the Comintern and the GMD had accused of “having gone too far,” had broken up the supraclass alliance, moved beyond the scope of the bourgeois democratic revolution, and developed from the democratic stage into the stage of the socialist revolution. Also, the nature of the revolution had begun to change. Our party should have withdrawn immediately from the GMD and acted independently, at least after the March 20 incident [1926]. We should have started to organize the soviet at the beginning of the Northern Expedition in the areas that had been taken over by the Northern Expedition Army. We should have established immediately the soviet government to confront the GMD regime at least after the April 12 incident [1927] and have moved from the stage of dual-power government to the struggle to overthrow the counterrevolutionary nationalist regime and to set up the proletarian dictatorship. In that way, we could have completed the mission of the democratic revolution on the one hand while marching toward socialism on the other. The leadership of the Comintern, however, did not think so. They rigidly adhered to the doctrine of the democratic revolution, constantly retaining their blind faith in the GMD, and dreamed of using the democratic party composed of the big bourgeoisie and the upper petty bourgeoisie to replace the soviet, which represented the workers and the impoverished people in urban and rural areas. At this time, the CCP CC did not make an effort to withdraw from the GMD or establish the soviet to overthrow the leadership of the GMD. On the contrary, it admitted in both the declaration drawn up by the Comintern representative and the message from the Peasant Department that the peasants had “gone too far,” and it even volunteered to disarm the pickets of the Federation of Trade Unions in Hankou in order to avoid any clashes with the GMD army. These are all terrible mistakes. Not until the entire GMD had openly started to attack us and the revolutionary movement had suffered complete defeat did the Comintern and our party’s leaders suddenly think of the slogan of the soviet and decide to use it in a desperate attempt to seize political power.

A revolutionary party ought to be good at organizing both attack and defense. However, when the workers and peasants were slaughtered by the GMD at Canton, Changsha, and Hankou, our party was not able to launch any effective counterattack. The democratic bourgeoisie had already joined the reactionary camp, all the domestic and foreign reactionary forces had joined together, and the revolution had apparently met with total failure. In these circumstances, the party should have begun a strategic retreat as soon as possible to preserve our fighting capability, reorganize our class ranks, and accumulate our strength for future battles. But what the party did was just the opposite. Stalin and Bukharin, the leaders of the Soviet CP and the Comintern, made a desperate attempt to save their opportunist policy from bankruptcy through proletarian armed insurrections and by silencing criticism from the opposition. They sent their trusted subordinate [Lominadze], in the name of the Comintern, as their special representative to China to manipulate “the August 7 Conference.” The Conference did not systematically analyze or correct the real nature of the opportunist mistakes. It still insisted that there were four main reasons for us to stay in the GMD and that we should remain under the Blue Sky and Bright

Sun banner of the GMD-left. On the other hand, the Comintern representative brought with him these messages from Moscow: “The Chinese revolution is still surging ahead”; and “China has reached the stage of the direct revolution.”¹⁰⁹ Translated and relayed to the party by Qu Qiubai, Zhou Enlai, and Li Weiha, these messages helped bring about putschism. The party leaders thought that armed insurrections alone were the correct Bolshevik line and that only they and those who agreed with them were genuine Bolsheviks. They used such charges as “opportunist remnants” and “wrong viewpoint” to persecute any comrade who showed even slight suspicion about the “climax of the revolution” and the political line of the CC or who acted more cautiously with respect to armed insurrection. Reorganizing party committees at all levels and carrying out a new political line, the so-called general policy of the armed insurrection, they strictly forbade anyone who disagreed with the new line to register as a party member and even expelled from the party those who were already registered. Apart from ordering party organizations to launch the insurrections, they also asked the masses to act at once without making any preparations. Hence, a putschist atmosphere prevailed, and insurrections, big and small, were launched throughout the country wherever there were party organizations. The period from the “August 7 Conference” to “the Sixth Congress” was one of insurrections. During this period the party’s leading organ accomplished nothing except for closely following the Comintern’s instructions and using “the absolutely correct line of the CC” to help in reality the GMD destroy thoroughly the organizations and strength of the workers and peasants. As a result, even today we have not yet recovered from the defeat and are unable to resume the revolutionary struggle. Party organizations have been ruined and the party’s political position has so degenerated that it is merely a symbol for “murder and arson.”

Opportunism caused the defeat of the Chinese revolution, putschism completed the defeat, and the post-Sixth Congress line further consolidated the defeat and paved the way for the new disaster in the next revolution.

II) Current Conditions and the Party’s Crisis— Opportunism, Putschism, and Bureaucratism

The CCP’s Sixth Congress, under the direct leadership of the Comintern, avoided analyzing the fundamental mistakes of the opportunist policy implemented by the CCP CC during the climax of the revolution—mistakes such as the failure to make a timely withdrawal from the GMD, following the GMD’s leadership, and refusing to organize the soviet. This was because analysis of these mistakes would have meant dealing with the very essence of the Comintern’s policy toward the Chinese revolution. As a result, only three major problems were mentioned at the Sixth Congress: first, the party failed to act independently and did not carry out proper criticism; second, it failed to understand the necessity to transform the revolution from one stage to another; and third, it was unable to develop itself as the center for the revolutionary movement of the broad masses. In fact, this implies that there was nothing wrong with the Comintern's opportunist policy but only with the technical mistakes made by the CCP in implementing the policy. Therefore, the new political line decided by the Sixth Congress under the direction of the Comintern claimed that the Chinese revolution in the future would still be a bourgeois democratic revolution, the nature of the future political power should be the worker-peasant democratic dictatorship, and furthermore that there must not be an intense struggle against the rich peasants but rather that we should unite with them because they still desired the revolution. Although the Sixth Congress loudly called for struggle against opportunism, the various practical policies adopted demonstrated continuance of a typical opportunist political line. The Sixth Congress adopted the same attitude toward putschism. Verbally it emphasized its determination to oppose putschism, but since it had to cover up the putschist direction of the Comintern, the Sixth Congress did not point out that it was fundamentally wrong for the CCP to choose a policy of insurrection throughout the country at a time when the revolution had been defeated. What the Sixth Congress did was to blame the CCP for implementing mechanically the policy of insurrection, lacking preparation, and being careless in directing the insurrections. Thus, there were technical mistakes made by the CCP while carrying out the Comintern's policy of insurrection. [[This view can be clearly seen in the political resolution of the Sixth Congress. A new revolutionary upsurge has recently been reconfirmed by the Comintern [see above, Doc. C.15]. This attests to the Comintern's attempts to foist a putschist line on the CCP.]]

Thus far we have not yet thoroughly exposed the essence of the whole opportunist line; that is why we cannot learn the lessons of the past failures of the revolution and that is why our party's present political line continues to be an opportunist one. Moreover, since we are unable to make a correct estimation of the present revolutionary movement and lack a deep understanding of the situation at this moment, the present practical line of the party is still a putschist one. The gradually broken political and practical lines have inevitably affected the present organizational policy of the party. This has followed the example of the Soviet CP and relies on stern bureaucratic rule to suppress criticism from average party members and to preserve the prestige of a few leaders. None of these problems originated with the CCP but are all imposed by the leading organ of the Comintern controlled by Stalin and Bukharin. Lacking systematic training in Marxist theory and class struggle, the CCP itself does not possess the capability to devise any new theories or formulate any new policies. In this sense, it is only natural to discover that its major erroneous theories and policies, both in the past and at present, are all handed down from the Comintern. To be sure, the former party leadership should also be blamed for these problems, because it neither perceived the opportunist nature of the theories and policies of the Comintern nor made any protest against them but carried them out faithfully and shamefully. However, the party's present leadership continues to stick obstinately to and defend consciously the opportunist and putschist line of the Comintern despite the fact that the Opposition has clearly pointed out the mistakes. The vital point is to understand them thoroughly, correct them completely, and participate firmly in the struggle against opportunism and putschism. Only in this way can we make a significant contribution to the revolution. This is the correct road for us to take.

At present, the opportunist political line is represented by the viewpoint of the Comintern and the CCP CC, which holds that the future nature of the Chinese revolution is still bourgeois democratic rather than a proletarian socialist revolution, and that future political power in China ought to be the worker-peasant democratic government rather than proletarian dictatorship. They argue that the bourgeoisie in China does not yet have control of political power, that China is still ruled by the feudal class, Chinese society is still feudal or semifeudal and dominated by the feudal social elements, and that the present civil war in China is still one between the bourgeoisie and feudal forces. This point of view is no different from that of the reformists in the Third Party and even that of Chiang Kai-shek. Both now advocate a struggle against feudal forces.

[[The Third Party has made this clear in its recent political declaration.]]

We believe that anyone who thinks that China is still a feudal society dominated by feudal forces and who attributes the reactionary nature of the bourgeoisie and all its reactionary behavior to the influence of the feudal elements is not only talking nonsense and harboring illusions about the bourgeoisie but also is deliberately acting as the defender of the bourgeoisie! In fact, economically the feudal system in China has collapsed, the land is owned by free landlords and free farmers, and political power is controlled by the state. All these changes happened earlier than in any of the European countries. The foreign capitalists have broken down the Great Wall of China.

[[Chinese society has already been transformed into a bureaucratic-compradore capitalist society, and the country has entered the era of large-scale national industrialization and capitalization. The production and consumption of commercial goods and the monetary economy have reached even the most remote rural areas and have eliminated completely the natural economy. The urban economy thoroughly controls the countryside. As a result, landlords have become capitalists using their land as personal capital rather than for feudal exploitation. Politically, the bourgeoisie controls power, and the development of the mass struggle had gone "far beyond the bourgeois democratic stage."]]

In short, the Chinese revolution from 1925 to 1927 is in reality a rehearsal of the future third great Chinese revolution. The performance of the different classes and their changed positions during the second revolution have provided us with rich materials that will enable us to foresee the situation of the third Chinese revolution. The aims of the democratic revolution (national independence, unification of the country, and rural revolution) of the Chinese bourgeoisie can only be completed when the working people in both urban and rural areas have seized political power under the leadership of the proletariat. In other words, in order to complete the Chinese bourgeoisie's democratic revolution, we should take the road of the Russian October Revolution. The Chinese bourgeoisie has been linked so closely and inseparably with the economy of foreign capitalism in both city and countryside that we can never expect it to fight against the imperialists and to distribute land to the poor peasants, especially not with the current landownership. Moreover, once the climax of the revolution arrives, the bourgeoisie will surely oppose the "extreme" activities of the workers and peasants. Thus, no possibility exists for the proletariat to cooperate with the bourgeoisie. Meanwhile, in order to smash the economic basis of the bourgeoisie and consolidate the proletarian dictatorship, as soon as the proletariat seizes power, it should act at once to confiscate both the Chinese and foreign banks, as well as the big factories and enterprises, and break up private property ownership.

In the countryside, the rich peasants are the focus of the hatred of the poor peasants and farmhands. This is because while the land is controlled by the capitalist landlords, most rich peasants are both usurers and commercial exploiters, and thus have become the targets of the revolution for the poor peasants. In this sense, it is absolutely impossible to form a united front with the rich peasants in the countryside. We should lead the poor peasants to fight against the rich peasants and neutralize the middle peasants. Once the climax of the next revolution arrives, we must immediately mobilize the masses of the people to strive for the proletarian dictatorship rather than to ally with the petty bourgeoisie for a democratic dictatorship based on private property ownership. The democratic dictatorship has already degenerated into a reactionary slogan which can provide the theoretical basis for the opportunists and the petty bourgeois parties to form an alliance and restrain the development of the mass revolutionary struggle. Guided by such an opportunist theory and political line, the Comintern and the CCP CC met with shameful and miserable failures in the past. Now they are going to repeat the same serious errors and will surely meet with even more shameful and miserable defeat.

The present political and practical line of putschism is reflected in the fact that it is not admitted that the bourgeoisie has triumphed and the past revolution has been totally defeated. Under the slogan "the revolutionary high tide will come soon," workers are forced to strike, enlarging every small economic struggle into a big political battle, and party members are consistently ordered to lead the masses in street demonstrations. Party groups and branches are not allowed to discuss at their meetings political issues or work methods for the daily struggle but are asked merely to listen to instructions from above, hold street demonstrations, distribute leaflets, and put up posters. The CC has adopted a putschist and "self-defeating" policy everywhere and on every issue, thus making our comrades both in and out of the party feel that the situation is hopeless. Party cadres at the grass roots all find that they can do nothing under the CC's present line. Working-class comrades in the party feel that the policy and action of the party absolutely contradict the requests and conditions of the working class. In particular, the putschist orders have caused them to leave the party in droves. As a result, party branches in various industrial fields have collapsed, and the number of the party members and the strength of the proletariat have declined rapidly. In important cities such as Hankou, Changsha, and Canton the party organizations have all disappeared, and there is virtually no connection between the party and the proletarian masses: there are no mass organizations led by our party in significant industrial fields such as the railways, mines, textiles and silk, and hardware. Those organizations that still exist are all under the control of the GMD. Few comrades are now working among the sailors. How could the tide of the revolution rise under such circumstances!

We believe that at the present stage conditions are unfavorable for the development of the revolutionary struggle. Opportunist policies ruined the last revolution, and putschism caused fundamental damage to the organizations of the workers and peasants and weakened the class strength of the proletariat. At present, on the one hand, we should adopt a defensive strategy, examine past failures, sum up the great experience and the bitter lessons of the previous revolution to educate our party, rally our disorganized ranks, restore our relationship with the workers and peasants, and reestablish the mass organizations so as to gather the strength of our class. On the other hand, we ought to reevaluate the new circumstances at the present time, that is, analyze the contradictions between the bourgeoisie and its political party and the military, particularly the tendency of democratic constitutionalism produced by the conflicts between the petty bourgeoisie and the bourgeois military dictatorship. These contradictions and conflicts have become visible after the bourgeoisie defeated the revolution, consolidated its regime, and stabilized its economy. We must take advantage of this tendency and try to use thoroughgoing democratism as the form for our political struggle at the present transitional stage. In this way, we step again into the political arena, shorten the present counterrevolutionary rule, open up a new revolutionary environment, and move from the present political struggle to the future third revolution. Democracy requires slogans. At this time, not only the petty bourgeois masses but also the working class demand slogans for their struggle. The vanguard of the proletariat itself also needs to have some political freedom to practice democratic centralism, which is necessary for the development of its organization and strength. Therefore, at present, when it is impossible to wage a direct revolutionary struggle, we must concentrate on the creation of a thoroughly democratic National Assembly; that is, to set up a National Assembly produced by equal and direct elections and with a secret ballot. In addition to the idea of the "National Parliament," we should also put forward slogans such as "eight-hour working day," "land confiscation," and "national independence." These are four interrelated democratic demands for our struggle to substantiate the content of the National Assembly during the transitional period. This is the only way to mobilize the broad masses of the working people to participate in the open and realistic political struggle, continuously enlarge the struggle, and transform the thoroughgoing bourgeois democracy into proletarian democracy—the soviet congress representing and supporting the democratic right of the majority of the laboring people throughout the country. Our attitude toward the National Assembly is to participate in it actively and to try to democratize it thoroughly rather than to boycott it while shouting the abstract slogan of the soviet. The "soviet congress" can only be born through armed insurrection. At present, it is only a slogan for education and propaganda rather than for action, because neither the subjective nor the objective conditions are ready for it. If we issue orders to launch armed insurrection to establish the soviet congress, and call on workers to act immediately to fight for the soviet, we cannot expect any response from the masses but will only increase the putschist influence inside the party, separate ourselves further from the masses, and weaken the party's strength. We oppose the idea of replacing the National Assembly with the soviet congress. What we want is to make use of the parliamentary struggle to mobilize the broad masses of the people at the grass roots to fight against the bourgeois military dictatorship of the GMD in order to prepare for armed insurrection and the establishment of the soviet congress in the future. On the one hand, the leaders of the present CC are crying out loudly that the Chinese revolutionary movement has fully recovered. They call for the establishment of the soviet congress, denounce anyone who admits the Chinese revolution has failed, accuse those who have proposed the slogan of "the National Assembly" as being liquidationists or reactionaries, and issue the slogans "Transform the warlord war into the revolutionary war to overthrow the warlords" and "Use the revolutionary insurrections of the masses to eliminate the warlord wars." On the other hand, they claim that "the revolutionary movement at present is so weak that we must not call the masses to launch insurrections to overthrow the GMD warlord regime." This reveals that our party so far has not found any political slogans which can rally the masses. Hence, the party can only act blindly and remain outside of the political arena.

The party's recent policy has continued to follow closely the ridiculous putschist analysis made by the Comintern on the current situation in China. The party leadership does not understand at all the significance of the democratic movement for the political struggle during the transitional period. Its policy is a combination of opportunist military speculation and political putschism. On the surface, the CC has adopted defeatism, while in reality it orders our comrades to assist the anti-Chiang movement of the Reformist Group and to participate in the conference held by the various anti-Chiang factions in Hong Kong. While refusing to lead the people to wage an open political struggle, it participates in the military speculation sponsored by the generals of the Reorganization Group. Such a policy will not only keep our party away from the political arena but also will ruin the party's political life!

The bureaucratic organizational line is represented by the appointment system and the absolute commandism now prevailing in the party. Democracy within the party has been abandoned, and everywhere there is bragging and false reports—from the Comintern to party organizations at all levels. The party bureaucrats use these reports to cheat each other and to deceive the masses. The present organizational line favors factionalism within the party. For example, there are the Whampoa [Huangpu] Clique led by Zhou Enlai and the Trade Union Clique led by Xiang Ying. These factions support personal power, protect their own followers, clash with each other, and persecute at will any party member with political consciousness. They have expelled many party members in order to solve the political problems inside the party, put the prestige of a few leaders above the interests of the whole party and the class, and forbidden the party members from discussing political issues with the excuses that “there is the danger of enemy attack,” “the situation is adverse,” “the necessities of secret work,” and “the application of iron discipline.” In this way, they have changed Bolshevik-style enthusiastic discussion into bureaucratic blind observation. Under the present system, the relationship between the leading organ (the Comintern) and the grass-roots organizations (the CCP’s branches) is just like that between the emperor and the village head. The average party member has to obey faithfully orders from above, otherwise he or she will be immediately persecuted. Hence, no party member dares express what he or she really wants to say.

Now, the most powerful weapon used by the bureaucrats of the party’s leading organ to control party members is “iron discipline.” Ordinary party members must submit themselves to party bureaucrats because of blind faith in this weapon. They dare not criticize the rule of the party bureaucrats even though, in their hearts, they disagree with it. Of course, iron discipline is one of the most important means for the proletarian party to lead the revolution to defeat the bourgeoisie. [[While Lenin saw the need for “iron discipline,” the way it is used by the party bureaucrats is quite the opposite.]]

Party members are forced to carry out the party strategy and tactics, which their own experiences have proved to be wrong. Party members are not given freedom to discuss and criticize the erroneous strategy and tactics. Party bureaucrats use it [iron discipline] to cover up their mistakes and maintain their bureaucratic rule. In light of this background, such “iron discipline” is nothing but pure nonsense, hypocrisy, and deceit.

Under the guidance of the opportunist leadership, our party has never provided party members with any opportunity to participate in the political life of the party and to gain a basic knowledge of Marxism-Leninism. As a result, the average political level of party members is very low. Meanwhile, the putschist direction has further ruined the party organizations. Things have become even worse since the Sixth Congress. Since then, opportunism and putschism have combined to prevent the party from making any progress. Under these conditions, to revive the party’s basis and discipline, party leaders must make a fundamental change in the political and organizational line, use democratic centralism to replace bureaucratic centralism, provide party members with freedom of discussion and criticism, and devise a strategy and tactics which average party members will find correct in terms of their own experiences. Only in this way can our party establish close relations with the broad masses of the people, carry out truly unified actions, and resist the enemy’s attacks. What the party bureaucrats have done is just the reverse. Taking advantage of the average party members’ ignorance of, and their estrangement from, the party’s political life, these party bureaucrats have manipulated the party, and deceived and threatened the party cadres. They use money to bind together party members, maintain some empty trade union organs, and hire people to hold demonstrations for them. They forbid discussion and criticism within the party and rely on the prestige of the Comintern and the party's authority to force members and the masses to believe that "the CC's political line is absolutely correct." They even use the enemy's attack as an excuse to put pressure on the party. If we allow such a leadership to continue, our party, the party for which many of our comrades have sacrificed their lives, would cease to exist except in name. Therefore, all politically conscious party members must rise up immediately to overthrow this leadership from within the party and save our party from the current deteriorating situation and crisis!

III) Our Attitude and Suggestions

The responsibility of the Opposition is to help all party members understand the danger of opportunism, get rid of the opportunist leadership, and return to the Marxist-Leninist line. In a party with genuine democratic centralism, political differences inside the party can be dealt with through open discussion. This would not split but could further consolidate the party. On the contrary, bureaucratic-style coercion and deception will inevitably cause the party to split and collapse. In order to support the genuine proletarian line and realize Bolshevik-Leninist-style unity, the Opposition must wage a staunch and organized struggle against the party's opportunist leadership. Opportunism has repeatedly met with shameful defeats in China, and the Chinese proletariat has paid too heavy a price. However, it is only recently that the Opposition's struggle has begun. This means that after being deceived by the opportunist leadership of the Comintern for a long time, the CCP now has finally awakened and moved toward the Marxist-Leninist line.

We the undersigned hold that anyone who wants to restore the Leninist Comintern, consolidate the proletarian dictatorship in the Soviet Union, and support the views of the Chinese proletarian revolution should rise to fight against the opportunist political line and bureaucratic organizational line of the Stalinists. The present policies and systems of the Comintern, the Soviet Union, and the CCP must all be completely altered. We think that once the Opposition has won the sympathy of the majority of comrades within the CCP, Stalin may also take over some of the ideas and slogans of the Opposition, or he may change a few party leaders so as to continue his control over the left wing of the masses. However, we are striving for a fundamental change in the whole line rather than certain tactical reforms, still less the dismissal of a few leaders from office. We believe that since the CCP has suffered most under the opportunist and bureaucratic leadership of the Stalinists, it should stand, among the communist parties led by the Comintern in all the countries, at the forefront of the brave fight against the opportunist and bureaucratic leadership of the Comintern. Hence, we are putting forward the following suggestions and hope all party members can firmly and unanimously demand and supervise the CC to send, in the name of the CCP, the message to the Comintern and distribute it directly to communist parties in other countries. Meanwhile, we must unite under the banner of the Comintern left-Opposition to fight through to the end to realize the following demands:

First, call back Comrade Trotsky and other Oppositionists, release the Oppositionists of the Soviet CP and the communist parties of other countries from jail and from exile in Siberia and Turkestan, and restore their party membership and Comrade Trotsky's leading position.

Second, publicize all documents the Opposition have written during the recent five or six years on the policies of the Soviet CP and the Comintern and publicize Lenin's will and his posthumous manuscripts withheld by the Stalinists.

Third, reexamine the political and organizational mistakes made by the CC of the Soviet CP and the leading organ of the Comintern during the recent five or six years and reformulate the policies of the Soviet CP and the Comintern.

Fourth, restore the party membership of those Chinese Communists who have been expelled from the party because of their opposition to the opportunist line of the CC and immediately start open discussion on various vital political issues.

Fifth, reexamine the lessons of the past failures of the Chinese revolution and work out a new political line.

Sixth, reorganize the leading organs of the Soviet CP, the Comintern, and the Comintern branches of the communist parties in all countries.

C.18 The New Revolutionary High Tide and an Initial Victory in One or More Provinces (11 June 1930)¹¹¹

I) The Chinese Revolution and the World Revolution

[[1] While the capitalist countries throughout the world are in a state of depression, the rising tide of strikes by the working class of all countries, the growing struggle of the unemployed and especially the great achievements in socialist construction on the part of the Soviet Union: [all these] have further bolstered the determination of the working class to advance toward a socialist revolution. To save themselves from crisis, the imperialists are anxious to attack Soviet Russia. A world revolution looms that is certainly advantageous to the development of the Chinese revolution.]]

2) From the standpoint of imperialist world rule, China focuses most sharply all the basic conflicts among the imperialists: China is the spot where the conflict among the major imperialists—England, Japan, and the United States—is the most intense; it is one of the areas where the capitalist world and the socialist Soviet Union have direct contact; it is an area where the anti-imperialist colonial revolution has penetrated the deepest. At the same time, the conflict between the Chinese proletariat and bourgeoisie can easily be stepped up—for instance, every one of the present workers' economic struggles is rapidly being converted into a severe political struggle, or even armed conflict. Thus, the various forms of conflict among the imperialists, now focused in China, are likely to sharpen, resulting in incurable economic and political crises, in ceaseless imbroglios among warlords, in the collapse of the ruling class's foundations, and in the increasing turning of the working class and the broad toiling masses toward revolution to seek their own emancipation. Thus China is the weakest link in the ruling chain of world imperialism; it is the place where the volcano of the world revolution is most likely to erupt. Therefore, with the present aggravation of the global revolutionary crisis, the Chinese revolution may possibly break out first, setting off the world revolution and the final decisive class war of the world.

[[3) Because China is an integral part of the imperialists' economic system, its loss would mean the end of the imperialists. In the final decisive battle we shall undoubtedly be able to achieve complete victory.

4) Misunderstanding of this situation is the chief source of liquidationist and rightist thoughts. Proponents of this view do not understand that the Chinese revolution may break out first and set off the great world revolution.]]

II) A New Revolutionary High Tide Is Drawing Nearer Every Day

5) As a consequence of the effect of the basic crisis of imperialism, especially the continuous fighting among the warlords during the past two years, the Chinese political and economic situation has now reached an extraordinarily serious state: financial chaos, bankruptcies, increasing crises of unemployment, soaring prices, and growing deterioration of the livelihood of the masses. The rural economy has suffered unprecedented destruction, with famine and war spread over the whole country, exposing tens of thousands of people to hunger, cold, displacement, and death. Most areas of the south are in a cruel war between the peasants and landlords. No clique of the ruling class is able to save the critical situation or to unify the country; further deterioration and collapse are inevitable. On the other hand, the toiling masses of workers and peasants have no choice, in such unendurable circumstances, but to wage the revolutionary struggle with determination. This completely explains how the objective conditions for revolution have matured and serves to answer the lies of the liquidationists [to the effect] that "the bourgeoisie is being stabilized." The revolutionary struggle of the broad masses surges rapidly forward: the strike wave spreads out; the economic struggles turn into political ones; broad laboring masses, shaking themselves free from the deceptions of the GMD's yellow unions, turn to struggle against them and the GMD; and [the workers] free themselves from legal forms of peaceful petitioning and [proceed to] direct action or even to armed conflict. All this demonstrates that the political consciousness of the laboring masses is proceeding rapidly toward the revolutionary high tide. This situation became clearer after the extensive, serious political struggles of Red May—May 1 and May 30 of this year [1930]. Especially the rural struggle has undoubtedly developed into an extremely wide high tide, not only destroying the rule of the landlords, the bourgeoisie, and the GMD in the villages, but also establishing soviet regimes in many areas, in opposition to the imperialist-GMD regime which rules the whole nation. After the First All-China Congress of Soviet Areas' Delegates [May 1930, in Shanghai], [the rural struggle] will expand even more rapidly. In addition, [there are] the vigorous development of the Red Army and the conversion to the revolutionary camp, as well as spontaneous mutinies of the soldiers in the warlord armies; this overall situation shows that a new revolutionary rising tide in China is directly ahead.

6) Thus, while the ruling class continues to weaken and collapse, the mass struggle is daily approaching a revolutionary high tide. This shows clearly that the future of the warlords' strife may well turn into the victory of the national revolution and the final death of the warlords' rule. Only a victorious revolutionary upheaval of the masses of workers and peasants can completely eliminate the warlords' wars and achieve unification and peace in China. Therefore, the immediate task of the CP is to call on the broad masses to oppose the warlords' wars by revolutionary struggle, to prepare resolutely for the concerted general uprising of all revolutionary forces in order to overthrow the warlords' rule, and to eliminate completely the warlords' wars, [thereby] winning the victory of the revolution.

7) The major signs of the revolutionary high tide are the heightened political struggle of the revolutionary vanguard and of the general and even the backward masses, and the outbreak of great political strikes in the major cities. But serious rightist or even liquidationist concepts will inevitably result if [one] considers only the superficial unevenness in the development [of the revolution] in the cities and countryside, and neglects [to consider] the workers' struggle, the sharpening of class antagonisms, the rapid growth of revolutionary spirit and determination on the part of the broad masses, and the bankruptcy of the ruling power of the ruling class; that is, the conditions under which every incident may lead to the outbreak of a great revolutionary struggle. The major reason why the workers' strike movement has not yet turned into a revolutionary high tide decidedly does not lie in a lapse of revolutionary consciousness on the part of the workers, or in a lack of revolutionary consciousness on the part of the workers, or in their lack of desire for revolution; rather it lies in the fact that the ruling class, about to collapse, is waging a last-ditch battle in the cities, using all possible methods—white terror and trickery—to suppress the workers' struggle. Thus the urban struggle is more intense and cruel than that in the countryside; this is why we must redouble our efforts in city work for the ultimate victory in the revolution. But the major handicap in our present work are rightist ideas of doubt and pessimism regarding the workers' struggles. The elimination of such vacillation is the major prerequisite for speeding the arrival of the rising tide in the workers' struggles.

8) Generally speaking, not every struggle of the worker masses will turn into a revolutionary upsurge; other essential factors must accompany it. In the present Chinese situation, such factors are the extensive spread of peasant uprisings, the rapid expansion of the Red Army of workers and peasants, a growing awakening among the [GMD] soldier masses, and the mutinies on their part and the serious crisis of the ruling class. In fact, one great workers' struggle in an industrial or political center may immediately lead to the formation of a revolutionary upsurge—[that is], to a directly revolutionary situation. Furthermore, the outbreak of a great struggle in the key cities would, under present conditions, mean that the ruling class is not only unable to hold the rural areas, but also incapable of suppressing or controlling the revolutionary struggle in the cities. This would mean that objective conditions are ripe for armed insurrection. Therefore we may say that the upsurge of the revolutionary rising tide will inevitably be followed by armed insurrection. We should, therefore, actively prepare from now on for armed insurrection. Attention should be paid not only to political preparatory work—such as mass propaganda for armed insurrection and for the necessity of seizing political power—but also to hasten organizational and technical preparations. If we do not understand the objective situation clearly, we will undoubtedly commit grave rightist errors in our tactics, such as ignoring the necessity of preparing for armed insurrection, and will undoubtedly become the “tail” of the masses or even an obstacle to the revolution.

9) The basic economic and political crisis in China is everywhere becoming more intense, and there is no fundamental difference in it [as regards locality]. Therefore, the great workers' struggle breaking out in key cities will lead to a national revolutionary high tide, and the great struggle itself will signify the arrival of the national revolutionary high tide. So the revolutionary upsurge may break out first in this or that province, but there cannot be a single revolutionary high tide in one or more provinces apart from the national revolutionary high tide. Therefore, when the party prepares for the national revolutionary high tide, it must pay serious attention to coordination and mobilization on a national scale; the concept that a national revolutionary high tide can be pushed by establishing local regimes in one or more provinces is undoubtedly extremely erroneous.

III) Preliminary Successes in One or More Key Provinces and the Establishment of a National Revolutionary Regime

10) In industrially backward China, economic centers completely controlling the national industries have, generally speaking, not yet been formed. Furthermore, under the control of a few commercial centers trading with the imperialists (such as Shanghai, Hong Kong, Tianjin, Wuhan, and Dalian), political regimes of local warlords have come into existence. The nation's ruling class is, in general, in a condition of vacillation and collapse, but to a different degree in different areas.

Therefore, during the national revolutionary high tide, the revolution may win preliminary successes in one or more key provinces (judging from present circumstances, the objective conditions of Wuhan and its adjacent provinces are more mature). For the present, while the new revolutionary high tide approaches day by day, our general tactical policy is to prepare ourselves for winning preliminary successes in one or more provinces and for setting up a national revolutionary regime.

11) Preliminary successes in one or more provinces are inseparable from the national revolutionary rising tide. "These successes cannot be attained without the condition of a revolutionary rising tide" (resolution of the Sixth Congress). Therefore, in order to prepare for preliminary successes in one or more provinces, attention must be paid to the coordination of work on a national scale. The present expansion and intensification of the warfare among warlords will undoubtedly provide a favorable situation for preliminary successes in one or more provinces. To fight actively for the attainment of such successes is at present the main task of the party. But we must realize that after the revolution has succeeded in one or more provinces, the various groups of reactionaries, provincial warlords, and especially all the imperialists will temporarily forget their own differences and unite to suppress the revolution. In the first Great Revolution [1925–27], the revolutionary government in Guangdong could exist as a local regime for more than one year and consolidate its power. It is impossible for such a situation to reoccur in the present soviet stage of the revolution. Preliminary successes in one or more provinces will at once give rise to cruel war—not only civil war to liquidate the reactionaries, but also international war to resist all imperialist oppression. Therefore, only with the preparation for a national revolutionary high tide to achieve preliminary successes in one or more provinces can the revolutionary government rapidly mobilize tens or hundreds of millions of the masses of the nation to wage resolutely a decisive fight against the reactionary forces and obtain the support of the world proletariat—especially that of the Russian proletariat, which has already met success—so as to vanquish the reactionary forces and win national victory. Thus preliminary successes in one or more provinces are the beginning of national victory, a step toward more intensive struggle in the national revolution. There can never be any "local regimes" or "regional governments"; every provincial (party headquarters) should actively prepare for successful insurrection in that province in coordination with the general situation. Thus, in preparing for preliminary successes in one or more provinces, special attention must be paid to heightening our national activities, as well as to their coordination with the struggle of the international proletariat. In particular, more propaganda about the Chinese revolution must be spread among the international proletariat.

12) The great struggle of the proletariat is the decisive force in the winning of preliminary successes in one or more provinces. Without an upsurge of strikes of the working class, without armed insurrection in key cities, there can be no successes in one or more provinces. It is a highly erroneous concept to pay no special attention to urban work, and to plan “to use the countryside to surround the cities” and “to rely on the Red Army alone to occupy the cities.” Henceforth, the organization of political strikes and their expansion into a general strike, as well as the strengthening of the organization and training of the workers’ militia to set up a central force for armed insurrections, are the major tactics in preparing for preliminary successes in one or more provinces. Particular attention should be directed to the fact that the ruling class will stage a final struggle in the cities. This cruel struggle will be even fiercer than that in the rural areas; therefore, we must redouble our efforts in urban work, set up strong bases in the key cities—especially among workers of important industries—and awaken the will of the broad masses to struggle to the death. These are the most grave tasks for the present and the tactical problems that must be solved first.

13) In view of the present objective economic and political conditions of China, a rising tide of proletarian struggles unaccompanied by peasant uprisings, soldiers’ mutinies, powerful assaults by the Red Army, and a whole combination of various revolutionary forces also will not lead the revolution to victory. Moreover, it will be unattainable if one of the above four revolutionary forces is lacking. The liquidationists who look down on the peasantry and want to liquidate the Red Army are undoubtedly spreading reactionary ideas and attempting to weaken the ally of the proletariat and to destroy the fighting power of the revolution. The great revolutionary role of the peasantry has even a higher significance in China; the birth of the Red Army in the rural revolution is a special feature of China, which can never be understood by the Trotskyite liquidationists. It is also entirely false to adopt a wait-and-see attitude, maintaining that the present workers’ struggle in the cities has not [yet] reached the rising tide [stage] and that a conservative policy should be adopted in the rural areas and the expansion of the Red Army should be stopped. Granted that the workers’ struggle has not yet reached a revolutionary high tide, and peasant uprisings, soldiers’ mutinies, and the Red Army’s expansion are still inadequate; still we should specially emphasize the intensifying of the workers’ struggle while working for the development of peasant uprisings, the outbreak of soldiers’ mutinies, and the vigorous expansion of the Red Army.

IV) The Reformist and Liquidationist Factions

[[Party members must be mobilized to eliminate the influence of the “reformist” group under Wang Jingwei and the “liquidationists” headed by Chen Duxiu.]]

V) Prepare for the Transformation of the Revolution

17) The major tasks of the present revolution are the overthrow of imperialist rule and the destruction of feudal forces by rural revolution. These are undoubtedly the characteristics of a democratic revolution. The unfounded assertion of the liquidationists that the present task of the democratic revolution is finished is a reactionary concept that seeks to make us slacken our efforts in the task of democratic revolution and our work of mobilizing the masses against the imperialists and for the rural revolution. But at present the proletariat is the only class leading the revolution—the bourgeoisie having become part of the reactionary alliance—thus the complete victory of the democratic revolution is inseparable from the overthrow of bourgeois rule and will inevitably result in the consolidation of proletarian leadership and the successful establishment of a soviet regime. These factors assume in advance that the victory of the democratic revolution will transform itself into a victory of socialism.

18) When the revolution has won preliminary successes in one or more provinces, the imperialists, gentry, and bourgeoisie will oppose it by every means [such as] armed attack, economic sabotage, and organizing counterrevolutionary coups. This cruel war will be against the imperialists, landlords, and compradores, as well as against the bourgeoisie. At that time, the revolutionary government, in order to win the national revolution, will not only confiscate the banks, businesses, and factories of the imperialists, but also the factories, businesses, and banks of the Chinese bourgeoisie, so as to weaken the power of these counterrevolutionary weapons. It will also be necessary to organize and control production in order to cope with the grave economic blockade. At the same time, politically, it is necessary to have a centralized, dictatorial regime in order to meet the persistent counterrevolutionary attacks. This will necessitate an advance from the dictatorship of workers and peasants to that of the proletariat. A revolutionary transformation is primarily a transformation of class relationships. The dictatorship of the proletariat is already in the nature of a socialist regime. Therefore the beginning of revolutionary victory and the establishment of a revolutionary regime will be the beginning of a revolutionary transformation. There will be no interim stage.

19) It is a grave error to assume that the revolution can begin to be a revolutionary transformation only after victory on a national scale. For if the revolutionary government at that time does not carry out a class policy, [if it does not] confiscate the factories, businesses, and banks of the bourgeoisie, [if it does not] preempt the counterrevolutionary weapons of the bourgeoisie, then not only will the deepening of the revolution stop, but victory on a national scale will also be obstructed. This is a suicidal policy during a revolution. Therefore, the theory that the revolutionary transformation must have several stages is undoubtedly an extremely dangerous rightist notion. On the other hand, it is also erroneous to assume that “a revolution is still a democratic revolution on the eve of its victory, but that the regime set up after the victory of the revolution is a purely socialist regime.” This neglects the process of revolutionary transformation (no matter how brief this process, it must be gone through), and ignores the fact that, when counterattacking the cruel onslaught of the imperialists, the gentry, and the bourgeoisie, it is necessary to have the slogan and policy of democratic revolution for the mobilization of tens and hundreds of millions of the masses to overcome this counterrevolutionary attack.

20) The dawn of victory for the revolution will mean a more cruel class war. On top of an all-out counterrevolutionary armed attack, the imperialists, gentry, and bourgeoisie will try every means to induce the petty bourgeoisie who remain in the revolutionary camp to turn against the revolution. Therefore, in the process of revolutionary transformation, new vacillations and betrayals are inevitable. Therefore we must never harbor any illusions about peaceful transformations of the revolution, but should henceforth utilize our correct policy of strengthening the leadership of the proletariat, establishing independent organizations for hired farmhands, consolidating the alliance with the poor peasants, eliminating the influence of the rich peasants, and winning over the middle peasants in order to lessen the difficulties during the revolutionary transformation in the future. Such a correct, firm policy definitely has an important significance in the smooth realization of the future revolutionary transformation and should never be neglected by us.

[[21) Another decisive factor for our victory is support from the proletariat in the Soviet Union and the outbreak of proletarian revolution in capitalist countries.]]

VI) The Tasks and Tactical Line of the Party

22) At present, when the revolution is rapidly developing and the great revolutionary tide is approaching, the party should not only pay attention to winning over the broad masses and organizing their struggle so as to hasten the arrival of this great revolutionary tide, it should also pay attention to the task of organizing armed insurrections on a national scale to capture political power when the great revolutionary high tide arises. Therefore, it is necessary to step up the organization of the masses for the political struggle and the propaganda for seizing political power by armed insurrection. The general tactical line of the party at present is to pay attention to hastening the national revolutionary upsurge, to organizational and technical preparations for armed insurrection, and to plan for preliminary successes in the provinces adjacent to and surrounding Wuhan.

23) The continued spreading of the warlords' warfare results in uprooting, bankruptcy, death, and destitution for the masses. The whole rule of the GMD is shown not only to have fallen into the lowest depths of despair, but also to have completely lost the confidence of the broad masses. Therefore, the masses can be mobilized only by resolutely carrying out the line of opposition to the warlords' warfare, under the central slogan of opposing warlords' war. If the party fails actively to raise such a slogan, but in its place proposes some partial economic demands, the masses will feel frustrated and will not rise enthusiastically to struggle. The masses said long ago: "Whenever the insurrection comes, notify us and we will come." The party should now boldly tell the masses: "The time for insurrection is approaching. Let all of you organize." It has been a grave shortcoming that in the past the party paid much too little attention to the struggle against the warlords' warfare. Now the party must resolutely raise the slogans of opposing imperialism, the GMD, and especially the warlords' warfare and must organize sympathetic strikes, even general strikes, local uprisings, and soldiers' mutinies, and summon the Red Army to attack relentlessly in order to carry out the general line of converting the warlords' war into a war to liquidate the warlords.

To carry out this line, it is, first of all, necessary to pay attention to the international mission of the Chinese revolution. The outbreak of the Chinese revolution will spur the imperialists not only to unite to suppress the Chinese revolution, but also to attack the Soviet Union with greater vigor. Therefore, armed protection of the Soviet Union should become one of the central slogans of the revolution. Attention should be paid, at the same time, to coordination with the revolutionary struggles of the proletariat in capitalist countries and colonies and to the strengthening of propaganda for the Chinese revolution among the revolutionary masses of the world. On the other hand, the danger of an imperialist war is coming closer day by day. Henceforth, it is also an urgent task to engage in extensive propaganda and agitation for the anti-imperialist war, as well as to hasten the mobilization of a widespread movement against imperialism and in support of the revolutionary movement in colonial areas.

In the struggle against the warlords, we must, at the same time, give stronger support to the resolution of the councils of workers', peasants', and soldiers' deputies in the soviet areas: the fight for the soviet regime movement. We must tell the broad masses that complete emancipation will come only after the overthrow of the warlords' regime and the establishment of a soviet regime. The movement, in order to arouse the determination of the broad masses to struggle for the soviet regime, should be carried into every factory, every school, and every village.

24) The crux of the question in this line is the organization of political strikes. We should not only pay attention to the strengthening of political propaganda in economic strikes and convert every economic struggle into a political one, but also resolutely raise political slogans (opposing, for instance, the stationing of troops in factories, White Russian guards, arrests of workers, yellow unions, and demanding freedom to organize unions and to strike). Slogans should concentrate on opposing the warlords' wars so as to organize extensive political strikes among the masses. Without resolute political struggles, economic gains are definitely difficult to win. Only resolute political slogans can heighten the courage of the masses to struggle. (We should take care that, in our tactics, every political slogan for agitation, every political struggle, is coordinated with economic demands.) The lessons of the organizing of the May 1 and May 30 Movements are that, in general, political propaganda and agitation are inadequate. We did not boldly raise political slogans in organizing the strikes of the May 1 and May 30 Movements; rather we mobilized the masses mostly by economic slogans. This was the major reason why, in various districts, large-scale strikes could not be organized. It was a very grave rightist error, manifesting not only a tendency to "tail" the masses, but also the serious error of obstructing the struggle of the masses.

25) General organizational weakness is a most serious weakness in the present workers' movement. We must pay the utmost attention and spend our greatest efforts on expanding the red unions and establishing factory committees. But we must realize that such efforts can only yield greater results under resolute political battle slogans. We must resolutely begin a movement to fight for the freedom to organize unions and to strike. The masses can be rallied around us in increasing numbers only by struggling openly for the red unions, and against the yellow unions as well as the GMD. If the party limits itself to narrow, secret work, it will be difficult for the mass organizations to develop on a large scale and consolidate themselves.

26) At present it is our urgent duty to establish and expand the military organizations of the working masses (red storm troops and pickets), and to intensify their military training. Not only must we propagate, in the struggle, the need for organizing workers' pickets, but also we must use the slogan of preparing for armed insurrection to mobilize the broad masses to join the pickets and the red storm troops. Only thus can military mass organizations be rapidly expanded; only thus can the pickets and red storm troops become the central units of the insurrection.

27) One of the major tasks in the execution of the present General Line is the resolute organization of local uprisings. The aim of local uprisings is to capture cities and to establish local soviet regimes. This is the highest stage of peasant uprisings, whose future is inevitably linked with the uprisings in key cities to complete the success of a nationwide insurrection. The rural struggle has, at present, reached a high tide, and conditions for local uprisings, in general, are undoubtedly mature. The party should unhesitatingly mobilize the broad masses, under the slogan of local uprisings, to accomplish this task. The most serious obstacle to the accomplishment of this task is the "guerrilla" concept of the past, which advocates attacking cities, instead of occupying them, and lacks the resolve to establish local soviets in the cities. This is a reflection of the peasant mentality and has nothing in common with our present line. When a local uprising succeeds, a local soviet regime should be immediately established, and the masses should be immediately mobilized to carry out resolute attacks and substantial expansion of the regime.

28) The vigorous expansion of the Red Army is an even more pressing current task, especially in the soviet areas. Without the coordination of a large and mighty Red Army, a nationwide victory for the revolution cannot be won in a China ruled by warlordism. At present, our party—especially those party units in the soviet areas—should mobilize the broad masses to join, support, and concentrate their armed strength in the Red Army. In order to break down the localism and conservatism of the peasant mentality, we must tell the broad masses that the rural revolution can be assured of victory only if the regime of the GMD, gentry, and bourgeoisie is completely overthrown and if the revolution is carried to victory on a national scale. Such a mentality is at present the most serious obstacle to the vigorous expansion of the Red Army. The second grave obstacle is the failure to understand the general development of the revolutionary situation, and a stubborn adherence to the military concept of guerrilla warfare, in opposition to the expansion of the Red Army and its expansionist tactics. This (attitude) derives from complete ignorance of the fact that military tactics, equipment, troop designations, and organization should all change with the general political line. To obstruct a change in party tactics by clinging to an old military viewpoint is a serious rightist mistake.

29) The strategy and tactics of the Red Army should not only consist of resolute attacks on the major forces of the enemy, assaults on key cities and lines of communication of the enemy, and a complete change from the guerrilla tactics of the past, but also should turn the warlords' warfare into a revolutionary war to liquidate the warlords, and carry out, in a coordinated and organized fashion, under the general plan, the military task of preliminary successes in one or more provinces. The overall aim of this task [of the Red Army] is the seizure of political power and the establishment of a national revolutionary regime in coordination with armed uprisings in key cities. The guerrilla tactics of the past have become entirely incompatible with this line and must undergo a fundamental change. Another serious task of the Red Army at present is to intensify political training along class lines. With peasants making up an absolute majority of the Red Army at present, special attention should be paid to their political training along class lines in order to consolidate the leadership of the proletariat and eliminate thoroughly the erroneous tendencies in the peasant mentality.

30) Under the present overall line, the mission of the soldiers' movement is not only to incite the soldiers in the warlords' armies to mutiny and to bring them over to the Red Army, but to organize the soldiers' antiwarlord mutinies as a central strategy. That is to say, not only to incite small-scale, scattered mutinies, but also to raise the banner of antiwarlord warfare and of the liquidation of warlords in an organized and planned manner, and in coordination with other revolutionary forces. Thus, after a mutiny, the tactic of resolute attacks should be adopted to rout the warlord troops. The past practice of fleeing after the uprising must be effectively corrected.

31) The gravest obstacle to the execution of this General Line are the rightist ideas, which are absolutely incompatible with it. The party must, as a prerequisite to executing this General Line, resolutely fight against all wavering, rightist ideas, especially "tailist" tendencies. The liquidationists, with their systematic liquidationist philosophy, have, in fact, turned from an intraparty opposition group into a class enemy. The party must carry out a more resolute struggle within its ranks and especially among the masses against the liquidationists. But the rightist ideas hidden inside the party have also become a great danger at present because they superficially support the party line, but in every actual tactic have shown doubts, vacillation, sabotage, and inaction. Without overcoming all these rightist ideas, it will be impossible to carry out the party line and policy to the full.

32) Youth and women are an important factor in the revolutionary struggle. We must resolutely oppose the tendency to neglect the youth and women's movements, because it is a grave political error. The positive role of youth and women can be witnessed in any struggle at present; and the party should actively draw them into the revolutionary camp. The party must, by all available means, assist the reorientation of the work of the CYL and oppose the tendency toward bohemianism within the CYL corps.

VII) The Organizational Problem of the Party

[[33) The major weakness of the revolution is the inadequate organizational strength of the party.

34) Serious weaknesses are: slow expansion among workers, only a few working-class cadres, and defective functioning of cells.

35) The threat of petty bourgeois romanticism is manifest in current party organization.]]

C.19 Resolution on the Chinese Question. *Political Secretariat of the ECCI (June 1930)*¹¹²

I) The High Tide of the Revolutionary Movement in China

1) The Resolutions of the CCP's Sixth Congress and the Comintern's Sixth World Congress both held that a new high tide of the Chinese revolution would inevitably arise. The current situation in China has proved the resolutions to be absolutely correct. Being an undisputable fact, the new surge of the revolutionary movement in China is contrary to the prophecy of the rightist opportunists and capitulationists, the Trotskyites, the Chen Duxiuists, and the other liquidationists. Particularly during recent months, a rapid and obvious progress in the revolutionary liberation movement has occurred. The motive forces of the Chinese revolution—the working class and the peasantry—have recovered from the heavy blows inflicted by the reactionaries and have rallied again to wage the rural revolution, wipe out the influence of the imperialists, and overthrow the reactionary GMD regime.

[[2) The living conditions of the laboring people in China have deteriorated rapidly under the reactionary rule of recent years. It has made people see through the false promises of the GMD, and the revolutionary consciousness of the workers and peasants has been raised. The resolve of the petty bourgeoisie has also been strengthened. It shows that the outbreak of the revolutionary storm is approaching.]]

3) The new high tide of the Chinese revolution has developed in a unique way. It first arose in most of the areas that were affected by the 1925–27 revolution, and then gradually spread to the neighboring areas. Such a phenomenon explains why at the beginning, the revolutionary forces could not control the industrial centers. This is a disadvantage because it puts the workers and peasants in a relatively weaker position. Only with the gradual development of the revolutionary movement can the peasant war led by the proletariat expand to the new areas and advance to a more advantageous position.

4) In analyzing the current situation, we should understand that a nationwide revolutionary high tide has not yet appeared. The labor movement and the peasant struggle have not yet merged together, and our strength is not sufficient to overthrow the rule of the GMD and the imperialists. The peasants' revolutionary struggle so far has succeeded only in several southern provinces. Although the ruling class has been weakened by the factional struggle and rivalries, politically it has not yet collapsed. However, the recent change of the situation reveals that despite the fact that the revolutionary movement is not in a position to dominate China, it can at least take control of a number of major provinces. In reality, the progress of the revolutionary struggle depends largely on whether the CCP has a correct strategy, and particularly, whether it can establish a strong leadership to direct and promote the soviet movement.

II) The Major Tasks of the Party

5) The party's urgent task is to set up a central government to lead the soviet movement and to coordinate its action. This is a most important task. The party should also organize in the areas under our control a genuine Red Army—an army that is totally under the command of the CP and that supports the soviet government. Only with the help of the Red Army can the worker-peasant soviet government in China hold out and work effectively. Therefore, we must concentrate our efforts on organizing and strengthening the Red Army so that we will be able to take over one or several industrial and administrative centers in the future in accordance with the military and political conditions.

The CP must understand that the establishment of a Red Army with strong fighting capability and high political consciousness is the top priority at the present time. Once this task is completed, the revolutionary struggle will surely develop rapidly.

When organizing the central soviet government, we must be very careful in selecting staff and choose only those who have passed strict political examination and are unconditionally loyal to the revolution. Under no circumstances should we allow any GMD personnel to enter the government. The major task for this provisional government is to mobilize the peasantry and try its best to lead the peasant movement. It should wipe out the feudal-warlord system, keep the rich peasants and usurer elements in check, and make every effort to urge the people to take part in the struggle. The provisional government must provide a form of political power for proletarian hegemony over the peasant movement. We must encourage the broad masses of the people to participate consciously in the revolutionary government both at the top and at the grass-roots level.

6) In the soviet areas, the party's attention must focus on solving the land problem. The rural revolution should aim at serving the interests of the poor and middle peasants rather than those of the rich peasants. The driving force of the rural revolution should be the farmhands and the poor peasants. They should form a solid alliance with the middle peasants under the leadership of the working class. We must smash the resistant rich peasants who want to stop us from confiscating landlords' land or who plan to distribute the confiscated land in accordance with the number of farm tools a peasant possesses. To deal this resistance a heavy blow, the party should confiscate the land of all the landlords, of the temples and churches, and of other big landowners. The confiscated land must be distributed equally to the poor and middle peasants. However, we should not confiscate the land of the well-to-do peasants, that is, the wealthy middle peasants. At the same time, the party must advocate the slogan of land nationalization. The policy is to be applied when the revolutionary movement dominates the whole of China and the worker-peasant democratic dictatorship triumphs.

7) In carrying out the rural revolution in the soviet areas, we should not set up an independent trade union of farmhands. The organizations of the rural proletariat should be closely linked to the poor peasant leagues. The poor peasant league should unite the middle peasants around it and make sure that the soviet government serves the interests of the poor and middle peasants. The soviet government should be elected but the gentry, landlords, and rich peasants should be denied a vote. The party should consider the village soviet congress as the major form for organizing the peasants in the soviet areas and the peasant association should gradually be changed into the peasant congress (the soviet).

8) In economic policy in the soviet areas, the party must not adopt any radical methods which might turn the peasants against us. Currently, there should be freedom of commerce and the purchase and sale of land. In addition, we should not monopolize supply, restrict trade, or control prices in the soviet areas (except for a few items such as salt and kerosene). Whether the purchase and marketing of a certain item should be controlled depends on the request of the people in the soviet areas, military necessity, and the struggle against speculation and sabotage.

9) To improve the life of the workers in the soviet areas, we should legalize the eight-hour workday, social welfare, and the right to organize a trade union. As far as other benefits are concerned, they should be decided in accordance with the specific conditions in various areas, the progress of the revolutionary war, and the effects of the work of the trade union rather than by decrees from the soviet government.

10) In the soviet areas, actions of the party and all measures of the revolutionary organs must truly serve the interests of the peasant struggle and aim at promoting the peasant movement, consolidating soviet political power, and expanding the soviet areas. For this purpose, the party must mobilize all possible means in the soviet areas to establish a powerful Red Army and guarantee that the Red Army is absolutely under the command and the supervision of the CP. The Red Army is of great significance for the revolutionary struggle and should really become the armed force of all laboring people. Social organizations, above all, trade unions and the poor peasant leagues, must mobilize their members to join the Red Army. We should select workers with revolutionary consciousness as Red Army commanders. The Red Army should also recruit poor peasants as well as other revolutionary people in the countryside and appoint revolutionary workers as its officers. The military commanders, especially the political commissars, must be granted the necessary authority, and the power of leadership should be concentrated in their hands as far as is possible.

11) In all propaganda work and mass mobilization, the party must put forward, in the name of the workers and peasants' soviet government, the following major slogans: "Distribute the land of the landlords to the peasants," "Resist the imperialists," "Confiscate foreign enterprises that disobey the laws of the Chinese soviet government," "Unify China," "Establish an independent soviet state," "Overthrow the GMD regime," "Support and expand the soviet movement throughout the country," "Establish the eight-hour workday," and "Production supervision by the workers' organizations."

12) Party actions in the soviet areas must be coordinated with our work in the rest of China. As the revolutionary high tide surges ahead, the party's major task is to establish the leadership of the proletariat. Only through this can the peasant struggle develop successfully and the revolutionary movement move to a more advanced stage. The anti-imperialist struggle should aim at eliminating the feudal-warlord system as well as the influence of the foreign capitalists in China. Foreign capital has used, supported, and assisted the feudal elements, as well as various factions of the warlords and capitalists for its own interests.

13) To establish proletarian leadership, the party must organize strikes, lead the economic struggle of the workers, combine economic interests with political demands, develop political strikes, and work out a strategy for a general political strike in a number of major industrial cities. During political strikes, apart from using slogans that oppose warlords and the GMD, we should also take into consideration the economic interests of the average workers so that we can win over even the most backward workers. The party must improve work among those yellow trade unions that have a large membership. Meanwhile, it must make every effort to consolidate the position of the red trade unions and the workers' self-defense organizations. In those places where the GMD's reactionary rule is weaker and our strength is stronger, the underground revolutionary movement should come out into the open.

[[14) The party must also promote and direct all kinds of anti-imperialist struggles.

15) The warlords' war must be transformed into a revolutionary civil war. The party must also struggle against the GMD Reorganizationists, the Third Party, and the Hu Shi faction. The nature of the reactionary scabs in the Chen Duxiu clique must be exposed. They are liquidationists in disguise.]]

16) With respect to the peasant movement outside the soviet areas, the party should set up peasant committees, peasant associations, and struggle committees to direct the peasant movement and make full use of the various kinds of social organizations founded by the peasants for the revolutionary struggle. Revolutionary propaganda work should be intensified. The recent famine and the warlords' war have provided the party with an opportunity to launch a movement to boycott taxes and levies. Moreover, we must launch a guerrilla war, consolidate the soviet areas, and capture the weapons of the landlords and local gentry's armed forces to arm the red militia and the Young Pioneers.

[[17] It is very important for the party to improve our work among the minority nationalities.]]

18) Since the Sixth Congress, the CCP has made substantial progress in the ideological field as well as in its effort to Bolshevize its ranks. However, many other issues remain that need to be dealt with. For example, we need to resolve the organizational problem and improve our fighting capacities. In addition, it is more urgent than ever for the party to follow the Bolshevik line. Nevertheless, to adhere to the correct political line, complete our current work, and truly carry out the party's line in practice, we must fight in both theory and practice against both right opportunism and "leftist" putschism. At the present time, the rightist tendency is the most dangerous. We must fight ruthlessly against any rightist and "leftist" tendencies inside the party no matter how small they may seem. Unless we do this, we will be unable to defeat the Trotskyite-Chen Duxiu liquidationist group and to eradicate any sympathetic feelings toward them inside the party. Only by launching an uncompromising two-line struggle can the party adopt a genuine Bolshevik attitude. Thus, the party must organize all our actions and policies in accordance with the requirements of the two-line struggle.

[[19] With the current economic crisis, we must gather all our strength for the forthcoming decisive struggle.]]

In light of this, the major danger now is the right opportunist tendency which is seen in the phenomenon of tailism. A few local party organizations have been left behind by the development of the mass revolutionary movement. Their opportunism causes these party organizations to worry about the continuous growth of the anti-imperialist struggle, abandon organizing strikes, feel hesitant about attacking the leaders of the yellow trade unions, and pursue the legalization of the trade unions. Sometimes they even surrender to the leaders of the yellow trade unions when asked to give up the strikes. The right opportunists also underestimate the significance of the guerrilla warfare and support the rich peasants' demands in the soviet areas.

20) Yet because of the urgent need to develop guerrilla warfare and to organize peasant uprisings and the labor movement, the dangerous tendency of putschism and closed-doorism has also increased. This tendency is displayed by the underestimation of the initiatives of the masses. When planning insurrections, the "leftist" putschists refuse to take into consideration the strength of the people, overestimate the strength of the mutinies within the warlord armies, which are alienated from the peasant struggle, mechanically adopt the strategy of nationwide strikes, and implement economic policies in the soviet areas that are marked by a "leftist" infantile disease. The task of the party is to wage a struggle against both the rightist and the "left" tendencies, especially right opportunism, because this tendency is the greatest danger preventing smooth execution of the party's tasks.

III) The Future of the Chinese Revolution and Its Tasks

[[21) The bourgeoisie-landlord alliance has failed and will never be able to solve the problems that triggered the 1925–27 revolution. A new revolutionary high tide will rise up as the rural revolution develops under proletarian leadership.

22) Because of the failure of the 1911 Revolution and that of 1925–27, it remains our task to establish the revolutionary democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants. It still has a bourgeois democratic nature.

23) However, the Chinese revolution is different from normal bourgeois democratic revolutions. Its participants are the workers and peasants rather than the bourgeoisie, and the revolution is not led by the bourgeoisie. Indeed, while executing the tasks of the bourgeois democratic stage, they struggle directly against the bourgeoisie. The Chinese bourgeois democratic revolution is distinctive in that once it triumphs, it will directly move to the phase of the socialist revolution. For many reasons, the bourgeois democratic revolution in China is, at the same time, an anti-imperialist revolution and a prerequisite for the proletarian dictatorship and the socialist revolution. It will take a noncapitalist road, and will gradually transform into the socialist revolution through a number of transitional phases that will pave the way both materially and economically.

24) Changes in the international environment mean that the worker-peasant revolutionary democratic dictatorship in China will be quite different from that established by the Bolsheviks in Russia in 1905. There will be more transitional phases in China to reach the socialist phase than in Russia. However, it will take less time than the 1905 Russian revolution to transform from the bourgeois democratic stage to the socialist stage.

25) The international environment for the prospects of the transition of the Chinese revolution is very favorable, and the future of the socialist revolution in China is bright.

26) Domestic economic conditions also make it necessary to follow a noncapitalist road. Foreign holdings should be nationalized, properties of reactionary Chinese capitalists should be confiscated, major water projects should be nationalized, and a cooperative movement should be begun.]]

27) Yet, in the initial stage of the Chinese revolution, the possibility for capitalist development will remain. This is particularly the case in agriculture. With the elimination of the landlord and warlord systems and usurious exploitation, capitalism will certainly develop. The noncapitalist economic development of the Chinese revolution does not mean that capitalist social relations will be eradicated immediately. We will use the political power of the revolutionary democratic dictatorship and our economic strength to create favorable conditions for the development of large-scale, noncapitalist (socialist) production. In the economic struggle between socialism and capitalism, the victory of the proletariat depends not only on domestic conditions but also on the international environment. We must remember that socialism cannot be realized overnight; it will take a long time. It will be necessary to reach a number of transitional phases to transform into the socialist stage. There are many specific measures that must be put into effect. Nevertheless, the various plans to develop socialism must be made in accordance with the desire of the broad masses of the people. We must enable the majority of the people to understand the significance of these measures. On the other hand, these measures should be decided in accordance with the economic conditions and must be feasible. China is dominated by the small-scale peasant economy. Thus, transitional measures must be linked to the interests of the majority of the peasants. We should also be fully aware of the difference of the social conditions and the organizational capability as well as the consciousness of the peasants in various areas, and the influence of the clan system and other forms. We must remember that our task is to reform the small-scale peasant economy, not to eliminate it. Therefore, when deciding the transitional measures, the proletariat should never alienate its reserve army—the broad masses of the peasantry.

28) We should advocate and carry out propaganda on the future of the socialist development. At the same time, it is necessary to point out that the Comintern's policy is different from the theories of the Trotskyite—Chen Duxiuists and Dr. Sun Yat-sen's doctrine. The noncapitalist development we propose has nothing in common with the Trotskyite view that claims that the present stage of the Chinese revolution is socialist. It is Trotsky who, while making empty noises about the “leftist” socialist nature of the Chinese revolution, completely neglects the strength of the growing peasant struggle. In fact, this is Trotsky's character—he always underestimates the strength of the peasantry and its enthusiasm for the revolution. He fails to understand the task of the bourgeois democratic revolution and the process for development into the socialist stage. The central task of the Chinese revolution is the rural revolution. The revolution itself is developing in the form of a peasant war led by the proletariat. The Marxist-Leninist theory of noncapitalist development, that is, the theory of the socialist road, has nothing in common with the empty talk of Trotsky, who claims that the Chinese revolution has already entered the socialist stage. Such Trotskyite empty talk is merely a mask to cover the Menshevik-Trotskyite proposal for a “National Assembly.” Also, the Comintern's ideas differ from Dr. Sun Yat-sen's utopianism. Sun's utopianism fantasizes that the problems of capitalism can be avoided by placing some restriction on capital. The nature of Sun's theory can be understood by looking at the support it has received from the foreign capitalist countries of the world.

C.20 Resolution of the Third Plenum of the CCP on the Political Situation and the Party's General Tasks (September 1930)¹¹³

The September 1930 Decision on Acceptance of the July 1930 Resolution on the Chinese Question Adopted by the Political Secretariat of the ECCI.¹¹⁴

I) The International Situation and the Chinese Revolution

[[1] The Boom in Soviet Socialist Construction and the World Economic Crisis

The main contradiction in the world is between the increasingly prosperous construction of the socialist state and the daily weakening of the capitalist system. Thus, the imperialists are preparing to attack the Soviet Union while heading for a war among themselves. The world economic crisis has prompted counterattacks by the proletariat and the rise of revolutionary struggles in the colonies. The worldwide workers' movement and the revolutionary upsurge of the working people in colonies have already started. The latest world crisis serves only to promote further the development of civil wars in colonies, and in the Chinese revolution in particular. This situation has clearly smashed the pessimistic, liquidationist evaluation of the world revolution made by Trotskyites at home and abroad and the rightists in the party.

2) The Upsurge of the World Revolution and the Chinese Revolution

It is wrong to argue that the Chinese revolution can only achieve victory after the victory of the revolutions in the important capitalist countries. The victory of the Chinese revolution will have a great impact on the victory of the world revolution.]]

II) The Upsurge of the Chinese Revolutionary Movement

[[3] The Worsening of the Chinese Political and Economic Crises

The reactionary GMD and the warlord government have colluded closely with the bourgeoisie and the imperialist powers. The world capitalist economic crisis has caused China's economy to deteriorate, resulting in a severe crisis in industry, agriculture, and finance. The imperialists clash with one another in their attempts to divide up China. Similarly, the GMD fights among itself. This has destroyed the illusion of the so-called unification of China under the banner of the blue sky and the white sun.]]

4) The New Period of the Upsurge of the Chinese Revolutionary Movement

The development of Chinese revolutionary forces is entering a new period. The Chinese Workers and Peasants' Red Army took over Changsha and then evacuated the city.¹¹⁵ Learning the military and political lessons from the occupation, the Red Army is now concentrating and reorganizing its forces for a more effective fight against the reactionary rule. Despite the slanders and smears of the various factions of the imperialist GMD, Chen Duxiu, Trotsky, and others, the ten-day-old soviet government in Changsha has won broad sympathy and support from the working people throughout the country and the whole world. During the first occupation of Changsha, the various Red Army forces did not coordinate their actions fully. In addition, the Red Army's attack was not properly linked with the struggle of the masses in Changsha. Third, the rear bases were not organized properly. Fourth, there were many facets of guerrilla warfare. However, the occupation of Changsha has ushered in a new period in the upsurge of the Chinese revolution. The soviet uprising in Canton in December 1927 was a "battle by retreating soldiers" from the recently failed revolution, whereas the ten-day-old soviet regime in Changsha waged a "battle by advancing soldiers" in the new revolution. It began the revolutionary war for a soviet victory nationwide. The Red Army in Jiangxi, Hubei, Guangxi, Fujian, and Guangdong further strengthened its forces during this period. New soviet areas have been established and developed. Peasant guerrilla warfare, local uprisings, and spontaneous peasant struggles are expanding. Mutinies by the soldiers from the warlord armies have increased in strength and scale, especially in those forces which have contacts with Red Army units.

The spontaneous struggles by the urban poor have often developed into large riots and movements to seize rice. Under the extremely brutal white terror, workers in the key cities have launched mass strikes and have come into armed confrontation with the police, including the police in foreign concessions and the armed forces (for example, the massive national movement and political demonstrations of Red May 1930, the August 1 Movement, the strike of water and electricity workers in Shanghai, the strike of 50,000 female silk factory workers in Shanghai, the large strike of textile workers and rickshaw workers in Qingdao, and the strike of the workers at the Yuyuan Textile Mill in Wuhan). Although the scale and force of the movements are not sufficiently large, the intensity and increasing upsurge are apparent. The opposition of ordinary workers to yellow trade unions and the GMD has become more widespread and intense. This shows that the working class has increasingly realized that the only way forward is through armed insurrections and that the GMD regime must be toppled and replaced by the soviets. This situation clearly indicates that the development of the Chinese Workers and Peasants' Red Army, the occupation of Changsha, and the beginning of the revolutionary war have proceeded against the general background of a new upsurge in China and that the soviet regime is the only banner under which all the revolutionary movements can be united.

5) The Characteristic of the Current Revolutionary Movement

The current revolutionary movement is characterized by the possibility of a transition from revolutionary actions by some workers and peasants to a general revolutionary offensive. (a) Although class struggle has not yet developed fully, it is strong enough to attack the entirety of the imperialists and the GMD's rule and it is increasing in intensity day by day. (b) The momentum and strength of the peasant movement is developing unevenly in different localities. While in some areas peasant guerrilla warfare has just started, in others it can overthrow local GMD governments. (c) The Red Army's war has expanded into a large-scale conventional war against imperialist warlords. Revolutionary mutinies by warlord soldiers and responses to Red Army appeals are increasing day by day. Thus, to some extent, the warlords' wars are beginning to turn into revolutionary wars. (d) The gradual convergence of soviet areas should begin by establishing revolutionary regimes in various scattered regions and then moving to set up an interim central soviet government, so as to command and organize the revolutionary war and to concentrate revolutionary forces. Thus, a united revolutionary soviet regime will counter the reactionary GMD regime, lead the national revolutionary movement, and fight for the victory of the soviet regime throughout the whole country.

[[6] GMD Massacres and Armed Intervention in the Chinese Revolution by the Imperialists

The GMD has launched a reign of white terror to salvage its rule. It is helped by imperialist military advisors. The imperialists are preparing to send troops to China.

7) GMD and Liquidationist Support for the Policy of White Terror

The reformists in the GMD and the liquidationists have put forward the slogan of convening a National Assembly. Trotskyites throughout the world have not protested against the white terror but have done their utmost to slander the Red Army, the CCP, and the Comintern.

8) The Future Development of the Chinese Revolution

The broadest possible revolutionary forces of the masses should be mobilized to oppose the enemies of the Chinese revolution.]]

III) The Comintern's Correct Evaluation of the Present Situation of the Chinese Revolution

9) The Unanimous General Political Line of the CC and the Comintern

[[Recent developments have demonstrated the complete correctness of the Comintern's view as expressed in July 1930 [see Doc. C.19].]]

The enlarged Third Plenum of the CC acknowledges that the Politburo's line is correct and accords with that of the Comintern. In view of the upsurge of general revolutionary movements, the party's line should be to mobilize the masses for struggle, concentrate the revolutionary forces, organize the revolutionary war, and actively prepare for armed uprisings in the fight for a nationwide soviet regime. This means that first of all the role of the party and red trade unions should be strengthened in the factories and the daily economic struggles of the proletariat should be organized and should be closely integrated with political slogans and struggles. This will enable us to mobilize and organize the greatest majority of workers in industrial cities. At the same time, the mass movements in industrial cities should be coordinated with revolutionary peasant movements and the actions of the Red Army to create the necessary condition for general strikes and armed uprisings and the consolidation and expansion of soviet areas and bases.

10) The Correction of the Past Erroneous Estimates by the CC Plenum

Yet, this Plenum holds that it must point out the ambiguities and mistakes in the recent evaluation of the current situation by the Politburo on many important issues. This primarily concerns overoptimism regarding the situation, inability to observe the uneven development of the situation, neglect of the significance of the soviet bases, and the link between the routine struggles in industrial regions and political issues. In a nutshell, the Politburo has failed to foresee fully that the forces of the workers and peasants' movement are still developing in an uneven way and are not linked up. The peasants' war still lacks adequate proletarian leadership and organization. Also, the Politburo has failed to see that the ruling class has not been completely weakened or gone bankrupt. Therefore, there is overoptimism about the situation and about the probability for the collapse of imperialist reactionary rule, about the present status of the revolutionary forces, and about the speed at which the revolutionary situation will develop. Despite the correctness of the General Line, the 11 June Politburo resolution contained these erroneous evaluations, stating that the main cause of the "failure of the workers in cities to move to an objective revolutionary situation is the repression caused by the white terror" [see Doc. C.18]. It overlooks the fact that the inadequate organizational role of the CCP among the masses and in the revolution is also a cause. It even stated that "so long as a great workers' struggle breaks out in industrial areas and political centers, an objective revolutionary situation will immediately be created." This estimate is ambiguous and incorrect and will lead to, and has already resulted in, tactical mistakes.

Such evaluations are not based on the full realization that (i) at the present time in the industrial centers of major cities there is insufficient mass mobilization; (ii) leadership should be further strengthened and concentrated in all soviet areas and in the development and expansion of the Red Army. Positions should be set up and consolidated to meet more brutal and large-scale decisive battles. Therefore, the Politburo's previous policy contained mistakes of adventurism, actively preparing for the task of armed uprisings without adequate and close coordination with the task of winning over the masses. Thus, adventurous and rash arrangements for armed uprisings replaced the struggle to create realistic conditions for armed uprisings.

In order to implement thoroughly and resolutely the Comintern's and the CCP's General Line, these mistakes must be corrected immediately and completely in line with the ECCI's instruction and the necessary changes should be carried out with respect to general tactics and work.

11) Oppose a Vacillating Party Line

At the same time, this Plenum points out that correction of the Politburo's previous tactical mistakes does not imply any alteration of party line. Recently, right-wing opportunists used these few mistakes in their attempt to attack the CC's line. By holding that it is necessary to adopt conservative policies at present, they tried to distort the Comintern's line to overthrow the CC's and Comintern's general line. To sum up, the leftist evaluation of the situation holds that a national objective revolutionary situation has arrived and that arrangements for armed uprisings should be made as soon as possible. By contrast, the right-wing evaluation denies a nationwide general crisis and the general revolutionary uprising and holds that the policy of preparing for general and integrated strikes and actively getting ready for armed uprisings should be abandoned. Both viewpoints contradict the party's and the Comintern's General Line. The right-wing evaluation is tantamount to a policy of surrender and represents the view of the liquidationist spies hidden inside the party.

In the final analysis, the left-wing empty talk that "workers only want armed uprisings, but not strikes and demonstrations" and the right-wing opposition to political struggles and to the creation of necessary conditions for armed uprisings are two tendencies that hamper the winning over of the broad masses and the initiation and direction of resolute struggles.

The party should wage steadfast struggles against left-wing empty talk about general strikes and armed uprisings, while neglecting routine mass work in the factories and the immediate and daily demands of the masses. The party should also oppose right opportunism that only takes note of economic struggles, denies the close link between economic and political struggles, and makes no effort to create the necessary conditions for general strikes and armed uprisings. At present, the main danger is right opportunism.

IV) The Main Tasks of the CCP

[[Points 12, 13, 14, and 15 outline the tasks put forward in the Comintern's July 1930 resolution. For occupying one or several industrial centers, the Plenum adds that the situation is ripest in the Hunan, Hubei, and Jiangxi areas.]]

16) The Relationship Between Gaining Mass Support and Actively Preparing for Armed Uprisings

[[No struggle no matter how small should be neglected, but this should not detract from the work of preparing for armed uprisings but rather should be used to strengthen it.

17) The Expansion and Preparation of Armed Revolutionary Forces

Attention should be paid to building up the workers' military organization and peasant armed forces. Army mutinies should be used to weaken the reactionary armies. Proletarian leadership must be strengthened in all these efforts.

18) The Relationship Between the Tasks of the Soviet Areas and the Areas under Reactionary Rule

Work in the reactionary-ruled areas must be coordinated with that in the soviet areas and should not be allowed to conflict with it.]]

19) The Movement to Prepare for the National Soviet Congress

The general struggle of workers, peasants, soldiers, and poor people throughout the country, and the policies of the soviet areas and the Red Army's war must be synchronized, organized, guided, and appropriately linked and coordinated. Therefore, the party's immediate concrete task is to lead activities to prepare for the First National Congress of the extremely broad-based Congress of Chinese Workers, Peasants, and Soldiers (the soviets). It is essential to be able to link effectively and closely the liberation movement of workers and peasants in China's big cities and areas ruled by reactionaries and their daily struggle with activities to prepare for the Congress of Soviets. Furthermore, the broadest-based masses from the various soviet areas should be mobilized to participate in preparations for the Congress. Thus, the National Soviet Congress and the interim Central Soviet Government of Workers and Peasants that will emerge from the Congress will genuinely be supported by the fighting working people of the country.

20) The Main Policy Guidelines for the Soviet Government

[[Both within China and abroad, a wide-ranging movement should be launched to support the Congress of Soviets. Unity with the Soviet Union is especially important.

21) The Party's Organizational Tasks

These tasks require the party to increase its subjective force by expanding its proletarian base. Party members must also be recruited from among rural laborers. Revolutionary mass organizations should be expanded and party leadership in them must be strengthened. Nonparty mass organizations must be expanded to enable the party to develop and consolidate its influence among the broad masses.]]

In the future, one of the party's essential organizational tasks should be to expand systematically the base of the red trade unions to enable them to become genuine mass organizations. The All-China Federation of Trade Unions, the Shanghai Trade Union Association, and all trade unions at the provincial level and trade unions of various industries must become organizations with fighting strength. New trade union cadres should be selected from among the best and most active workers in factories, and especially from among the most active participants in strikes and various forms of struggle. The tendency to worry about and distrust nonparty proletarian elements working in leading organs should be eliminated. Party branches and fractions, especially in factories and unions, should unite the many selected proletarian cadres around them.

Party organizations and trade unions should pay special attention to the working women's movement, and the women factory workers' movement in particular. Party and [Youth] League headquarters at all levels and the entire leading body of the trade unions, including all branches and every trade union grass-roots organization, must be responsible for the active promotion of women's work.

The party should not accept the present grave crisis that plagues the YL. Work among young laborers is extremely weak. The percentage of workers among the league members is even smaller than that among party members. Although mass organizations for youths exist in the soviet areas, they are in serious need of the league's correct leadership. The party must drastically accelerate its efforts to increase its political and organizational leadership over the YL and strengthen its opposition to the main danger of rightism and to left-wing empty talk and exclusivism, which hamper real changes in its work. The changes instructed by the International YL should be effectively implemented, and the league's work should be done by young people. It is especially important to oppose the tendency within the party to neglect youth work. The Politburo's resolution on "general administrative committees" had the effect of abolishing league organizations. This mistake was only recently corrected. The mistake has increased the tendency to abolish the YL. Therefore, it is of special importance to oppose resolutely this serious danger. Meanwhile, the struggle should be intensified to combat the "second party tendency" of the advanced members as a result of this recent mistake.

22) The Policy of a Grass-Roots United Front

[[The GMD Reorganizationists, the Chen Duxiu--Trotskyite liquidationists, and the so-called third party have used clever means to hoodwink the masses in order to maintain the rule of the reactionaries.]]

These political factions and saboteurs of the revolution have been hiding but are active in the soviet areas. Their activities, especially in areas ruled by reactionaries, have been successful in deceiving the backward masses. At the least they cause a temporary hesitance, lack of organization, and confusion among the masses. Thus, the CP's task is to step up the struggle against these factions and elements in order to gain leadership over the spontaneous mass movements. It is essential to disarm them politically. This requires implementation of the tactic of a "grass-roots mass united front." The CP should unite with all non-CP and grass-roots masses in all struggles, especially in their daily struggles, and exercise leadership over their movements independently, so that all these movements can develop under the general slogan of the soviet regime. Thus, the course of struggle will expose the reactionary role and the true color of the factions, the deception, manipulation, selling out, and oppression of the masses by the leaders of yellow trade unions.

23) The Transformation of the Revolutionary Struggle against Sun Yat-senism and Trotskyism

The trend of Chinese revolutionary developments is characterized by the speed and depth of the development of the struggles. Therefore, the ECCI has especially pointed out the current tasks for the Chinese revolution and the question of the future of the road of socialist development. In recent resolutions, the Politburo has stated that on the question of transforming the Chinese bourgeois democratic revolution into a socialist revolution the argument of "two totally separate revolutions" and of "the beginning of the revolutionary victory being the socialist revolution" are erroneous. Though this statement is correct, it is not based on a clear perception of who are our own masses, and it is arbitrary to say that "victory in one or several provinces would necessarily lead to the beginning of a revolutionary transformation." The party must correct these mistakes in line with the detailed instructions of the Comintern's July [June] resolution. It should point out more clearly and precisely and explain that the current state of the Chinese revolution is a democratic one and that the prospect for victory lies with socialist development. Furthermore, it is necessary to step up the struggle against Sun Yat-senism and Trotskyism on this issue.

V) The Struggle on Two Fronts Against Leftist and Rightist Tendencies

24) Self-Criticism and the Struggle Against Various Tendencies

At present, the party must take on the heavy task of organizing the revolutionary war, that is, the active preparation of armed uprisings. It should increase its own fighting power organizationally, oppose the influence of all reactionary factions among the masses, and win over the broad masses. In order to implement these tasks, the party must examine its work effectively and carry out Bolshevik self-criticism in accordance with the July [June] resolution of the Political Secretariat of the ECCI and the resolutions of the current Plenum. From the Party Center to the branches, the Comintern and the party's line should be used to review and criticize mistakes in tactics and organizational work. These and other shortcomings must be firmly corrected. The whole party should understand the nature of these mistakes and draw lessons from them. Moreover, it is imperative to guard against reconciliationist and non-Bolshevik "free criticism" that deviate from the party line and against criticisms that go so far as to attack the party line. Under the present circumstances, the party should, more than at any other time, ensure ideological and Bolshevik unity and wage a struggle on two fronts against leftist and rightist tendencies and reconciliationism.

25) "Left-Wing" Mistakes

The need to lead strikes and work resolutely to develop the link between the peasant guerrilla warfare and local uprisings has given rise to adventurism and mistakes of closed-doorism [guanmen zhuyi]. This is in addition to the main crisis caused by right opportunism. The former mistakes are characterized by failure to win over the masses, inability to estimate the strength of the masses, operational plans that are divorced from the masses, etc. Some comrades have proposed slogans such as "ignore yellow trade unions," "expel all who are not farmhands from the party," "kill all rich peasants," "lead only poor peasants possessing less than ten mu of land in resisting taxation and rent." Under such circumstances, the leadership of the daily struggles of the masses has already been abandoned, and the organizational consolidation of the party's influence and mass organizations has been neglected. Some have even used the pretext that "the masses want only uprisings, but no strikes, and only major initiatives, not minor ones." In fact, they are engaging in extremely harmful opportunist passivism. Such sentiments among the masses show sufficiently that the masses' hatred of the GMD has increased and that the organization of their forces should be strengthened. To abandon the leadership of the daily struggle of the masses because of such sentiments is the same as waiting for uprisings. Furthermore, such "left-wing" sentiments often result in superficial "resolute offensives" in the revolutionary war but in reality lead to "fighting without protecting the rear." In the soviet areas, these sentiments would make it difficult to adopt policies to deal with the imperialists properly. Naive "left-wing" policies that are divorced from the peasant masses would be adopted. There could be opposition to rich peasants without unity with the middle peasants. Generally speaking, it would not be possible to disarm politically the reorganizationists, liquidationists, and yellow trade unions, and the tactic of a grass-roots united front could be opposed.

The "left-wing" mistakes result mainly from the emphasis by the advanced elements on their feelings, to the neglect of the down-to-earth and hard work of winning over the masses. Therefore, they make the mistakes of being divorced from the masses and of petty bourgeois radicalism. Left-wing mistakes in fact consolidate the position of right opportunism. Thus, it is necessary to oppose resolutely all forms of leftist tendencies and to reject any kind of reconciliationist attitude.

26) The Main Danger of Rightist Tendencies and Reconciliationism

Meanwhile, the party must use the struggles to prepare and gather forces for the decisive battle in the near future and to launch bravely and lead independently the revolutionary struggle by tens of millions of people. Under these conditions of struggle, the main danger inside the party is right opportunism.

In the present situation, the most serious danger is actually lagging behind the mass struggle, or tailism. Some comrades argue that "the masses are right wing and backward" and have used that argument to cover up their own reluctance to work. The actual theoretical manifestation of such right opportunism is the argument for the legitimacy of trade unions (surrendering to yellow trade unions and the yellow tendency of abandoning independent leadership), the rich peasant line in the countryside (obstructing the land revolution, proposing conservative and peaceful development, abandoning the masses to the influence of rich peasants, etc.), contempt for the peasant war, fear of "excessive" development of the anti-imperialist movement, etc. Apart from such manifestations, there is a still more serious phenomenon of forming a complete rightist line, in an effort to urge comrades to oppose the party line. The rightist line takes the following forms: (i) By arguing that "international proletarian assistance to the Chinese revolution" are empty words and that the "planes and artillery of the imperialists are tangible forces," it indicates that victory of the revolutionary war is hopeless. (ii) It points out that workers in cities have not waged revolutionary struggles, that there is no possibility of a general strike, and that it is only possible to wage small-scale, day-to-day economic struggles at present. (iii) It states that the peasant struggle cannot become a major force without the revolutionary struggle of the workers and that the war waged by peasants comprises "tribal uprisings" (the occupation of Changsha has absolutely no future). (iv) It uses the pretext of uneven development to deny the general worldwide crisis and the widespread revolutionary high tide (rejecting the existence of the "third period") and to refuse to acknowledge the nationwide political and economic crisis in China and the general revolutionary upsurge. (v) Therefore, it believes that it is unnecessary to have an overall guideline for the organization of revolutionary wars and active preparation for armed uprisings. It fundamentally denies the achievements of the party and promotes pessimism, advocating avoidance of violent struggles and peaceful development of "subjective strength." It argues that everything has to wait until red trade unions have organized the majority of workers. (vi) It spreads rumors and discord inside the party by alleging that internally the party has adopted a delegate system and that "comrades are afraid to speak out." It promotes and instigates unprincipled factional struggles. Obviously, this line counters the party's entire line, thus also opposing that of the Comintern. However, taking advantage of the Politburo's few tactical and organizational mistakes, these rightists have not only manufactured rumors, smears, and discord and engaged in factional activities, but also have publicized that the CC's line differs from that of the Comintern. Employing diplomatic methods, in fact they oppose the line of both the Comintern and the party under the cover of "supporting" the Comintern's line. The leaders of these elements have always been against the Party Center since the earlier stage of the struggle against Chen Duxiu and the dispute on the question of Jiangsu before the Second Plenum.¹¹⁶

Nevertheless, when the party criticizes and punishes these rightists, some comrades still entertain reconciliationist attitudes, arguing that the rightist line has not been formulated completely, that it may be necessary to repudiate rightism ideologically, but that there is no need to punish them organizationally. They only affirm that the Party Center and the Comintern have differences, but refuse to respond to the smear of the Party Center by the rightists. In sum, the characteristic of reconciliationism is to submit to the Party Center in terms of the organizational system, but to reserve ideological freedom and freedom of discussion, even though this might shake the party's line.

The reconciliationists have always been those comrades who have factional and small group tendencies. Now they are in fact hindering the party's struggle against rightism. If they refuse to abandon their hidden opportunist positions, sooner or later they will openly embark on the opportunist road.

The party must reject reconciliationism. Then it will be able to overcome ruthlessly the main danger of right opportunism and triumph over the petty bourgeois wavering and the mentality of foremen and rich peasants. If these comrades refuse to correct their mistakes and persist in them, the party must eliminate them. Viewed objectively, these rightists who have formed a complete line must be no other than liquidationist spies hidden inside the party.

27) The Party's Struggle on Two Fronts and the Implementation of the Revolutionary Tasks

The enlarged Third Plenum of the CCP CC unanimously holds that the last corrections and instructions from the ECCI concerning the Politburo are entirely correct. To implement these instructions and the Comintern's July [June] resolution in order to correct past tactical organizational mistakes and other mistakes in our work, to implement the Comintern's line more resolutely, and to fulfill the present heavy revolutionary tasks, it is essential to carry out steadfastly the struggle on two fronts and oppose leftism, rightism, and accommodationism, while concentrating fire on the main danger of rightism. The party's task on this question is to intensify simultaneously the struggle on two fronts with special emphasis on opposing rightism, because rightism is the main menace to the implementation of the party's current important tasks.

Notes: Since the Sixth Congress, the Politburo has basically used the phrases "revolutionary upsurge" and "direct revolutionary situation" synonymously. Syntactically, the phrases “high tide” and “upsurge” are easily used interchangeably. However, the substantive meanings of “direct revolutionary situation” (or what the Comintern’s latest resolution calls the “objective situation”) and “upsurge” are very different. So the phrase “high tide” should be eliminated.

1) When referring to a general situation of flourishing and booming revolutionary movements, only use the word “upsurge.”

2) When referring to a situation of armed uprisings directly attacking the rule of the ruling class, Lenin’s phrase “objective revolutionary situation” should be used. The phrase “high tide” will not be used in the future. Comrade Manuisky¹¹⁷ recently explained that “direct revolutionary situation” has been used by Zinoviev and it might not be entirely appropriate.

C.21 Resolution of the Fourth Plenum of the CCP (December 1930)¹¹⁸

1) In its July [June] 1930 resolution and previous resolutions the Comintern pointed out clearly that the CCP’s mission was to organize the revolutionary masses and to mobilize the revolutionary forces to wage attacks on the imperialists, the feudal system, and the GMD reactionaries. However, just at the critical moment when the revolution was surging ahead, the CCP leadership, dominated by Comrade Li Lisan’s line, ignored all the Comintern’s instructions and adopted an adventurist-putschist and anti-Comintern policy. People have all now realized that Comrade Li Lisan’s anti-Comintern line has brought enormous damage to the party. It is impossible, however, to analyze here all the disasters caused by Comrade Lisan’s anti-Leninist and adventurist line. The Fourth Plenum can point out only the most evil outcome of the Lisan line: the party’s influence on the masses and its relationship with the working people have been greatly weakened, its ability to mobilize the masses has been seriously damaged, the actions of all mass organizations have been reduced, and our labor movement has met setbacks. As far as our capability to lead and organize strikes is concerned, it has been greatly weakened rather than strengthened. Under the leadership of the Lisan line, the party did not do its best under the conditions of a revolutionary high tide to consolidate itself, the YL, and the mass organizations, but rather has liquidated the mass organizations and the YL, and sapped the party’s strength. In addition, Comrade Lisan put those comrades who supported the Comintern line under great pressure, thus creating a very abnormal state for party life. The general deterioration and the weakening of our party in various aspects have provided both the Trotskyite–Chen Duxiust group and the rightist faction with the opportunity to carry out their activities. Meanwhile, the Lisan line launched quite a number of rash uprisings based on purely putschist methods without the necessary preparations. As a result, our party lost prestige among the masses, our best cadres were killed, and our party organizations were wiped out in the most important areas of the country. The urgent task of expanding the anti-imperialist movement was totally abandoned. The party's task of leadership outside of the soviet areas, of developing and gradually intensifying the struggle of the peasant masses in order to bring them to a level where they could provide direct assistance to the soviet movement has been completely abandoned. Finally, as a result of Comrade Lisan's policy, the same stupid mistake was repeated in the soviet areas, which seriously damaged the work to consolidate and develop the Red Army. The party issued premature, adventurist, and dogmatic orders to the Red Army to attack the large cities at a time when we had not yet consolidated the base areas or made any necessary preparations, and our forces were not strong and had not acquired the support of the people. Our failure in Changsha was a direct outcome of such an erroneous strategy. Concerning our work in the soviet areas, party leaders neither firmly opposed Comrade Lisan's theory of an alliance with the rich peasants nor did any work to organize the poor peasant associations and the unions of the farmhands and the coolies. Owing to the influence of the Lisan line and the negligence of the local party organizations, the rich peasants were able to penetrate our leading bodies and appropriate the fruits of the rural revolution for their own ends. The theory of collective farms and all other premature socialist ideas advocated by Li Lisan helped strengthen the position of the rich peasants. The policies of forbidding free trade and the buying and selling of land caused a further deterioration in the economy of the soviet areas. These errors destroyed our alliance with the middle peasants and dampened the enthusiastic participation of the majority of the peasants in the soviet movement. Li Lisan's leadership totally overlooked the necessity of consolidating the soviet base areas and establishing a powerful soviet government. Considering guerrilla warfare outdated, the party leadership ordered the Red Army to abandon it. As a result, our position has been greatly weakened during the current attacks by the warlords on the soviet areas. These are the major reasons why the Red Army has suffered serious defeats recently. Meanwhile, there has been a failure to carry out the work to expand the soviet movement; this is especially apparent with work to prepare the convening of the soviet Congress [31 May 1930].

Summing up the evil outcome of the Lisan line, the enlarged Fourth Plenum wants to make it particularly clear that during the period from the Sixth Congress [July–September 1928] until June 1930, although the CC made quite a few mistakes on the issues of rich peasants, the yellow unions, and the reorganization movement, under the correct General Line our party achieved great success. Nevertheless, much of the success was spoiled as a result of the Lisan line.

2) Comrade Lisan's errors were by no means isolated or accidental but were the product of a consistently and systematically anti-Leninist line embodying many incorrect ideas. In essence, these incorrect ideas were a repetition of Trotsky's theory. The Lisan line denied the uneven development of the world revolution at the general climax of the [Chinese] revolution. Thus, it dismissed the possibility of separate victory and consolidation of the Chinese revolution. The Lisan line also completely failed to understand the nature and stages of the Chinese revolution. It replaced Lenin's theory that there must be a transitional period of the revolution with Trotsky's point of view that denies the bourgeois democratic stage in the development of the revolution. This demonstrates that Li Lisan did not understand at all the tasks of the present stage of the Chinese revolution. He denied the uneven development of the revolution in China and ignored the special features of the Chinese political and economic environment. Thus, the Lisan line denied the possibility of winning victory in one or several provinces first. Moreover, it completely failed to understand the party's role as an organizer of the revolution and the correct relationship between the communist vanguards and the masses of workers and peasants. It not only distorted but also rejected the Marxist-Leninist theory of an armed uprising, and thus provided the theoretical basis for the adventurist and putschist line and led the party onto that road. This is shown clearly in Lisan's statement that "Workers prefer insurrections to strikes." All in all, the Lisan line absolutely contradicted the Comintern line and was essentially an opportunist viewpoint camouflaged by "leftist" words. Its attitude toward the revolutionary task of organizing the masses was one of opportunist passivism. Historically, the Lisan line originated from the opportunism and putschism formed at the Sixth Congress and that still remain in the party even today. Relying on this absolutely erroneous line, Comrade Lisan waged a struggle against the Comintern and disobeyed the Comintern's discipline. With the help of the theory of the "leftist" and rightist traitors of the Comintern, he claimed that the Comintern was not in a position to lead the Chinese revolution because of its ignorance of the situation in China.

The Fourth Plenum firmly condemns the anti-Leninist line of the Politburo from June to August 1930 and its unbearably hostile attitude toward the Comintern. The Plenum firmly points out that the serious setbacks suffered by our party at present are all caused by Comrade Lisan and his supporters because they ignored the instructions and warnings of the ECCI. The Fourth Plenum also points out that the credit for the correction of all these mistakes belongs to the Comintern.

3) The Comintern has asked our party to expose fully Comrade Lisan's "theory" and eliminate completely the effects of all his anti-Comintern policies. At present, the imperialists and the GMD warlords have launched offensives against the soviet areas. This makes it all the more urgent for the party to eradicate the semi-Trotskyite Lisan line and to follow the Comintern's instructions and resolutions. Judging the Third Plenum [September 1930] in this light, the present Enlarged Fourth Plenum finds that the Third Plenum did not fulfill this task. The political resolution and other relevant documents of the Third Plenum all reveal this fact. (a) The political resolution of the Third Plenum only mentioned very briefly and mildly a few isolated mistakes of Comrade Lisan and said nothing about the nature of the Lisan line [Doc. C.20]. This is a serious error since the Lisan line was absolutely wrong and conflicted with the Comintern's line. (b) This resolution made a positive assessment of the notorious 11 June resolution [Doc. C.18] despite the fact that it was significantly opposed to the program of the Comintern. (c) The political resolution of the Third Plenum also affirmed positively the political line and work of the Politburo between June and August 1930 while in reality the Politburo during this period was dominated by the semi-Trotskyite Lisan line. (d) Because of its wrong attitude toward the Lisan line and its reconciliationist stand, the political resolution and other relevant documents of the Third Plenum contained many incorrect ideas.

The resolutions passed by the Third Plenum demonstrate that the party leadership at that time had not yet realized the erroneous essence of the Lisan policy or understood that such a policy was contradictory in principle to the only correct line of the Comintern. In light of this background, it is not surprising that the resolution did not make any thorough change in the party's General Line. Nor could it serve as an ideological weapon for the party to expose and overcome Comrade Lisan's incorrect theory.

The other relevant documents of the Third Plenum had even more serious problems. They blurred Comintern instructions that asked the CCP to abandon its erroneous line. For example: (a) the Third Plenum's "Letter to All Comrades" further modified the wording of the political resolution.¹¹⁹ As a result, the broad masses of party members knew nothing at all about the difference between the Comintern line and the semi-Trotskyite Lisan line. (b) Comrade [Qu] Qiubai's article "The Significance of the Third Plenum," published together with the resolutions of the Third Plenum in the first issue of the True Words [Shihua], did not mention one word about Lisan's mistakes or about his adventurist line.¹²⁰ (c) The CC's announcement after the Third Plenum did not expose Comrade Lisan's mistakes. On the contrary, it tried to construe the Lisan line as correct and in line with the Comintern's resolutions on the China question. Guided by the general reconciliationist line of the Third Plenum, there was no significant improvement in the work of the local party organizations in various areas. During this period, the Northern Bureau, the Southern Bureau, the Jiangnan [Jiangsu] Provincial Committee, and some other local party organizations all passed incorrect resolutions.

The Enlarged Fourth Plenum has also pointed out that the party leadership adopted an unbearably arrogant attitude toward the Comintern's representative [Mif]. The Politburo leaders had agreed with the Comintern's representative beforehand to revise the wording of the Political Resolution of the Third Plenum to include a critical evaluation of the Lisan line and of the Politburo's work between June and August [1930], but they did not include the revision in the final version or even inform the Comintern's representative of this decision. Therefore, the Comintern's representative was not able to correct in time the reconciliationist attitude of the Politburo toward the Lisan line. The Fourth Plenum denounces this reconciliationist stand of the Third Plenum, which accepted the leadership of the Comintern only in word and paid no respect to the Comintern's representative. Comrade [Qu] Qiubai bears the major responsibility for this problem.

4) The Politburo's supplementary resolution of 25 November [1930] (and that of 9 December) were in complete agreement with the recent letter from the Comintern

[16 November 1930].¹²¹ It criticized the reconciliationist line of the Third Plenum and made a correct evaluation of the work of the Politburo between June and August. It exposed the anti-Comintern and anti-Leninist nature of the Lisan line, thus moving one step closer to the Comintern's position. However, since the second article of the resolution claimed that the Third Plenum had generally accepted the Comintern line, its significance was lost and its political influence greatly reduced.

Circular No. 96 [of the CC] corrected the mistakes of the Politburo and those of the 25 November resolution.¹²² Nevertheless, the circular still contained a number of problems. It did not declare the bankruptcy of the Lisan line but claimed that the party was in crisis. This was not true because by then the party was overcoming Lisanism and was making progress to perfect itself. In addition, the circular maintained that the struggle against the Lisan line was a struggle on two fronts. This analysis reflects a misunderstanding of the struggle on two fronts. True, Lisanism used leftist terms to cover up its actual right opportunism. But the struggle against the Lisan line by no means covers all the two-front struggle. The right opportunists can and have already found other people to represent them (such as Guo Miaogen and his like). In this sense, although it is of vital significance to oppose the putschist elements in the Lisan line, we must never forget that right opportunism is still the most serious danger in the party. We must bear in mind that we should fight against not only putschism but also right opportunism and conciliationism. Only by defeating all these dangerous tendencies can we keep to the Comintern line and develop the revolutionary struggle. Yet none of these views was mentioned in Circular No. 96. This disarmed the party in the struggle against the rightists. These rightists are very active in distorting the Comintern line under the false banner of anti-Lisanism, carrying on a struggle against the Lisan line on rightist grounds, denying the danger of a rightist tendency, blurring the necessity of an antirightist struggle, and attempting to mislead some local party organizations to adopt wrong methods in the struggle against Lisanism. For example: they deny the urgent need for the party to concentrate on practical work, demand ultrademocracy, put forward arbitrary slogans such as the unconditional replacement of the entire CC and all leading comrades who have made mistakes, attempt to change the fight of principle into factional and personal struggles, and refuse to make self-criticism, etc. Circular No. 96 also claimed that the Politburo continued to strengthen the Lisan line until very recently. Indeed, because of its wavering stand after the Third Plenum, the CC was unable to lead the struggle against the Lisan line. However, the explanation offered in Circular No. 96 regarding the process of the shift to the Comintern line by the CC is an incorrect one. This has made the CC's task more difficult in leading the party to carry out the struggle against the Lisan line both in the theoretical and practical spheres.

5) The Enlarged Fourth Plenum completely agrees with the recent letter from the Comintern. In order to implement all the instructions of the Comintern, the Fourth Plenum has decided to put forward the following urgent tasks for the whole party:

a) To overcome the Lisan line and reconciliationism toward it both in theory and in practice. The Fourth Plenum emphasizes that to carry out this task we must implement all Comintern instructions and that party work as a whole must undergo a sweeping change. We should not confine ourselves merely to verbal struggles against Lisanism. The Fourth Plenum calls on the whole party to unite to carry out resolutely the many important and urgent tasks confronting it.

To realize this aim, the Enlarged Fourth Plenum deems it necessary to dismiss from the CC those members who followed Comrade Lisan and were belatedly added to the CC at the Third Plenum. We should add to the CC some comrades who have supported the Comintern line in the anti-Lisan struggle and reexamine the membership of the Politburo so as to secure a correct leadership for the party.

b) The key aspect of our current task is to effect a shift in the party's work to carry out a struggle against opportunism, against passivism, and against those people who are in low spirits because they are both the source and the followers of the various antiparty tendencies and prejudices.

c) To revive the organizations of the party and the YL that have been destroyed; to improve our work in the mass organizations, especially the trade unions. We should make a special effort to improve our work in factories and consolidate as well as strengthen the activities of the party branches there. Our party must use all means to wage open struggle and to develop and strengthen our leadership of the anti-imperialist movement.

d) To recruit new cadres, particularly the more active elements among the workers; to assume leadership in the party.

e) To mobilize all our strength to resist the imperialist and the GMD warlords' attacks on the soviet areas, to convene the soviet Delegates' Congress, and to organize the working class and the peasants to struggle against the enemy's attempt to invade the Soviet Union. This is a most important task.

f) The Enlarged Fourth Plenum authorizes the new Politburo on the basis of this resolution to issue instructions and tasks for the various local party organizations so as to replace the resolutions of the Third Plenum.

g) The Fourth Plenum finds that it is necessary to convene the party's Seventh National Congress [not actually convened until April 1945] and authorizes the new Politburo to begin preparations in order to guarantee that we can have qualified delegates from local party organizations, a well-prepared summary of the experiences of the soviet movement, and a new party Constitution and other documents.

h) The Fourth Plenum points out that the Third Plenum of the YL was influenced by the reconciliationist line of the party's Third Plenum. This was reflected in its resolutions. The CC of the YL did not correct this pro-Lisan attitude until recently and failed to carry out the line of the Youth International in its work. The Fourth Plenum considers that it was absolutely right for the Politburo to reorganize the CC of the YL. After its reorganization, the YL has worked in accordance with the Comintern line. The Fourth Plenum approves the decision to hold the Fourth Plenum of the CC of the YL.

i) In line with the Comintern's instructions, the Fourth Plenum has readjusted the party's political line, solved the problems inside the party, and reorganized the party's leadership in order to make sure that the party's new political line can be carried out. The Fourth Plenum believes that from now on the whole party will unite as one person to overcome all the difficulties with the Bolshevik spirit and carry out our present historic mission. This promises new successes for the party and guarantees that the Chinese revolution will continue to surge ahead and that the struggle of the working people will win a new victory.

C.22 Program for an Emergency Session to Oppose the Report of the Fourth Plenum (January 1931)¹²³

Fight to eradicate completely the [Li] Lisan line and reconciliationism and to implement resolutely the Comintern line!

The tasks of our Chinese proletarian political party have increased with the rapid development of the Chinese revolution. Unfortunately, just at this critical moment, the Lisan line carried out by the Party Center deviated in essence from Marxism-Leninism and from the Comintern line and has caused a great failure and a tremendous loss to the revolution.

To rectify the party's leadership to bring about the rapid victory of the Chinese revolution led by the proletariat, all party members should adhere to Bolshevik principles and fight against the nonproletarian Lisan line and its followers. During this protracted struggle, however, we have encountered strong resistance and have been confronted with their various shameless deceits and slanders. Our Emergency Session has been sabotaged by them. Since the convening of the Fourth Plenum, the Party Center dominated by the Lisan line has betrayed our class interests even more wantonly. As a result, our task of carrying out the correct Comintern line and of fighting for the victory of the proletarian revolution has become more difficult!

Therefore, with a strong sense of responsibility, all Bolsheviks should now unite as one to fight resolutely and bravely to remove the Lisan line as well as reconciliationism and to implement the Comintern line!

I) The Anti-Marxism-Leninism-Comintern Lisan Line Has Met With Total Failure

The Lisan line of the CC opposed Marxism-Leninism and the Comintern. It has created serious setbacks and caused inestimable losses to the party and the revolution, thus proving a total failure of leadership. (For the Lisan line's essence, its historical origins, and its disastrous effects on the party and the Chinese revolution, please consult other dispatched materials. We will not repeat this here.)

II) The Reconciliationism Adopted by the Third Plenum Is Even More Dangerous Than the Lisan Line

The erroneous Lisan line of the CC has been criticized by the Comintern and has encountered resistance from our comrades. However, initially they adopted a stubborn and hostile attitude toward the Comintern's criticism and used punishment of a patriarchal style to suppress criticism and self-criticism inside the party. Later, when the Comintern's Resolution on China arrived in July [June] 1930 [Doc. C.19], they convened the Third Plenum, at which they deviously blurred the two fundamentally different lines (the correct Comintern line and the erroneous CC's Lisan line), obstinately claimed that they had kept to the Comintern line, and denied the existence of the Lisan line. They insisted that the CC's erroneous 11 June Resolution [Doc. C.18] was correct, and under the guidance of the Lisan line they also held an extra election at the Plenum for the CC and the Politburo. In this sense, the Third Plenum openly continued the Lisan line and fought more desperately against the anti-Lisan line movement inside the party. The Third Plenum's reconciliationism further intensified the development of the Lisan line, expanded and extended its evil consequences, and delayed the implementation of the Comintern line for as long as six months. Thus, it caused greater losses to the party and the revolution and was even more dangerous than the Lisan line.

III) Since the Third Plenum, the CC Has Systematically Repeated Many Errors and Continued the Lisan Line in Opposition to That of the Comintern

After the Third Plenum, the Comintern sent a long letter. At that time, throughout the party there was a struggle against the Lisan line and reconciliationism. They tried to suppress the anti-Lisan line movement and sowed dissension and spread rumors among those who actively opposed the Lisan line. Nevertheless, their attempts failed. Under pressure from the broad masses of party members, they had to revise the resolution of the Third Plenum, although the various supplements turned out to be even more shameless. In the decision of 25 November, they claimed that "the Third Plenum in general [has] followed the Comintern line." Meanwhile, they banned discussion of the Lisan line and decided that the Comintern's letter and the supplement of 25 November could only be relayed to the local party branches. In Supplement No. 9 [9 December] they tried to cover up the greater danger of reconciliationism. In Circular No. 96, they pushed reconciliationism and only made a superficial confession that the Lisan line was incorrect and that they would accept the correct Comintern line.¹²⁴ Although Politburo mistakes were admitted, they completely ignored to mention specific measures for fighting against the Lisan line and how to implement the Comintern line, and they omitted the main instructions on various urgent tasks contained in the Comintern letter (such as the establishment of the soviet government, the present political situation, and the party's tasks). At the same time, their analysis of the origins of the Lisan line was far from adequate (considering it merely the remains of putschism), and their estimate of its harm to the party and the revolution was extremely insufficient and unclear. Moreover, they thought that criticism of the Lisan line entailed a rightist deviation in the two-line struggle and would weaken the attack on the major threat inside the party—the rightist tendency. In short, since the Third Plenum the Party Center has persisted in implementing the Lisan line, systematically repeated many errors, and had no real intention of accepting the Comintern line.

IV) The Emergency Session Is a Necessary Step to Implement the Comintern's Line, to Establish the Party's Correct Leadership, and to Guarantee the Victory of the Chinese Revolution Led by the Party

The Lisan line has completely failed, while the reconciliationist line has deepened the crisis inside the party and brought even greater losses to the revolution. This demonstrates that the Party Center is incapable of leading the revolution and lacks loyalty to the proletariat. (The report of the Politburo at the Fourth Plenum openly admitted that the CC was conscious of its opposition to the Comintern.) The CC has completely lost prestige, and its leadership has turned out to be a total failure both politically and organizationally. Ordinary party members do not want revision of the resolution of the Third Plenum, but the total abolition of it as well as of its various supplements. They unanimously support the Comintern representative's demand that the Comintern revoke the Politburo's power immediately and organize those members who oppose the Lisan line and reconciliationism into a provisional central organ to convene an Emergency Session to solve thoroughly all the political and organizational problems of the party.

The Emergency Session is of great political significance and is a request voiced by the broad masses of party members. Its purpose is to change the party's erroneous leadership and to restore the correct line. Below are our suggestions for the Emergency Session:

1. The nonvoting delegates at the Emergency Session must consist mainly of the party cadres and cadres of the mass organizations who strongly oppose the Lisan line.
2. The Emergency Session must unreservedly accept and firmly implement the Comintern line.
3. It must abolish the resolutions and the elections of the Third Plenum.
4. It must analyze appropriately the perniciousness of the Lisan line and reconciliationism and eliminate thoroughly their influence.

5. Under the guidance of the Comintern's July [June] resolution and its recent letter, the session must assess the party's general task, and compile resolutions on the problems of the party's organization, the labor movement, the peasant movement, land reform, and the soviet government. (The correct views on these problems are contained in various documents criticizing the Lisan line. They will soon be sorted out and put forward.)
6. Completely reorganize the Politburo.
7. Set the date for the party's Seventh National Congress. There are some urgent tasks concerning convening the Seventh Congress, including the immediate restoration of democracy inside the party, implementing Bolshevik self-criticism, and issuing anti-(Lisan line resolutions and documents).
8. Enforce iron discipline and punish the leading members of the Party Center who have systematically and resolutely carried out the Lisan line and reconciliationism.

V) Strive for Convening of Emergency Session

The call for the Emergency Session has won great support from the broad masses of party members, particularly from the party's local organizations, as well as our comrades working in trade unions and other mass organizations. They have spontaneously waged a ruthless struggle against the Lisan line and reconciliationism. As far as we know, they include some members of the CC, the party group of the ACFTU, the party group of the All-China Sailors' Union, the party group of the Shanghai Labor Federation, the party group of the Shanghai Anti-Imperialist Alliance, the Delegation of the Soviet Areas, the Soviet Preparatory Committee, the Secretariat of the Wai County Committee of the Jiangnan Provincial Committee; the Party Committee of Tianjin, the Shandong Provincial Committee, the Qingdao Municipal Committee, the party committees of all districts in Shanghai (Zhabei, Pudong, Huxi, Hunan, Huzhong, etc.), most party industrial branches, the central branches, as well as the party cells directly under the Party Center in the areas named above, and activists and cadres in trade unions all over the country (in Qingdao, Shanghai, Tianjin, Wuhan, the Sailors' Union, the Railway Workers' Union, the soviet areas, Xiamen, etc.). Under pressure from the broad masses of the party members, the Party Center realized that it was impossible to maintain its erroneous leadership with a simple high-handed policy. So it has switched to various nonproletarian methods to deceive ordinary party members. It pretends to accept the request for the Emergency Session in order to ease our revolt. For example, the Party Center has informed the ACFTU of the decision to convene the Emergency Session and in a written notice asked the leaders of the party group of the Federation to draft a resolution on the labor movement for the Emergency Session.

In his speech at the Central Working Conference of the party group of the All-China Relief Federation and the Soviet Preparatory Committee, [Xiang] Zhongfa reported that they had officially decided to convene the Emergency Session. (He also promised that members who had followed the Lisan line and reconciliationism among the participants would amount to no more than one quarter.) When [Qu] Qiubai and [Zhou] Enlai delivered reports in the Zhabei and Huzhong districts, both indicated that they were willing to obey the district committees' decisions to call an Emergency Session. The Comintern's representative told the leaders of the ACFTU time and again that the resolution of the party group of the Federation was correct and that he would guarantee that it was implemented politically and organizationally. At the same time, however, the Party Center was secretly preparing the Fourth Plenum. This demonstrates that the Party Center acts in the same way as GMD bureaucrats and scabs of the yellow trade unions. On the other hand, this also shows the urgency and necessity of the Emergency Session.

VI) The Lisanists and Capitulationists Are Sabotaging the Emergency Session

The Lisanists are extremely hostile to the Emergency Session because they know it will inevitably bury Lisanism and its domination of the party. In addition, Wang Ming [Chen Shaoyu] and his like, who have made similar ideological mistakes, are also scared, because they have only criticized the Lisan line in words and from a leftist viewpoint. They agreed entirely with the general strategy of the Lisan line (the plan for a nationwide uprising and general strike, etc.) during discussions on the 11 June resolution at the CC's work conference. Their leftism meant that they saw great possibilities for a direct nationwide uprising. They even think that the 11 June resolution underestimated the situation. After the Third Plenum they claimed that "the Third Plenum [is] of great significance" and thought that Lisanism had disappeared except for a few "remnants," and that "disagreement [can] be avoided" as long as the CC admits its mistakes. (Please see Wang Ming's letter of opinion of 13 November.) Thus it is not surprising that they have tried to sabotage the movement for the Emergency Session. They have spread various rumors such as "Lisanism no longer exists," "the theoretical debates over Lisanism must stop," "the Comintern line has been realized in the party," "the CC has already admitted mistakes and thus we do not need to talk any more about reforming the party organization," and "the Emergency Session is a movement sponsored by leftists." These rumors have demonstrated that Lisanists and capitulationists are always trying to sabotage the anti-Lisan line movement in order to maintain their leadership. Moreover, their plans are directed by the Comintern representative Mif. At the meeting with the leaders of the party group of the ACFTU, the party group of the Labor Federation, and the party group of the All-China Sailors' Union, Mif openly adopted a leftist viewpoint to analyze the whole anti-Lisan line movement and ordered these comrades to leave the movement and accept Wang Ming's leadership.

(Naturally, the aforementioned leaders have refused his order and denounced him on the spot.) Under such circumstances, the Lisanists and capitulationists secretly replaced the Emergency Session demanded by the broad masses of party members with the Fourth Plenum that would meet the needs of the old CC and Wang Ming's faction.

VII) The Process of the Fourth Plenum

The Fourth Plenum is fundamentally different from the Emergency Session proposed by the broad masses of party members. First, the participants were all appointed by the Politburo. They were mainly Politburo members, the extra CC members at the Third Plenum working in central party organs such as Luo Mai and He Chang,¹²⁵ and the party secretaries from the various bureaus north and south of the Yangtze River. Comprising the majority of the participants at the Plenum, they were all activists of the Lisan line and reconciliationism. Second, except for the aforementioned members, the Party Center had kept the program of the Fourth Plenum secret from the rest of the participants—those CC members and party cadres who firmly opposed the Lisan line and reconciliationism. Since the Party Center had not informed them of the purpose and procedure of the Plenum beforehand, it brought about indignant and serious criticism from them. They pointed out that they would adhere to their view on the Emergency Session. Third, the Plenum was short, and discussions were very brief: the whole Plenum lasted no longer than fifteen hours with each speaker given only fifteen minutes. As a result of the time limitation, some comrades did not even have a chance to speak. This is a typical monopolized conference without any democracy.

VIII) The Fourth Plenum Not Only Failed to Solve the Party's Major Political and Organizational Problems But Also Continued the Leadership of Lisanists

What actually occurred at the Fourth Plenum? First, the Politburo rejected our proposals to discuss the party's general work and other major tasks under the principle of eliminating the Lisan line and implementing the Comintern line. The reconciliationist Politburo thought that these urgent and important items were insignificant and unnecessary. Second, the supplementary resolution of 25 November obviously adopted the reconciliationist view as it claimed that "the Third Plenum [has] generally accepted the Comintern line," but the Fourth Plenum, instead of pointing out the truth clearly, argued that "the resolution of 25 November has moved closer to the Comintern line." (The Emergency Session Announcement had declared the resolutions of the Third Plenum and 25 November invalid. Yet the Fourth Plenum was not willing even to go that far.) Third, in Circular No. 96, the Party Center abandoned its responsibility of leadership. Having ignored the party's urgent practical tasks, it only passively admitted the mistakes. In analyzing the origins of Lisanism it also made serious errors. It failed to point out that the struggle against the Lisan line was in essence a two-line struggle; nor did it make an evaluation of the nature of the Lisan line and reconciliationism. (Please refer to the 1 January resolution of the party group of the ACFTU on the Emergency Announcement.) These errors all originated from reconciliationism. Nevertheless, the Fourth Plenum insisted that Circular No. 96 was absolutely consistent with the Comintern line and was correct. Fourth, because of the aforementioned factors, the Fourth Plenum was in reality in favor of reconciliationism and the organizational line of the Third Plenum. Though it indicated in its resolution the intention to nullify the extra election of the Third Plenum, it approved, except for He Chang and Luo Mai, most of the Lisanists and reconciliationists who were chosen. Moreover, it openly supported the activists of the Lisan line and reconciliationism at the Fourth Plenum and saw the CC—the party’s supreme leading body—as a place to educate people who had made mistakes and to test those who had been opportunists ever since Chen Duxiu’s time. As a result, Zhou Enlai, Xiang Zhongfa, Xiang Ying, and Ren Bishi were able to continue their leadership of the Politburo. Li Lisan and Qu Qiubai managed to remain in the CC, and Wang Ming, who was not only inexperienced but also had made Lisan-type mistakes, was elected to the Politburo and took charge of important tasks. Fifth, the Plenum was clearly divided into two camps: on the one side were the Politburo and its subordinate leading organs controlled by the reconciliationists, while on the other side were some CC members who had firmly opposed the Lisan line and the lower-level cadres, especially the worker-cadres. (There was almost no exception.) The Party Center had deliberately selected the participants in order to create a majority. In fact, it abolished democracy at the Plenum, monopolized the elections, and charged opponents with various accusations such as being “anti-Comintern,” “right deviationists,” “liquidationists,” “secret agents,” and having the “tendency of sectarianism” and “unprincipled factional strife.”

IX) Fighting Against the Fourth Plenum and Demanding the Convening of the Emergency Session Under the Correct Leadership of the Comintern

Politically, the Fourth Plenum resulted in a continuation of reconciliationism. We think that Mif, rather than the Comintern, should be blamed for this result. He has twisted the Comintern line and deliberately supported certain factions, thus introducing factional strife in the party. Moreover, organizationally the Fourth Plenum carried through even more aggressively the consistent line of Lisanism (the patriarchal system and commandism). On the surface, they have added a few workers to the party’s leading organ, but in essence the leadership is still in the hands of petty bourgeois intellectuals such as Zhou Enlai and Wang Ming. The Fourth Plenum has thus continued the development of the Lisan line and reconciliationism (for instance, Circular No. 97 is full of the spirit of the Lisan line and reconciliationism) and is even more ignominious than the Third Plenum. It has blocked implementation of the correct Comintern line and the progress of the anti-Lisan line movement. Therefore, we should, under the correct leadership of the Comintern line, abolish all its resolutions and suggest that the Comintern immediately recall Mif, who bears the major responsibility for all the mistakes of the Fourth Plenum. We call on all party members to strive for the convening of the Emergency Session, and we ask the Comintern to replace Mif with a good representative to lead those CC members who firmly oppose the Lisan line and reconciliationism to form a provisional CC and to preside over the Emergency Session to resolve the party's pressing political and organizational problems. Only under the leadership of a new CC elected by the Emergency Session can the party's Seventh National Congress be held and be guaranteed of success. We strongly oppose the leadership of the reconciliationist CC produced by the Fourth Plenum and a Seventh National Congress convened and monopolized by it.

X) Support the Comintern and Call for the Replacement of Mif, Who Bears the Major Responsibility for the Mistakes of the Fourth Plenum

At present, the Lisanists and capitulationists such as Wang Ming and his small group are continually rumormongering and mudslinging. They have tried to threaten and deceive those comrades who are fighting actively against the Lisan line and the Fourth Plenum. Their major argument is that "the Fourth Plenum was directed by the Comintern and thus to oppose the Fourth Plenum is to oppose the Comintern." This is exactly the same tactic that Li Lisan and his followers used at the Third Plenum to attack the comrades who then opposed them. We can recall at that time that the Comintern's representative made mistakes in directing the Third Plenum. He considered it wrong to "think of the Lisan line as conflicting with the Comintern line," and he said that "the present guiding line of the party [is] the same as that of the Comintern, and there [have] never been two lines." (The quotations are from the letter to the Third Plenum by the representative of the Comintern's Far East Bureau.) We fought then against such incorrect ideas, and it has been proved that our struggle is in support of the Comintern line. This time at the Fourth Plenum, Mif, adhering to his stand of Bukharin right reconciliationism, which he adopted at the Sixth National Congress because of his personal factional prejudices, entirely ignored the opinions of the broad masses of party members and repeated his serious mistakes. Undoubtedly, what he did ran counter to the principles of the Comintern. In this sense, only by demanding firmly that the Comintern dismiss him from office and correct his mistakes can we thoroughly eradicate the obstacles to eliminating the Lisan line and implementing the Comintern line.

XI) YL Members All Over the Country Must Rise Up to Fight Against the Fourth Plenum and for the Convening of the Emergency Session

Lisanism liquidated the YL organizations and is a big obstacle for the development of the youth movement. However, Lisanism still has great influence in the YL, and as a result the CC of the YL has obediently followed the Party Center and has made many mistakes. Therefore, in the present movement against the Fourth Plenum and for the Emergency Session, party members should guide the YL members and help them, under the correct leadership of the Youth International, to hold the Emergency Session and wage a ruthless struggle against Lisanism and the eclecticism of the CC of the YL so as to solve the political and organizational problems in the YL.

XII) Fighting Against Any Incorrect Tendencies in the Anti-Lisan Line Struggle

While firmly struggling against the Lisan line and capitulationism on the ideological and organizational fronts and in our practical work, we should always adhere to Bolshevik-Marxism-Leninism, and we should firmly and correctly wage a two-line struggle against any incorrect tendencies, particularly the rightist tendency—the most serious danger in the party. We must be on the alert against any conspiracies of Trotskyite–Chen Duxiu liquidationists to worm their way into the party. We must guard against factional strife caused by Li Lisan and Wang Ming. We must always use criticism and self-criticism correctly and thoroughly to examine all the mistakes the party has made in ideology, work methods, and other aspects during the long domination of the Lisan line. In addition, we must work hard to fight against Lisanism and reconciliationism in our practical work so as to accomplish the urgent tasks given by the Comintern.

C.23 Letter from the CC to Comrades Runzhi and Yujie and the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Region Special Committee—On the Current International and Domestic Situation and the Party's Strategy (7 February 1929)¹²⁶

Comrades Runzhi and Yujie¹²⁷ and the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Region Special Committee:

The new CC elected by the party's Sixth Congress [July–September 1928] has returned home and has taken charge of the work during the last half a year. During this period we have sent several letters to you via couriers but have never received any replies. We are extremely anxious! Two months ago the West Jiangxi Special Committee sent us a note which said that they had lost a report from you to the CC as well as the letter from the CC to you via them. It is very likely that someone in their committee has stolen the two messages and given them to the enemy. They are now investigating the case carefully. However, we are afraid that it has already damaged your work, since the information contained in the two messages would certainly help the enemy arrange attacks on you.

[[Our task on the international front at this stage is to oppose the coming world war as well as the attempt to divide China and defend the Chinese revolution. The conflicts among the various imperialist countries have become increasingly intensified. The confrontation between Britain and the United States will be the focus of the future world war. The turmoil in China indicates that the bourgeois regime will collapse soon. Party work in the cities has been weakened further, and we only have a real presence in Shanghai and Hong Kong. In the countryside in the south, party organizations have developed somewhat but they are very volatile. The party's proletarian base is weakened and its cadres destroyed by the white terror. Our weakness prevents us from taking advantage of even favorable circumstances to bring about a revolutionary high tide. The current stage of the revolution is bourgeois democratic with the ultimate goal of overthrowing the rule of the landlords and the bourgeoisie. It is certain that the Chinese revolution will advance eventually to the socialist stage.]

The Sixth Congress decided that our party's central task at present is to win the support of the people. The party's major task at present is to establish and develop bases among the proletariat, mainly to establish branches among the industrial workers and to mobilize the masses. This does not mean that we will not expand the rural revolution or direct spontaneous peasant uprisings or ignore guerrilla warfare. Indeed these should be adjusted to fit with the central work of the party.]]

In view of this background, the armed forces under your direction should also reconsider their present task and act in accordance with the political situation throughout the country as a whole and with the party's task. In line with the decision of the Sixth Congress, the CC has said for a long time that you must make plans gradually to divide the Red Army troops into small detachments and scatter them over the countryside of the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area to carry out the rural revolution. The CC asks you to follow this instruction because the current political situation in China demands us to wage an extensive struggle in the countryside. This strategy can also help you divert the enemy's attention, solve the supply problem, and prepare for protracted warfare. However, either you did not receive this instruction or you are not willing to follow it. In your current operations, you have continued to adopt the tactics of concentrating forces. Of course, being surrounded by the enemy, you certainly have to amass the troops. However, the CC holds that you must clearly understand the current political situation and the party's tasks and firmly carry out the plan to disperse the forces in an orderly way. At the same time, you must also realize that the CC by no means orders you to take the pessimistic attitude to send Red Army soldiers back home. What we ask you to do is to scatter our armed forces into villages when the time and conditions are favorable; that is, when there is no serious threat of the enemy's attack. The dispersion of forces should be conducted in accordance with the enemy's military deployment, the fighting capability of our troops, and the local conditions. Depending on circumstances, a detachment can be composed of several dozen or several hundred people. But it should be no larger than 500 people (of course, this is not a fixed figure).

These scattered detachments must link up with one another and operate in close cooperation. They should mix as much as possible with the local peasants, mobilize the daily struggle of the masses, and wage a widespread rural revolution. Now, you must follow this instruction regardless of whether your army remains in the Sannan area of south Jiangxi or has already retreated into east Hunan. Otherwise, moving from one place to another, your army will gradually become isolated from the daily struggle of the broad masses and become estranged from the peasants. When the revolutionary high tide comes, the more concentrated the Red Army armed forces are, the greater contribution they can make to the revolution. However, at this moment the situation is entirely different. What we need to do now is to plan carefully to make sure that our army can survive the enemy's attack. Although sometimes we must concentrate the forces on the battlefield, we must never mass our troops to provide the enemy with a large target. Circumscribed by the environment, the Red Army in the Haifeng-Lufeng area and at Qiongya at Hainan Island tended to stay together. As a result, they were easily routed by the enemy and large numbers were decimated. The armed forces under the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Region Special Committee must bear this lesson in mind. Once defeated by the enemy, you should immediately disperse the forces and scatter them into the villages so as to preserve their strength. If you plan to retreat to the Fujian-Guangdong Border Area, you must give the matter further thought. Since most of the soldiers in your army are from Hunan and Jiangxi, it would be difficult for them to mix with the peasants in Fujian and Guangdong. Thus, it might be necessary to concentrate the forces there. However, you should still make every effort to adopt guerrilla warfare tactics and to mobilize the peasants, and you must never follow the ways of the army of the Taiping Rebellion. During the last half a year, the peasant struggle in south Fujian has developed quite rapidly, particularly the insurrection in Yongding. It lasted six months. Although it has now failed, its forces have not been wiped out. In addition, the struggle is not only limited to Yongding but has spread over a large area. There are party organizations in many counties there. If indeed you move to south Fujian, you ought to make a special effort to help the development and expansion of the peasant struggle.

Under current conditions, we have decided to transfer Comrade Zhu De and Comrade Mao Zedong to the CC. The two comrades might feel reluctant to leave the army since they have worked in it for over a year. However, taking into consideration both the needs of the situation and the demands of our work, the CC believes that it is necessary for them to leave the army now. Zhu and Mao's departure will not cause the army any losses and will help it implement the plan to disperse its forces. If Zhu and Mao stay with the army, their activities will draw the enemy's attention, thus making it more difficult for us to disperse the troops. When Zhu and Mao come to the CC, they can introduce to our comrades all over the country their precious experience in leading a 10,000-strong armed force in dealing with the enemy for more than a year. This will make a greater contribution to the whole revolutionary cause. Therefore, as soon as Comrades Zhu and Mao receive the CC decision, they should leave the army and come to the CC immediately. They must not neglect more important and difficult duties because of an emotional attachment to the soldiers in the army.

In regard to the method of dispersing the forces and the arranging for Zhu and Mao to leave the army, the Central Military Committee will send you a detailed plan. Of course, you should carry out the plan flexibly rather than implement it mechanically.

The Hunan-Jiangxi Border Region Special Committee can continue to exist for a time. You may make decisions on how to reorganize it.

(This letter is sent to you via the party committees in Hunan, Jiangxi, and Guangdong.)

C.24 Letter from the Front Committee to the Party Center (5 April 1929)¹²⁸

The Party Center:

The Fujian Provincial Committee passed on your letter of 7 February [Doc. C.23] to us at Ruijin on 3 April. We are afraid that your estimate in the letter of both the situation and our strength is rather pessimistic. The campaign of the three offensives launched by the nationalist troops on the Jinggang Mountains represented the climax of the reactionary forces, but it was also a turning point. The reactionary forces are at a low ebb, while the revolutionary tide has gradually risen. Although the fighting power and the organizational capacity of our party are as weak as you have pointed out, they will surely grow strong again, and the pessimistic atmosphere inside the party will soon disappear because the reactionaries will be at a low ebb. The broad masses support us unreservedly. The enemy's policy of harsh suppression and massacre is just like driving fish into deep water, and the promise of reformism can no longer win support from the masses. The people's illusions about the GMD are bound to vanish before too long.

In the future none of the political parties in China will be able to compete with us Communists for the support of the people. The political and the organizational lines decided by our party's Sixth Congress [1928] are correct. The revolution at the present stage is not a socialist one but a democratic one, and the party's task at present is not to prepare for a general uprising but to win the support of the people. We should, however, adopt a positive attitude toward the propaganda and preparation for an armed uprising because the revolution will develop very quickly. Under the present conditions of great turmoil, only by adopting a positive attitude and by issuing enthusiastic slogans can we lead the people. Such a policy is also necessary for the party to regain its fighting power.

Although our party used to be dominated by the erroneous strategy of putschism, we think that now liquidationism has become the major danger inside the party. On our way through west Fujian and south Jiangxi, we found that the fighting will of the local party organizations there was so weak that many good opportunities have been easily lost. Many people there have a revolutionary spirit, but the party organizations are not willing to lead them. The situation in west Fujian and south Jiangxi suggests that this may not be an isolated phenomenon. Therefore, while it is necessary to fight against the erroneous tendency of putschism and commandism, we must also strive to oppose liquidationism and passivism.

Proletarian leadership is the only guarantee of victory of the revolution. At present, the party's vital organizational task is to form a proletarian basis within the party and found industrial branches in cities. Nevertheless, the development of our struggle in the countryside, the establishment of revolutionary regimes in rural areas, and the creation and strengthening of the Red Army are also important. They are of great significance in promoting our struggle in the cities and in paving the way for the revolutionary climax. While it is wrong to abandon the struggle in the cities, it would be incorrect for some party members to fear that the growth of peasant strength might surpass that of the workers and that such a development would not be good for the progress of the revolutionary cause. In a semicolonial country such as China, the peasant struggle will fail without the workers' leadership, but it will never harm the revolutionary cause if the struggle grows more powerful than that of the workers. Our party's Sixth Congress has pointed out the mistake of neglecting the peasant struggle, and the Party Center has mentioned again in its letter the necessity to "wage a massive and universal struggle in the countryside." We think this is a correct attitude.

The Party Center says that to preserve the Red Army and mobilize the masses we should break up our troops into very small units, disperse them throughout the countryside, stay away from any big targets, and that Zhu [De] and Mao [Zedong] should leave the army. This is not a practical idea. Since the winter of 1927 we have not only planned but also tried many times the tactic of dispersing troops throughout the countryside, operating separately on the basis of a company or a battalion, using the tactics of guerrilla warfare to mobilize the masses, and staying away from big targets. Unfortunately, all those tactics failed. They failed because first, unlike the militia forces, the majority of the main force of the Red Army is not made up of local people but of members of the former National Revolutionary Army; the peasant troops from Liu, Ping, and south Hunan; and previous prisoners of war. There are hardly any peasants from the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area in the Red Army because peasants there are not willing to join the Red Army but only the militia forces of their own counties. Second, once the troops are dispersed, the leading organ is also broken up. Hence it is difficult for us to handle the dangerous environment and it is easy to fail. Third, it will allow the enemy to defeat us separately. (The Fifth Army in Ping and Liu and the Fourth Army in the border area and in south Hunan were defeated five times by the enemy because they divided their forces.) Fourth, the more adverse the circumstances are, the more concentrated the troops should be and the more firmly the leaders must act. Only in this way can we maintain morale and deal with the enemy. In fact, the tactics to disperse the troops for guerrilla warfare can only be used when there are favorable circumstances which enable the leaders to leave the troops.

During the recent move from the Jinggang Mountains to south Jiangxi and west Fujian, thanks to the concentration of forces and the determination of the leading organ (the Front Committee) and the commanders (Zhu and Mao), the enemy could not harm us. Their losses were heavier than their gains, whereas our victories outnumbered our defeats. The two battles we won at Ningdu and Dingzhou completely wiped out the local enemy's two brigades of Guo and Liu and paved the way for the successful mobilization of the masses in south Jiangxi and west Fujian. Such an achievement cannot be realized without the concentration of forces and direction by an integrated leading organ. The tactics we learned from the past three-year struggle are indeed very different from those of ancient or modern times, Chinese or foreign. By applying our tactics, the people's strength increases daily. No enemy, no matter how powerful, can defeat us. In general, our tactics are those of guerrilla warfare: "To disperse the troops in order to mobilize the masses, and to concentrate the forces to deal with the enemy." "The enemy advances, we retreat; the enemy camps, we harass; the enemy tires, we attack; the enemy retreats, we pursue." "To build up stable base areas, use the strategy of advancing in waves; when pursued by a powerful enemy, employ the policy of circling around." "Use a very good method to mobilize a large number of people within a short period of time." Such tactics are like casting a fishing net. At any moment we can cast it or draw it in. We cast it to mobilize the masses and we draw it in to deal with the enemy troops. This is the very strategy we practiced during the past three years. In the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area each time after we defeated the enemy by concentrating forces, we dispersed the troops to mobilize the masses for a period of two or three weeks (breaking up the whole army first into a few large sections and then into several small groups). When the enemy started another offensive, we assembled the troops to deal with it. Afterward we scattered them again. This time when we were pursued by the enemy we circled around and passed many places. In this way, we mobilized a large number of local people. When we stopped at a place, we stayed there from as long as five days to as briefly as half a day. We usually began the propaganda work first. (The two work-teams of the political department—one for written propaganda and the other for oral propaganda—were divided into three-person groups and assigned to the companies. With two groups in each company, they carried out propaganda work both along the route of the march and at the places we stopped.) Then we distributed to the peasants the property of the big landlords and reactionaries, such as grain, clothes, and farm tools. After that, we set up various organizations such as the party branches, secret trade unions, and secret peasant associations. Our skills in mass work have been greatly improved. The present Red Army is more than a purely fighting force. Its major function is to mobilize the masses, while fighting is only a means to serve that end. In fact, in the Red Army today the ratio between fighting and mass work is one to ten. It is different from that of the Ye [Ting]-He[Long] army, which was merely a fighting force and could not survive in today's conditions. Regardless of the conditions, there must be a unified party and military organ in the Red Army. Otherwise, anarchy will emerge and the army is bound to collapse.

The leading organ of the party in the Red Army at present is the Front Committee, with Mao Zedong as the secretary, and the leading organ for military affairs is the headquarters, with Zhu De as the army commander. If the Party Center wants to transfer Zhu and Mao to other posts, please replace them with competent cadres. In our opinion, Comrade Liu Bochong can take charge of military affairs, and Comrade Yun Daiying the party and political work. These two, if they are able to come, will definitely be able to do better work than we. The Party Center wrote last June to inform us that Comrade He Long would come for an inspection. We do not know why he did not come. Now, as it is very easy to reach us from Fujian, we hope that in the future the Party Center can frequently send people here for inspection.

There are almost no enemy forces in west Fujian and south Jiangxi after our rout of the two brigades of Liu and Guo. A major conflict will break out at any moment as Chiang [Kai-shek's] army and troops of the Guangxi warlords are heading for a confrontation in the Jiujiang area. Since the strength of the masses has gradually recovered and the conflicts among the reactionary forces have become more intense, the climax of the revolutionary struggle will soon occur. We should take this into account when we arrange our work in the southern provinces. In our view, the forces of the landlord and compradore bourgeoisie in the two provinces of Guangdong and Hunan are very powerful. In addition, as a result of the erroneous policy of putschism, both the party and the property organizations in Hunan have been almost completely wiped out. The situation in the three provinces of Fujian, Zhejiang, and Jiangxi, however, is quite different. First, the enemy forces in these three provinces are the weakest in the south. Zhejiang has only a few provincial troops under the direction of Jiang Bochen. The five enemy units in Fujian total up to fourteen regiments, but one of them, Guo's brigade, has been routed, and the other two, Chen's and Lu's troops, are bandits with little combat effectiveness. Neither of the two brigades of marines stationed along the coast is good at fighting because they have no battle experience. Though Zhang Zhen's troops are more experienced, according to the analysis of the Fujian Provincial Committee, only two of his regiments have any combat effectiveness. Besides, the situation in Fujian now is totally chaotic; things are badly disorganized. Enemy forces in Jiangxi comprise sixteen regiments under the direction of Zhu Peide and Xiong Shihui; they are relatively more powerful than those in Fujian and Zhejiang but still much weaker than those in Hunan. We have encountered them on the battlefield and defeated them all except Li Wenbin's brigade. Second, the party organizations in these three provinces have made fewer errors of putschism. We are not familiar with the situation in Zhejiang, but we have found that both the party organizations and those of the peasants in Jiangxi and Fujian are in better condition than they are in Hunan. Let us take Jiangxi as an example. The party organizations are quite consolidated in De'an, Xiushui, and Tonggu of north Jiangxi. The party and militia forces are still influential in Ninggan, Yongxin, Lianhua, and Zuichuan of west Jiangxi. Conditions are even better in south Jiangxi, and the second and fourth regiments of the Red Army stationed in the counties of Ji'an, Yongxin, and Xinggu are developing fast. In east Jiangxi, the Red Army under Fang Zhimin's direction has managed to survive. In this way, our forces in Jiangxi have formed a position surrounding Nanchang. We suggest to the Party Center that we should take advantage of the prolonged war between Chiang and the Guangxi warlords, in order to try to seize Jiangxi from them and make progress in west Fujian and west Zhejiang as well. We must recruit more troops and develop the Red Army in the three provinces and establish political power with the support of the people. These tasks are to be finished within one year.

We must also lay down a solid foundation for the proletarian struggle in Shanghai, Wuxi, Ningbo, Hangzhou, Fuzhou, and Xiamen so as to guide the peasant struggle in the three provinces of Jiangxi, Zhejiang, and Fujian. The Jiangxi Provincial Committee ought to be expanded and trade unions established in Nanchang, Jiujiang, and Ji'an as well as on the Nanchang-Jiujiang Railway.

We did not know about the rupture between Chiang and the Guangxi warlords, and we had no advance information about the large-scale fighting between them until we reached Dingzhou on 14 March and defeated Guo's brigade (Guo Fengming was killed in the battle). As for present work, we decided, at the outset of the war among the nationalist warlords, to use the tactics of guerrilla warfare to mobilize the masses, deepen the rural revolution, build up the revolutionary base with the support of the people, and establish a worker-peasant regime in a large area of over twenty counties in west Fujian and south Jiangxi. We plan to link this area with our base in the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area to create a powerful stronghold for future development. Accordingly, we went to neither Hangyong nor Longyan but stayed at Dingzhou for seventeen days to mobilize the peasants. After that, we came to Ruijin on 1 April and will move to Yudu on 8 April. When we get to Yudu, we will hold an enlarged meeting to discuss operational plans with the South Jiangsu Special Committee and Comrade Luo Shouan, sent by the Military Affairs Department of the Party Center. The peasants of west Fujian and south Jiangxi have been very cooperative. In our work at the county towns of Changding, Xinqiao, and Hetian, the peasants turned out in the thousands whenever we called on them to seize grain from the landlords. We organized twenty secret peasant associations, five secret trade unions, and even a general federation of trade unions at Dingzhou. Party organizations were doubled, and a contingent of militia was set up. This contingent has come to Ruijin with us because it is difficult for a single unit to survive there. Political power was established first through the provisional revolutionary committee, and its members were appointed by our political department. After a few peasant associations and trade unions were organized, a conference was convened at which a formal revolutionary committee was elected. Both the provisional and the formal revolutionary committees proclaimed political programs. On arrival at Ruijin, we drew up a four-day work plan. While stationing the headquarters in the county seat, we divided our troops into four parts and assigned them to the county seats of Rentian City, Xijiang, and Jiubao. Then we again broke them up into small groups in each of the four places to mobilize the masses. While people in Ruijin have given us a spontaneous welcome and have participated bravely in the struggle against landlords, unfortunately, there have been no party organizations in Ruijin or any local cadres to guide the masses or make preparations for the struggle. That is why we have not achieved much progress in Ruijin, particularly in the county town. When we get to Yudu, we plan to work for a week in the county town and in the surrounding countryside. After that, depending on the circumstances, we will either move to Ningdu and Guangchang or to Wannan and Taihe to wage guerrilla war for a period of time in south Jiangxi before we finally move to west Fujian. By then we must get ready to fight the remnants of Guo Fengmin's brigade as well as Lu Xinbang's and Chen Guohui's troops. We hope the Fujian Provincial Committee will make some preparations for us.

As far as the situation of our troops is concerned, except for a small part stationed in the border area, the majority of the Fourth Army has moved out, a total of 3,600 people and 1,100 guns. We lost about 600 people and 200 guns at Dayu, Xinfeng, and Xunwu. Most of them had lost contact with us in battle. Only about 100 people and several scores of guns were really captured by the enemy. The terrible stories carried by the newspapers are all rumors invented by the enemy. After the two battles of Ningdu and Dingzhou, our troops have not only fully recovered but also increased in number. At present the Fourth Army has three brigades—the First, the Second, and the Third. Each brigade has two battalions, and each battalion has three companies. There are about 1,200 people and 500 guns in each brigade. When we engage in guerrilla war, we disperse the troops by brigades, and then again divide them into small teams. This is very convenient both for dispersion and assembly. When it arrived at the Jinggang Mountains, Comrade Peng Dehuai's Fifth Army had about 800 people and about 500 guns. Six hundred people and 400 guns have come to Ruijin with us this time and are redesignated as the Fifth Brigade of the Fourth Army under the direction of Comrade Peng Dehuai, who has been appointed deputy army commander. He will return to the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area with the brigade in a few days to gather his old troops, restore our political power there, and establish liaison with our forces in south Jiangxi. They will remain under the leadership of the Front Committee. There are political departments at both army and brigade levels. Each political department has a secretariat, a propaganda section, an organization section (divided into three sections of worker, peasant, and party affairs), and a security section. There are party representatives in battalions and companies. The party representative system at army and brigade levels is to be replaced by that of the director of the political department. The whole army has been issued new uniforms, and every one has received a four-yuan allowance. There are no supply problems, and the soldiers are now all in high spirits. Two forces in Lichuan of east Jiangxi (near Guangchang) want to join us. One has mutinied from Jin Handing's forces and comprises about 500 people and 300 guns. It has been redesignated as the Fourth Brigade with Tian Guiqing as the brigade commander. The other is a bandit force of about 300 people and 200 guns. Having been defeated everywhere, it could find no alternative. We have redesignated it as an independent battalion with Hu Zhushen as commander. These two units will move to Yudu for reorganization and training around 14 April. The Second and the Fourth regiments of the Jiangxi Red Army are stationed in the Xingguo area and have cooperated well with us. Now is the time for us to recover the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area lost in the previous battles. Apart from Wang Zuo's unit with about 200 guns under the direction of the Fourth Army, the militia forces in the six counties of Ning, Yong, Liang, Sui, Ling, and Cha are also equipped with 800 guns. Since the warlords are involved in their own wars and are unable to control the situation, our forces cannot only maintain themselves there but also develop in the outlying areas. Conditions will be even better when Comrade Peng Dehuai's brigade returns there. The party secretary of the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Region Special Committee is Comrade Deng Qianyuan. Since the failed insurrection of last March, the power basis of our party in Hunan has been completely destroyed because of putschism, and the peasant forces have been disarmed and the mass struggle suppressed by the landlords. When the Red Army launched an offensive on Chenzhou in August, we organized three county committees and three peasant militia contingents in Zixing, Ruchen, and Guidong and set up a special committee to lead them. Du Xiuqing was secretary. Recently we have heard that they failed again because of putschism. In the Lining area, after the insurrection of last spring, the party organizations and the peasant forces suffered a total defeat. Afterward, they received seventy guns from the Fourth Army in the summer but were again completely wiped out at Yellow Mud Hill in the You-Li Border Area. This demonstrates that it is extremely difficult for a few small forces to survive.

The party's leading organ in the Red Army is the Front Committee appointed by the Party Center. In the letter of 4 June, the Party Center said:

We think it is necessary to establish a Front Committee as the leading organ at the front. The Committee is to consist of the following five members: Mao, Zhu, a worker, a peasant, and the secretary of the party organization of the area where the Front Committee resides, with Mao Zedong as the secretary. In addition, a labor committee should be set up with the worker member of the Front Committee as its secretary and a military committee with Zhu De as its secretary. Members of the labor committee and the military committee are to be selected by the Front Committee. As regards the scale of jurisdiction of the Front Committee, it depends on the circumstances. However, all activities in the area under its jurisdiction are to be directed by the Front Committee. When the Front Committee is in Jiangxi, it is to be led by the Jiangxi Provincial Committee, and when it is in Hunan, it is to be directed by the Hunan Provincial Committee. On receiving a report from the Front Committee, the provincial committee there should reply immediately and then forward as soon as possible both the report and the reply to the Party Center.

We think the Party Center's instruction on the organization of the Front Committee is correct and suits well the conditions of the struggle. The Red Army operates across the boundaries of any specific area, so it should not be directed by a specific county committee, a special committee, or a provincial committee. Both the Fifth Army in Ping and Liu and the Fourth Army in Hunan and in the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area had suffered many defeats because of the influence of localism. The cross-boundary Red Army must be led directly by the Party Center. Only in this way can it operate successfully in the battlefield environment and avoid the interference of localism.

Since last March, we have sent three reports to the Party Center. One is a long letter written by Mao Zedong at the time of our failure in the border area. This discussed the problems of how to establish the revolutionary base as well as the policies of the Hunan Provincial Committee. The letter was sent to the Party Center by the Hunan Provincial Committee but its draft was lost. The second is a report written by the Front Committee when we received the Party Center's June letter ordering the Red Army to return to the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area. It presented the historical background of our struggle in the border area and the strategy and policies concerning the establishment of the revolutionary base. It was sent to the Party Center via both the Hunan and the Jiangxi Provincial Committees. Now we forward a copy of the report based on the draft we have kept. Since the Party Center has received neither of the two reports, no wonder you feel ill-informed about our activities. The third is a letter of the Front Committee written at Changding on 20 March forwarded by the Fujian Provincial Committee. We are now enclosing a copy to you because we are not sure whether you have received it. For three years, until our arrival at Dingzhou, we did not receive any journals of the Party Center. Here, we have read the third and fourth issues of the Young Pioneer [Shaonian qianfeng], the third issue of the Chinese Worker [Zhongguo gongren], the second issue of the People's Voice [Renyan], published in Beijing, and the second issue of Vanguard [Qianfeng], published by the comrades from Dingzhou living in Shanghai. In the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area, often we could not get hold of any newspapers for two or three months because of the enemy's blockade. Since last September we have managed to buy some newspapers from Ji'an and Changsha, though it was still very difficult. After coming to south Jiangxi and west Fujian, thanks to the convenience of the mail system here, we are able to receive newspapers published in Nanjing, Shanghai, Fuzhou, Xiamen, Zhangzhou, Nanchang, and Ganzhou every day. And at Ruijin, we can read newspapers published by He Jian and the Changsha Republican Daily [Minguo ribao]. Our happiness is beyond description as if we could clear the clouds to see the bright sky. In the future, we hope that the Party Center can write to us once a month; we, too, will report to you every month. Please also try to send us some journals published by the Party Center.

C.25 A Single Spark Can Start a Prairie Fire—
A Letter to Lin Biao. Mao Zedong (5 January 1930)¹²⁹

Comrade Lin Biao,

It is several days after the New Year, and I still have not replied to your letter. One reason is that I have been busy with other things, and the second reason is that I have been wondering what to write to you and what benefit I can bring you. After racking my brains, I could not come up with anything appropriate, and therefore, I put off replying. Now, I have some ideas to talk about. I do not know whether they are applicable to your situation. However, these little matters of mine really concern an important issue in the current struggle. Even though they may not be compatible with our specific situation, they still constitute a generally significant issue. So I wish to put them forward.

What is the issue I want to raise? It is the issue of the evaluation of the current situation and our actions based on it. I thought in the past, and I still think to some extent now, that your evaluation of the situation is relatively pessimistic. Your opinion was most clearly evident at the Ruijin meeting on the evening of 18 May last year. I know that you believe in the inevitable arrival of a revolutionary upsurge, but not in the possibility of a rapid arrival. Therefore, in terms of actions, you do not support the plan of seizing Jiangxi in a year and only support guerrilla warfare in the three connecting provinces of Fujian, Guangdong, and Jiangxi. Since you do not have a deep understanding about establishing red political power in the three regions, you lack ideas about the promotion of a nationwide revolutionary high tide through the consolidation and expansion of such red political power. You seem to believe that the revolutionary high tide is still remote, that it is futile to carry out the hard work of establishing political power. Instead your belief in mobile guerrilla warfare means that you would rather use this method to extend our political influence and to wait for a nationwide uprising until the work of mobilizing the masses is more or less accomplished. You believe that this, combined with the participation of the Red Army, would create a great revolutionary situation throughout the whole country. Your theory of winning the support of the masses throughout the whole country and in all regions before establishing political power is, in my opinion, inappropriate to the Chinese revolution. The source of your theory, according to my observation, is mainly the lack of clear understanding of the fact that China is a semicolonial country for which the imperialists are competing in the first stage of imperialism. If one clearly understands this first, one will understand why the unusual phenomenon of prolonged and tangled warfare within the ruling classes is to be found only in China, why this warfare is steadily growing fiercer and spreading, and why there has never been a unified government. Second, one will realize the important significance of the peasant problem and the current nationwide development of peasant uprisings. Third, one will understand the absolute correctness of the slogan of the government of workers and peasants. Fourth, one will understand another strange phenomenon unique to China that follows from the prolonged and tangled warfare within the ruling classes, namely, the existence and development of the Red Army and the guerrilla forces and the consequent development and expansion of small patches of red political power (soviets) in areas surrounded by the white regime. Fifth, one will understand that the development of the Red Army, guerrilla forces, and the soviet regions is the highest form of peasant struggle in the semicolonial countries and also the inevitable form of peasant struggle in such countries. Sixth, one will be certain that they (the Red Army and the peasant soviet regimes) are the most essential allies in the proletarian struggle in semicolonial countries (the proletariat should move forward to lead them), and that they are important factors in promoting a nationwide revolutionary high tide. Seventh, one will understand that the policy of relying on mobile guerrilla warfare alone cannot accomplish the task of promoting the nationwide high tide. The unquestionably correct policies are those models provided by Zhu [De] and Mao [Zedong], He Long, Li Wenlin, and Fang Zhimin. That is the policy of establishing base areas and systematically setting up political power, and by promoting and expanding this power emphasizing the coordination and organization among the Red Army, the guerrilla forces, and the broad peasant masses, training in the struggle, the pursuance of the rural revolution and the expansion of armed organizations—ranging from county uprising troops, district Red Guards, county Red Guards, local Red Armies, and even transregional Red Armies. This is the only way to build the confidence of the masses toward the nationwide revolution, as the Soviet Union has built it throughout the world. This is the only way to create tremendous difficulties for the ruling class, shake its foundations, and accelerate its internal disintegration. This is the only way to create a genuine Red Army that will become an important tool for the future great revolution. In short, this is the only way to promote the revolutionary high tide.

I want to discuss more about what I feel to be the reason for your relatively pessimistic evaluation of the current situation. I think that your evaluation is the opposite of the revolutionary impetuosity that exists inside the party. Comrades who commit revolutionary impetuosity exaggerate the subjective forces and belittle objective forces. This kind of evaluation, proceeding from the subjectivist point of view, will logically and undoubtedly lead to blind adventurism. You do not make this kind of mistake, but you appear to have another shortcoming, namely, minimizing the subjective forces and magnifying objective forces. This inappropriate evaluation will inevitably produce other adverse consequences. Although you acknowledge the weakness of the subjective forces and the strength of the objective forces, you do not appear to realize the following important points:

- 1) The subjective forces of the Chinese revolution may be weak, but all ruling-class organizations (governments, armed forces, political party organizations, etc.) are based on the feeble social and economic organizations of China and are also weak. This helps to explain why revolution cannot break out at once in the countries of Western Europe, where, although the subjective forces of revolution are much stronger than in China, they cannot initiate a revolution soon, because the forces of their ruling classes are much stronger than those of the Chinese ruling class. Although the subjective forces in the Chinese revolution are weak, the objective forces are also weak, and thus the speed at which the Chinese revolution moves toward a revolutionary high tide will definitely be greater than that in Western Europe.

2) The subjective forces of the revolution have been greatly diminished since the defeat of the Great Revolution [1927]. The remaining forces, judged by their form, will naturally cause comrades to have pessimistic ideas. However, if judged in terms of their substance, they are very different. Here, we can use an old Chinese saying: “A single spark can start a prairie fire.” This means that although our forces are very small at present, they will develop rapidly. In China’s current situation, not only can they develop but this is inevitable, as the May 30 Movement and the subsequent Great Revolution have shown. When we look at a thing, we must examine its essence and treat its form merely as an introductory guide. As soon as we have passed the introduction, we should grasp its essence and put aside the form that serves as the introduction. This is the only scientific, reliable, and revolutionary method of analysis.

3) The same applies to the evaluation of objective forces. We must never look at their form only, but should see their essence. In the initial period of our independent rule in the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area, a few comrades influenced by the Hunan Provincial Committee’s inaccurate evaluation genuinely believed in the committee’s phrases “extremely shaky” and “panic-stricken.” These phrases, which are standing jokes, were used by the Hunan Provincial Committee to describe the ruler of Hunan, Lu Diping [GMD governor] (in May to June 1928). This evaluation certainly produced putschism in the political sphere. But during the four months between December [1928] and February [1929] (before the war between Chiang Kai-shek and the Guangxi warlords [March–April 1929]) when the largest, third suppression expedition was about to reach the Jinggang Mountains, some comrades again asked, “How long can we keep the red flag flying?” In fact, at that time, the struggle in China among Britain, the United States, and Japan became quite open and was entangled in the fighting between Chiang Kai-shek, the Guangxi warlords, and Feng Yuxiang. In essence, it was a time when the reactionary tide was beginning to ebb and the revolutionary tide was starting to rise again. At that time, however, not only did the Red Army and the local party organizations have a pessimistic mentality, but even the Party Center was confused by the superficial objective circumstances and held pessimistic opinions. The Center’s letter of 7 February is proof of the pessimistic analysis inside the party at that time [Doc. C.23].

4) The present objective situation can still easily confuse those comrades who only observe the form but not the essence. This is especially true for those of us who work in the Red Army. When we meet defeat, are encircled or pursued by strong enemies, we often unconsciously generalize and maximize these temporary, specific, and small conditions, as if the situation throughout China and the whole world was pessimistic and the future of a revolutionary victory very remote. The reason for disregarding the essence lies with the failure to make a scientific observation. To answer the question whether the high tide of the Chinese revolution is imminent, one has to make a detailed observation as to whether the contradictions leading to a revolutionary high tide have developed further. If we observe accurately that the contradictions are intensifying among the international imperialists, between imperialism and the colonies, and between the imperialists and the proletariat, we can understand the greater urgency for the imperialists to contend for the domination of China. This greater urgency gives rise to the simultaneous development of the contradictions between the imperialists and the whole Chinese nation and the contradictions among the imperialists themselves in China, thus leading to the daily expansion and intensification of conflict within the Chinese ruling class—the contradictions within the Chinese ruling class have further developed. In the wake of the intensification of the contradictions among the rulers—the tangled warfare among the warlords—come heavier taxation and levies, which steadily sharpen the contradiction between the broad masses of taxpayers and the ruling class. The contradiction between the imperialists and the Chinese capitalists and the latter's failure to obtain concessions immediately sharpens the contradictions between the Chinese bourgeoisie and the Chinese working class. The Chinese bourgeoisie has to step up the exploitation of the working class. In the wake of imperialist commercial aggression and the growing burden of taxes and levies that adversely affect the interests of the landlord class come more acute contradictions between the landlord class and the peasants. Exploitation through rent and usury has increased. Because of the pressure from foreign goods, the exhaustion of the purchasing power of the worker and peasant masses, and the increase in government taxes and levies, more and more merchants of domestically made goods and independent small producers have gone bankrupt. The troops suffer from shortages of food yet the wars are indefinitely prolonged, causing further misery from hunger, cold, exhaustion, injury, and death. Because of the increase in government taxes and levies, the rise in rent and interests demanded by landlords, and the daily spread of the disasters of war, there are natural calamities and banditry everywhere, and the peasant masses and the urban poor have no way to earn a living. With no money for schooling, the students face the danger of losing the opportunity to study. The backward production system provides no prospect of employment for graduates. Once we understand the above contradictions, it is easy to realize that China is in such a state of constant trouble and anarchy that the anti-imperialist, anti-warlord, and antilandlord revolutionary high tide is inevitable and will come very soon. China is littered with dry firewood that can quickly turn into a raging fire. The phrase "A single spark can start a prairie fire" is an apt description of the current situation. One only needs to look at the workers' strikes, peasants' uprisings, soldiers' mutinies, shopkeepers' strikes, and students' strikes to know that it cannot be long before a "spark" starts "a prairie fire."

The gist of the above statement was already expressed in the Front Committee's letter to the Party Center on 5 April last year. [For the contents of the letter see Doc. C.24.]

[[Here is included the section criticizing the Party Center's evaluation of 9 February 1929 as being too pessimistic; also the operational tactics of the Red Army are repeated.]]

The weakness of this paragraph is that all the reasons listed for the concentration of troops are negative. This is very insufficient. The positive reason for the concentration of troops should be that concentrated forces can defeat larger enemy forces and occupy towns. Only by defeating larger enemy forces and occupying towns can we mobilize the masses on a large scale, set up political power extending over several counties, spread our tentacles far and wide (the so-called extending our political influence), and play some effective role in speeding up the revolutionary high tide. Both the regime set up by us in the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area the year before last and that in west Fujian last year were the result of concentrating troops. This is a general principle. Is there a time when we should divide our troops? Yes, there is. The letter from the Front Committee to the Party Center mentioned the Red Army's guerrilla tactics, including the division of troops within a short radius:

[[This section from the 5 April letter outlines the tactics learned from the three years of struggle, concluding with the observation that they are like "casting a fishing net."]]

Here to "cast the net wide" means to divide our troops within a short radius. For example, when we first took Yongxin in the Hunan-Jiangxi Border Area, we divided the troops of the Twenty-ninth Regiment and the Thirty-first Regiment inside the Yongxin area. When we took Yongxin for the third time, the Twenty-eighth Regiment moved toward the border of Anfu, the Twenty-ninth Regiment toward Lianhua, and the Thirty-first Regiment toward the border of Ji'an, thus making separate maneuvers. Again, the separate operations in various counties of south Jiangxi from April to May last year and in various counties of west Fujian last July are all appropriate examples. As to dividing our forces over a wide radius, it is possible only on the two conditions that the environment is comparatively favorable and that the leading organs are relatively sound, because the purpose of dividing troops is to do a better job in winning mass support, furthering the rural revolution, establishing political power and enlarging the Red Army and local armed forces. If these purposes cannot be attained, and the dispersal of troops can even result in defeat, thus weakening the strength of the Red Army, as happened in the separate operations of the attack on Chenzhou on the border of Hunan and Jiangxi in August last year, then it is better not to divide the troops. If the above two conditions can be met, then it is undoubtedly necessary to divide our troops as this will be more advantageous than concentrating them. I oppose, in principle, the division of troops for the purpose of preserving effective forces and avoiding concentration so as not to give the enemy a target. This has been explained in the aforementioned letter of the Front Committee to the Party Center. Moreover, will there be occasions when we have to divide our troops because the economic situation does not permit concentration? Probably there will be. But I cannot reach a positive conclusion on this point because we still do not have concrete experiences of such conditions.

The spirit of the Party Center's February letter was not good. The letter had a bad effect on a few party comrades in the Fourth Army. You also seem to be influenced. At that time the Party Center issued a notice, stating that war would not necessarily break out between Chiang Kai-shek and the Guangxi warlords. Since then, however, the Party Center's evaluations and instructions, in general, have been correct. The Party Center has already issued another circular to correct the one with the wrong appraisal (in fact, only part of the circular). Although there was no formal correction of the letter to the Red Army, the subsequent instructions were completely free of the pessimistic spirit, and the proposals for the Red Army's operations were also completely in line with those of the Front Committee. However, the bad effect of the Party Center's letter on some comrades still exists. Despite the fact that the reply by the Front Committee and the Party Center's letter were published inside the party at the same time, the former does not appear to have had a great effect on these comrades. The reason is that the Party Center's letter coincides with the preferences of these comrades, while many later correct instructions by the Party Center on the situation were ignored by these comrades. Some take note of them, but cannot shake off their previous ideas. Therefore, I believe that it is still necessary to make a further explanation of this issue.

The plan to seize Jiangxi within a year was also proposed last April by the Front Committee to the Party Center, and a decision to that effect was later made at Yuandu.

[[The following section reproduces the reasons given in the April 1929 letter to the Party Center.]]

This proposal to seize Jiangxi erred only in setting a rigid time limit of one year. My understanding was that conditions would be ripe in Jiangxi and that prospects for a nationwide revolutionary high tide would soon arrive. If we were not convinced that a revolutionary high tide would soon arrive, we could not have concluded that we could have seized Jiangxi within one year. The shortcoming of the proposal was the rigid specification of one year, thus giving a flavor of rashness and mechanical thinking to the word "soon" in the statement "a revolutionary high tide will arrive soon." However, if you do not believe in seizing Jiangxi within a year, you come to this conclusion because you have overestimated the objective forces, underestimated subjective forces, and therefore do not believe in the rapid arrival of the revolutionary high tide. Jiangxi's objective conditions are very noteworthy. In addition to the aforementioned subjective conditions, three points concerning the objective conditions can be clearly pointed out. First, the economy of Jiangxi is mainly feudal with exploitation through land rent. The commercial bourgeoisie is quite small, and the armed forces of the landlords in that province are the weakest among all the other southern provinces. Second, Jiangxi has no provincial troops of its own and has always been garrisoned by troops from other provinces sent there to “suppress the Communists” and “suppress bandits”; these troops are not familiar with local conditions and have no vested interests like local troops, and so they are often unenthusiastic. Third, the province is further from the influence of imperialist intervention, unlike Guangdong, which is near Hong Kong and is dominated by Britain in almost all aspects. If we understand these three points, we can explain why the peasant uprisings in Jiangxi are more widespread than in all other provinces and why the Red Army guerrilla troops are more numerous than in all other provinces.

I have basically said what I want to say to you. Once I started to write, I probably wrote too much. However, I feel that our discussion is useful. If the issue we have discussed can be resolved correctly, it will greatly affect the actions of the Red Army. So I am pleased to have written this letter.

Finally, there are still two points that need to be clarified. The first is how to interpret the word “soon” in the phrase “a revolutionary high tide will arrive soon.” This is a common question among comrades. Marxists are not fortune-tellers; they should and can only point out the general direction of future developments and changes and should not specify the timing in a mechanistic way. However, when I talk of an arrival soon of a revolutionary high tide in China, I am definitely not speaking of something which in the words of some people “is possibly coming,” something devoid of practical meaning, empty and unattainable. It is like a ship far out at sea whose mast can already be seen on the horizon. It is like a rising morning sun in the east whose brilliant rays can already be seen from a high mountaintop. It is like a child moving restlessly in his mother’s womb. The second point is that, in my view, you prefer to use mobile guerrilla methods to enlarge political influence. This does not mean that you have a purely military viewpoint and the idea of roving banditry. Obviously, you do not share these two ways of thinking, neither of which are capable of winning mass support. Instead, you propose to “go all out to mobilize the masses.” Indeed, you have not only proposed this, but also have actually done so. What I do not support is only our lack of in-depth ideas about establishing political power, because this will not help fulfill the task of mobilizing the masses and promoting the revolutionary high tide as successfully as you wish. The main purpose of my letter is to make this point.

If I am mistaken in any way, please correct me.

C.26 The Current Political Situation and the Tasks for the First Front Army and the Jiangxi Party.
Strive for an Initial Victory in Jiangxi! Launch a Decisive Class War! (26 October 1930)¹³⁰

I. The Victory at Ji'an and the New Revolutionary High Tide

The capture of Changsha, the subsequent massive offensives against the enemy, and the merging of the First and Third Armies as well as the takeover of Ji'an demonstrate that the strength of the Red Army has developed rapidly.¹³¹ Moreover, the sharp struggle of the proletariat in major cities throughout China and the development of soviet political power in the countryside also indicate that soon the Chinese revolutionary high tide will arrive. The takeover of Ji'an is particularly significant because it will enable us to organize several million people in southwest Jiangxi and establish the soviet government in an area of over twenty counties where we have a strong power base and wide support from the people. In fact, the capture of Ji'an marks the beginning of our complete victory in Jiangxi Province because it is the first time the Red Army has taken over a major city in recent years. The victory will not only help the Red Army develop quickly and arouse the revolutionary masses to launch a general uprising in Jiangxi in the near future, but also give impetus to the progress of the revolutionary movement all over the country. This will enhance the future nationwide revolutionary victory. Undoubtedly, we should utilize the victory at Ji'an to take over Jiangxi Province first.

II. The International Situation and the Prospects for the World Revolution

[[Facts show that the world revolutionary high tide is surging forward. This is very helpful to the Chinese revolution and will turn the war against the Soviet Union into the victory of the world revolution.

III. Some Important Events of the Warlord Wars

IV. Analyses of the Aforementioned Events

A. The war among Chiang Kai-shek, Yan Xishan, and Feng Yuxiang is in fact a conflict among Britain, Japan, and the United States, and the confrontation between Britain and the United States has put Japan in a favorable position.

B. Our capture of Changsha, the subsequent massive offensives, and the takeover of Ji'an have not only greatly strengthened the Chinese revolutionary movement but also changed relations among various factions in the ruling regime. In other words, the development of the revolution and the intensified class struggle have caused the imperialists and the ruling regime in China to ease their own conflicts so as to work together to deal with the revolution. It is possible for Japan and the United States to reach a tentative compromise, and the British will have to follow them. The agreements between the imperialists and the warlords will enable Chiang Kai-shek to transfer troops to suppress the revolution.

C. The anticommunist alliance will inevitably collapse before the revolutionary high tide. Their intended alliances cannot last, and a new warlord war will occur. The broad masses want the Soviet Congress to be convened on 7 November and do not want the National Assembly dominated by warlords, bureaucratic-gentry landlords, and capitalists. They do want the so-called Constitution but do want soviet laws and decrees. They do not want local autonomy but do want soviet political power.

D. At present, we have two kinds of incorrect views about the present warlord war. One is the nonproletarian overoptimistic view that believes the war will continue until the warlords destroy themselves and will be unable to form an alliance against the revolutionary forces. The second is a pessimistic view that holds that the revolutionary movement has met with great difficulty since our enemies have united. This is a nonproletarian viewpoint because it does not recognize the revolutionary high tide. The fact that the reactionaries have to form an alliance shows that the nationwide high tide has arrived.]]

V. The Guerrilla Line in Opposition to the Idea of an Initial Victory in One Province

The task of winning an initial victory in one province is now before us. To accomplish this, we must change the guerrilla line—a product of the past guerrilla warfare—and the concept of exclusive concern with military issues. This concept failed to estimate correctly the warlord war and to perceive the significance of winning victory in one province in the decisive class war. The concept isolated us from the people, paid no attention to winning over the masses or to mobilizing the people, and neglected the task of expanding and strengthening the Red Army. Militarily, this line overemphasizes the tactics of guerrilla warfare and refuses to make preparations for the decisive class war. Guerrilla-style attack appears to be a leftist line since it advocates offensive action, but in reality it is an ultrarightist line because it has postponed the arrival of the revolutionary victory in one province. The contrast between our failure in Changsha and our victory in Ji'an is a clear example. The reason why we failed the first time to hold Changsha for a substantial period of time was that we did not mobilize the people and our troops were not the main force of the Red Army. The second time, the Red Army failed to take over the city, despite a vigorous fight for a fortnight, because we lacked support from the masses and cooperation from the enemy soldiers. The case of Ji'an was just the opposite. With strong support from the people, the Red Army succeeded in capturing the city. The Red Army was able to capture Changsha the first time because the enemy had no reinforcements or strong fortifications. Only under such circumstances can a guerrilla-style attack succeed. At present, the enemy troops have large reinforcements and have built up strong defense works in Nanchang and Jiujiang. By contrast the Army is short of supplies and lacks transportation. In light of this background, if the Red Army fights with guerrilla-style attacks, it will surely fail, and we will have to retreat to other areas, thus postponing the initial victory in one province. In this sense, the idea of assaulting a city with a guerrilla-style attack has nothing in common with a well-planned strategy which aims at winning an initial victory in one province. Thus, we must resolutely correct this tactic. The Party Center has recently pointed out that the Red Army should enhance its military training and select well-qualified peasants and working-class cadres to form a strong main force and backbone of the Red Army. Only with a main force consisting of 30,000 to 50,000 well-trained Red Army troops can we succeed in capturing big cities and establishing the people's confidence in the Red Army. The Party Center also asks us to adopt a well-planned strategy. We think these instructions are very clear and have greatly helped our work to win an initial victory in one province. However, it would be a serious rightist mistake for the Red Army to use the excuse of a lack of cooperation from the people to avoid carrying out a ruthless attack and disperse its forces aimlessly or refused to fight even though it could win the battle. The problem of lack of supplies and training can be solved only through a well-planned struggle. We must apply strategy and tactics flexibly. Strategy is made in line with the objective situation and subjective strengths, while tactics are the means to be applied in line with various specific conditions in order to carry out the strategy. Therefore, tactics can be changed frequently as long as they do not run counter to strategy. For example, in order to capture Nanchang, it is necessary for us to take over Ji'an first. This is an absolutely correct strategy. One should not simply and mechanically ask: "Since we have planned to attack Nanchang, why do we now take over Ji'an?" Again, our strategy is to capture the Nanchang-Jiujiang Railway. Tactically, we may first attack or wipe out enemy forces in carefully selected areas along the Gan River and then take over the railway. It all depends on our and the enemy's strength at a specific time and place. We must never rigidly adhere to one tactic and must make this point clear to the lower-ranking Red Army cadres and soldiers. Otherwise, only knowing the general goal, they might have doubts and waver as soon as there are strategic or tactical changes. This would mean that leading organs would have to follow the soldiers with their wrong view, and it might jeopardize the flexible application of our strategy and tactics. We must pay special attention to this issue.

VI. The Central Task for the First Front Army and the Jiangxi Party Committee Is to Win an Initial Victory in Jiangxi

To take over provinces and regions around Wuhan, we should try to win an initial victory in Jiangxi and then expand to take over Wuhan. Of course, whether we can win victory in Jiangxi depends on the progress of the nationwide revolutionary high tide. At present, however, conditions in Jiangxi are particularly favorable for us. We have established soviet political power in over sixty counties in Jiangxi. There are peasant uprisings throughout the province. The First and Third Armies have joined forces. The Tenth Army is continuing its offensives toward the mouth of Pan-Yang Lake. The capture of Ji'an is particularly significant because it has gathered together all the revolutionary forces and created a powerful position threatening Nanchang. The economic base of the landlords and capitalists in rural areas in Jiangxi has been severely destroyed and will be completely wiped out as the revolution develops. Propaganda work conducted by the Red Army in the Qing River area has induced a whole platoon of the enemy's Eighteenth Division to cross the river with their guns and surrender. The enemy soldiers have said that they will not open fire when we attack Nanchang. Enemy officers have become so panicked that they even gather the soldiers together at midnight to give them an admonitory talk. Recently, some enemy soldiers have surrendered with their guns to our Third Army. They told us that the enemy troops had not received any allowance for five months, soldiers had deserted, and officers were often assassinated. They also said that many soldiers wanted to surrender to the Red Army because there is no oppression in the Red Army. These facts prove that the reactionary army—the tool of the ruling class to suppress the revolution—is no longer loyal to the regime. Past experiences have shown that enemy soldiers are reluctant to fight tough battles and that even though they outnumber us they are not invincible. The power struggle within the counterrevolutionary regime has not come to an end, and a new conflict is brewing. Chiang Kai-shek has merely taken advantage of the tentative compromise to deal with the revolution. Although he has sent many troops to Jiangxi, we will certainly defeat them because they are exhausted from the warlords' war. So long as we can strengthen our political and organizational leadership, we will certainly be able to wipe out the main force of the enemy. Therefore, the current task for the Jiangxi Party Committee and the First Front Army is to carry out a decisive class war with a well-planned strategy and with cooperation from the people to win a preliminary victory in Jiangxi Province.

VII. Tasks for the First Front Army and the Jiangxi Party Committee in Line with the Aforementioned Guidelines

1. We must intensify propaganda and agitation to expose the warlords' suppression of the revolution and enhance our preparation for the armed uprisings to seize political power in Jiangxi. We should spread the news of our victory in Ji'an and the establishment of the soviet government in Ji'an and the establishment of the soviet government in Jiangxi, publicize all the decrees and documents issued by the soviet government, put forward such slogans as "Oppose warlords' suppression of the revolution" and "Carry out armed uprisings to seize political power in Jiangxi," encourage the people to fight for the soviet, and firmly defeat the enemy's attack with a decisive class war to win an initial victory in Jiangxi. As the revolutionary high tide is coming, we should step up our struggle against various reformists, the Reorganization clique, the Third Party, the liquidationists, the A.B. League,¹³² and deceitful policies, as well as the National Assembly sponsored by Chiang Kai-shek. We must do our best to expose all their crimes and eliminate their influence among the masses. It is a very serious task for us to smash the enemy's plot to weaken the revolution in the forthcoming decisive class war.

2. We must improve our work in Nanchang, Jiujiang, and on the Nanchang-Jiujiang Railway. At present, uprisings launched by the working class are a major and necessary means in the struggle to win over big cities. Enemies often make a final effort to hold cities with fortified defense works. Our failure at Changsha has taught us that it is impossible to win an initial victory in one province if we cannot win the support of people in big cities. Now we should correct the pessimistic attitude toward urban work, cease to neglect it, and overcome all kinds of difficulties to carry out our work in cities. The major task for the labor movement is to organize direct armed uprisings, launch political strikes, establish red trade unions, and set up workers' militia and pickets, which are to be used as the main force during uprisings. The daily economic struggle must be linked to the armed uprisings.

3. In preparing local uprisings, we should begin in Anfu, Aihe, Xinyu, Fengyi, and Yuanzhou in west Jiangxi; Jishui, Yongfeng, Le'an, and Xing'an in east Jiangxi; and Ganzhou and the other counties in south Jiangxi. We must wage guerrilla warfare and launch uprisings to liberate the white areas in order to link all the red areas together. We must expand further to Fujian, Guangdong, Hunan, and Hubei and destroy the enemy's attacks through mass uprisings. However, we should bear in mind lessons from the past and confiscate immediately all land in local uprisings and distribute it equally to the peasants. In the struggle, we should establish the leadership of farmhands, set up independent farmhand unions, and organize poor-peasant associations. We must not allow the rich peasants to sneak into the soviet government and the red militia, and we must firmly promote farmhands and poor peasants as leaders. From the very beginning, the struggle in the countryside should not only ruthlessly attack the landlords but also distribute land to the peasants, abolish all rents and debts, oppose all kinds of exploitation and oppression of poor peasants by the rich, and mobilize the poor peasants to fight against the rich. Only in this way can we thoroughly wipe out feudal influences and consolidate the revolutionary base.

4. We should mobilize the broad masses of people to participate in the war, expand the soviet movement, develop the revolutionary struggle throughout the country, and point out to the people that the final victory is certainly ours. It is of vital importance to mobilize the broad masses—men, women, old, and young—to cooperate with the Red Army in the decisive class war to defeat the main forces of the enemy and strive for an initial victory in Jiangxi. In the areas where the enemy will launch offensives, such Xiajiang, Xinyu, Fengui, Yuanzhou, Anfu, Lianhua, Ji'an, Jushui, Yongfeng, and Le'an, we should concentrate the red militia and Young Pioneers to intensify their military and political training. They should be placed under unified leadership to reconnoiter the enemy troops' route, sabotage their rear areas, destroy their transport, capture their weapons, cut off their supplies, ambush them whenever possible, and continually disrupt them to bog them down in the red areas so that we can wipe them out completely. The red militia should help the Red Army with sentry duties, reconnoitering among the enemy troops, transportation, and giving first aid to the wounded. We must organize the masses in every county and every district and try our best to collect enough spears, locally made cannons, and gunpowder. It is necessary to carry out the mass line, hold mass meetings in every district and town, and encourage the people to discuss plans among themselves and prepare for the war. Only if the masses take the initiative to participate in the war can we consider it our political victory. We must strongly oppose commandism, which forces people to carry out orders they do not understand, and parochialism, which means the party and soviet leaders make decisions on important issues at will without consulting the masses. Such behavior would give people the impression that they worked for individual leaders. At the same time, we should expose brutalities of the warlords in suppressing the revolution such as massacring the innocent, burning houses, and forcing revolutionaries to defect. We should raise the class consciousness of the masses and call on them to "fight to the end for class interests and never surrender to the enemy" so as to strengthen their will to fight. In the soviet areas outside the war zone, we must also mobilize the masses and push the revolutionary movement toward the white areas to expand our territory. It is important to unite all the people to fight against local gentry and landlords and persuade the revolutionary masses not to carry out reprisals but to distribute all the land equally. When we move into the white areas, we should remain there for a substantial period of time to help the people distribute land, and establish soviet political power so as to eliminate the difference between the red and white areas.

5. We must improve our work on the soldiers' movement in the white army. The heavy casualties of the warlords' war, the unbearable oppression as well as the miserable living conditions, and the worker-peasant revolutionary high tide have affected the enemy soldiers and caused them to lean toward the revolution. Recently, enemy soldiers have frequently come with their weapons to join the Red Army. Although there has not yet been a mutiny in the white army, conditions have matured. Now, we must establish party organizations and leadership in the white army. Local party organizations and party committees in the Red Army should correct their past negligence of this work and do their best to implement the task. We must understand that without the disintegration of the white army, the revolution will not be victorious. To do this work well, we must build up a broad political basis and secret organizations in the white army and turn the warlords' war into a revolutionary war to eliminate the warlords and liberate the workers and peasants.

We should raise the class consciousness of the enemy soldiers, help them launch mutinies, and correct the narrow-minded opportunist line that is interested only in encouraging a few enemy soldiers to desert with their weapons. Our local Red Army party committees and political departments must establish a special office for the soldiers' movement and dispatch a large number of cadres to the white army through various channels to carry out the work. At present, we must pay particular attention to soldiers and officers in the lower ranks of the enemy troops recently transferred to Jiangxi. We should tell them that they have received nothing except heavy casualties from the long and brutal warlords' war in Shandong and Henan and now they are being sent back to attack the workers and peasants. We must point out to them the evil nature of the warlords, the current progress of the revolutionary movement, and that their only escape is to launch a mutiny and participate in the worker-peasant revolution. In areas occupied by the white army, we should organize a mass movement to cause the enemy troops to fall apart. We must encourage women, children, and old men to contact and influence the enemy soldiers by washing clothes for them and selling things to them (except grain). The red militia should, on the one hand, bravely capture the enemy's weapons and, on the other, treat the captured enemy soldiers well in order to win them over. In this way we can expose the enemy's lie that the red militia kills prisoners of war.

VIII. Goals for West Jiangxi, South Jiangxi, and Other Soviet Areas

1. Unite farmhands and the poor peasants to oppose the rich peasants. In places where fertile fields are in the hands of the rich peasants, we should redistribute land according to its quality by taking fertile fields from the rich peasants and giving them to the poor. This is the most practical strategy to wage the class struggle in the countryside, satisfy the needs of the broad masses, and thoroughly smash the counterrevolutionary plot of the rich peasants. In places where land has been distributed fairly in both quantity and quality, our task is to protect the victory of land distribution and not allow anyone to change the principle of distribution. Our slogan is to "Protect the fair distribution and change the unfair."

2. Completely reorganize party YL organizations to purge all rich peasants and counterrevolutionaries (the A.B. League). This is necessary because party and YL organizations in west and south Jiangxi are full of rich peasants and counterrevolutionaries. The reorganization cannot be carried out unless we distribute land thoroughly and fairly, wage class struggle of farmhands and poor peasants against the rich, purge the rich peasants and all waverers, mobilize the masses to participate in the decisive class war against the enemy's attacks, and promote to leading positions the activists among the farmhands and the poor. Meanwhile, in cities (including county towns, especially the town of Ji'an), we must firmly protect the interests of the poor workers, let them run factories, and put forward labor-protection laws to oppose the capitalists' exploitation of the workers. We should also guard against those workers who are close to or are not exploited directly by the capitalists. We must use these struggles to purge the petty bourgeoisie and other vacillating elements from party organizations in both rural and urban areas. We must promote staunch proletarian fighters to leading positions.

3. We must advocate the slogans "Dismiss the cadres who violate the interests of the poor workers and peasants" and "Dismiss the cadres who violate the principles of the soviet congress." It is necessary to reorganize the soviet government at all levels, select cadres from farmhands, poor peasants, and leaders of the real working people, and purge the rich peasants and counterrevolutionaries (the A.B. League) from the soviet government at all levels. This is necessary because the soviet government from top to bottom in west and south Jiangxi is full of rich peasants and counterrevolutionaries. The soviet government should also get rid of new-style bureaucratism and commandism since they isolate us from the people and cause damage to our work. An important strategy to strengthen the soviet government is to invite working people to participate in the management of government activities. We must allow the delegates to the soviet congress to discuss and make decisions on all major issues. The soviet government should report on its work to the delegates and listen to their opinions and criticism. There should be regular meetings of the soviet congress at the village, town, and other levels. We oppose the fixed-delegates system and advocate the idea of "selecting poor worker and peasant leaders as delegates." In districts with big populations and covering large areas, it is necessary to set up the soviet government at the village level. However, members of the village soviet government should not become full-time cadres or have salaries. Only in this way can we prevent the emergence of new-style bureaucratism, make all the administrative work meet the requirements of the people, get support from the masses, and strengthen soviet political power.

4. Politically, we should expose all kinds of conspiracies of the A.B. League, ruthlessly suppress it, eliminate its influence among the masses, and execute all its activists.

5. We must set up genuine working-class trade unions in the cities, let the workers run factories, and improve the organization and training of the pickets.

6. We must establish an independent farmhands union. This is very important to ensure proletarian leadership in the countryside. We need to hold regular meetings of the farmhand union at the branch level, emphasize class education to its members, and lead them to fight against the rich peasants. In order to win over the basic masses of the poor peasants and launch class struggle against the rich, we must also organize poor peasant associations for the poor peasants who have suffered from heavy exploitation in the past and who still have an impoverished life even after the land distribution. Activists among them should be selected and promoted to leading positions.

7. We should expand greatly the Red Army and its reserves by persuading the broad masses to join our forces. However, we must strongly oppose commandism and deceptive methods in our work because such behavior will not help recruitment but jeopardize it. The reserves should also have military and political training, good commanders, and take part in mass work.

IX. The Current Task for the First Front Army

A. Military strategy: As a large number of the enemy troops are moving toward us, it is a good opportunity for the First and Third Armies to replenish arms, recruit soldiers, and create the main force of the Red Army. Our current strategy is to develop the victory at Ji'an to win further victories and take over the Nanchang-Jiujiang Railway, Nanchang, and Jiujiang. This means that we must mobilize the people in the areas between Ji'an and Nanchang, solve the supply problem, speed up the mobilization of the masses in our rear areas, and prepare supplies in order to launch a decisive war to wipe out the enemy's main force and win victory throughout the province.

B. Strengthen political training in the Red Army. At present, we should concentrate our propaganda work in preparation for a decisive class war and strive for an initial victory in Jiangxi. We must point out that the coalition of counterrevolutionaries will certainly collapse and that their massive offensives are in fact an excellent opportunity for us to create a main force of the Red Army. In this way, we can strengthen the fighting will of our officers and soldiers. At the same time, the Red Army should pay attention to the struggle against the A.B. League and the Reorganizationists, improve the general political education of the new soldiers, and establish soldiers' committees and party organizations. We must try our best to improve the party's leadership and expand its organizations. Within a month, the number of party members in both the First and Third Armies should be doubled. We should also work out a propaganda plan to teach communist theory and revolutionary ideas to our soldiers and eliminate illiteracy among them so as to raise the political level of the Red Army. It is necessary to lead our soldiers to do mass work frequently and enlarge the Red Army by recruiting workers and peasants in the mass struggle, thus creating a Red Army of iron.

C. Intensify the training of practical military techniques. This is particularly important because there are many new soldiers in the Red Army and we are going to carry out a decisive class war. We should scrap impractical formal military drills (such as manner drills) so as to make full use of the time to finish practical military training. Commanders in both armies should draw up a plan to supervise and check the implementation of this task.

Notes to Commentary C

1. The Conference was attended by twenty-two Chinese Communists and three Soviet advisors. The Chinese participants were CC members: Li Weihai, Qu Qiubai, Zhang Tailei, Deng Zhongxia, Ren Bishi, Su Zhaozheng, Gu Shunzhang, Luo Yinong, Chen Qiaonian, Cai

Hesen; Alternates: Li Zhenying, Lu Chen, Mao Zedong; Central Control Commission members: Yang Baoan, Wang Hebo; CYL representatives: Li Zifen, Yang Shannan, Lu Dingyi; Hunan representative: Peng Gongda; Hubei representative: Zheng Chaolin; Military representative: Wang Ruofei; Secretary: Deng Xiaoping; Comintern: Lominadze and two others. 25. The letter was published in Pravda on 29 December 1929.

26. See "Zhongguo gongchandang jieshou gongchan guoji dishici quanti huiyi jueyi de jueyi" (Resolution of the CCP Accepting the Resolution of the Comintern's Tenth Plenum), 20 December 1929, in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 5, pp. 593–602 (originally published in Buersheweike [The Bolshevik], vol. 3, no. 1 [15 January 1930]), and "Jieshou guoji yijiuerjiunian shiyue ershilii ri zhishixin de jueyi—guanyu lun guomindang gaizu pai he Zhongguo gongchandang de renwu" (Decision Accepting the Comintern's Directive of 26 October 1929—Concerning Discussion of the Reorganization Faction of the GMD and the Tasks of the CCP), in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang, vol. 6, pp. 1–13.

27. One month later Chen Duxiu was expelled from the party.

28. This was one of several letters. For example, Chen had already sent a letter to members of the Standing Committee on 5 August 1929 putting forward a defense of his position. See “Chen Duxiu guanyu Zhongguo geming wenti zhi Zhonggong zhongyang xin” (Chen Duxiu on the Problem of the Chinese Revolution and the Letter of the CCP CC), in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 5, pp. 724–43.

29. See the confession of Xiang Zhongfa in Wang Jianmin, Zhongguo gongchandang shigao, vol. 2, pp. 159–61.

30. The war lasted until 3 November 1930 and spread to a dozen provinces, mainly in northern China.

31. The Academy of Military Sciences (ed.), Zhongguo renmin jiefangjun dashiji, pp. 42–43. Mao Zedong did not attend these meetings and was busy compiling reports on the situation in rural China that would provide important information for his future policy development. On the basis of reports presented at a fact-finding meeting, Mao wrote his “Report from Xunwu.” A translation can be found in Roger R. Thompson, trans., Mao Zedong, Report from Xunwu. In October of the same year, Mao wrote his “Report from Xingguo.” See Mao Zedong nongcun diaocha wenji, pp. 182–251.

32. This was adopted by a Politburo meeting held from 9 to 11 June in Shanghai. Among others, it was attended by Xiang Zhongfa, Li Lisan, Guan Xiangying, Xiang Ying, Li Weiham, and Wen Yuchang.

33. The agent of the Far Eastern Office of the ECCI in Shanghai did reply in a letter of 20 June. He expressed his disagreement with the resolution and requested that it not be distributed. This seems to have angered Li Lisan sufficiently to write to the ECCI calling for his dismissal and the dissolution of the office. Yang Yunruo, Gongchan guoji he Zhongguo geming guanxi jishi, 1919–1943, p. 86.

34. For details of the meeting see Jiang Huxuan et al. (eds.), Zhongguo gongchandang, pp. 111–14, and Zhao Shenghui, Zhongguo gongchandang, pp. 103–5. See also, “Zhongyang tongzhi diyisiqi hao—hongsequ cheng zuigao de junshi zhengzhi zhidao jiguan (gongnong geming weiyuanhui) zhi chansheng yu yunyong” (CC Circular No. 147—the Creation and Utilization of the Highest Military and Political Leading Organ in the Red Areas [the Workers and Peasants’ Revolutionary Committee]), in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 6, pp. 178–80.

35. This letter has usually been referred to as the 23 July letter because of the date when it was received in Shanghai. The letter was drafted in May in response to the CCP decisions. See A. Grigoriev, “The Comintern and the Revolutionary Movement in China Under the Slogan of the Soviets (1927–1931),” in R.A. Ulyanovsky (ed.), The Comintern and the East, pp. 345–88. For the differing views see B. Schwartz, Chinese Communism and the Rise of Mao, p. 143: “Far from condemning the Politburo 11 June letter, the ECCI letter of 23 July actually endorses its basic strategic suggestions”; Hsiao Tso-liang, Power Relations Within the Chinese Communist Movement 1930–1934, vol. 1, p. 25: “A close examination of the Comintern directive of 23 July 1930 and the CCP Politburo resolution of 11 June shows discrepancies which go beyond the scope of timing and tactics”; R. Thornton, The Comintern and the Chinese Communists, 1928–1931, p. 175: “The Comintern’s analyses then stripped Li of any theoretical ambiguities he might have attempted to use to maintain his position.”

36. There was no direct telegraphic communication between the Party Center and the Comintern before early 1931.

37. In June 1930, Peng’s Fifth Red Army had been reorganized into the Third Army Corps.

38. Peng Dehuai, Peng Dehuai zishu, pp. 149–55. It is important to draw a distinction between Peng Dehuai’s capture of Changsha and Li Lisan’s leadership.

39. Yang Yunruo, Gongchan guoji, p. 96. Li even suggested that Soviet Russia dispatch troops to attack northern China.

40. Qu and Zhou arrived back from Moscow in the second half of August. Zhao Shenghui, Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 105.

41. The Plenum was held in Shanghai and was presided over by Qu and Zhou. It was attended by ten CC members (Xiang Zhongfa, Xu Xigen, Zhang Jinbao, Luo Dengxian, Zhou Enlai, Xiang Ying, Yu Maohuai, Qu Qiubai, Li Lisan, and Gu Shunzhang), four alternates (Wang Ruofei, Shi Wenbin, Zhou Xiuzhu, and Luo Zhanglong), two members of the Control Commission and twenty members from the various bureaus, provincial committees, and youth league organizations. Jiang Huxuan et al. (eds.), Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 116.

42. Full Politburo members were: Xiang Zhongfa, Xiang Ying, Zhou Enlai, Qu Qiubai, Li Lisan, Guan Xiangying, and Zhang Guotao. Alternates were: Luo Dengxian, Xu Xigen, Lu Futan, Li Weiham, Wen Yucheng, Mao Zedong, and Gu Zuolin. In name, Xiang Zhongfa was general secretary, but in practice work was supervised by Qu Qiubai. Wang Jianying, Zhongguo gongchandang zuzhishi ziliao huibian, p. 142, and Zhao Shenghui, Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 106.

43. Thus, for example, even at the ECCI meeting of 26 August 1930, while Li Lisan was blamed for committing some mistakes, he was not accused of pursuing a wrong line. The meeting promoted the idea that if the Red Army increased in strength, it would be possible to capture one or more industrial centers. This presumably would have been the kind of idea which Zhou Enlai and Qu Qiubai brought back to China with them.

44. The "returned students" group refers to those who had come back to China from studies in Soviet Russia. They formed a loose group under the leadership of Wang Ming, Bo Gu, and Zhang Wentian. The group, insofar as it existed as a coherent entity, began to fragment on its return to China. The group is also referred to as the "Twenty-eight Bolsheviks" after the group of students who returned from Sun Yat-sen University in Moscow. Pavel Mif had been their patron and had influenced them through his positions as director of the ECCI's Chinese Commission, deputy director of the Comintern's Far Eastern Secretariat, and president of Sun Yat-sen University.

45. Shao Yu [Wang Ming], "The Current War Among the Warlords and the Tasks of the Party," Buersheweike, 15 June 1930.

46. This letter is often referred to as the letter of 16 November 1930 because of the date of its arrival in China. "Gongchan guoji zhixing weiyuanhui guanyu Li Lisan luxian wenti gei Zhongguo gongchandang zhongyang weiyuanhui weiyuan de xin" (Letter from the ECCI to Members of the CCP CC Concerning the Li Lisan Line), in the Translation Department of the Institute of Modern History of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences (ed.), Gongchan guoji, pp. 103-12.

47. It was attended by thirty-seven delegates of whom fifteen including Wang Ming were not CC members. This group, however, had the right to vote. The CC members in attendance were: Xiang Zhongfa, Guan Xiangying, Wen Yucheng, Ren Bishi, He Chang, Li Weiham, Yu Fei, Xu Xigen, Qu Qiubai, Luo Dengxian, Zhang Jinbao, Gu Shunzhang, Chen Yu, and Zhou Enlai. Jiang Huxuan et al. (eds.), Zhongguo gongchandang, p. 125.

48. Zhao Shenghui, Zhongguo gongchandang, pp. 108-9. The name list for Politburo members had been approved prior to the Plenum by the Politburo and the Comintern's Far Eastern Bureau and was presented by Zhou Enlai. Shi Wenbin presented an alternative list, but the majority voted to accept the former list. The new Politburo comprised: Xiang Zhongfa, Xiang Ying, Xu Xigen, Zhang Guotao, Chen Yu, Zhou Enlai, Lu Futan, Ren Bishi, and Wang Ming. The seven alternates were: Luo Dengxian, Guan Xiangying, Wang Kequan, Liu Shaoqi, Wen Yucheng, Mao Zedong, and Gu Shunzhang. Xiang Zhongfa, Zhou Enlai, and Zhang Guotao were to form the Standing Committee of the Politburo. Jiang Huxuan et al. (eds.), Zhongguo gongchandang, pp. 126-27.

49. See He Mengxiong's two letters in Hsiao Tso-liang, Power Relations Within the Chinese Communist Movement, vol. 2, pp. 125-27.

50. Luo Zhanglong when interviewed by Tony Saich in the summer of 1988 confirmed his view that they had been betrayed by Wang Ming's supporters. Luo himself had been sent by the group to organize in Hong Kong and had escaped arrest.

A translation can be found in Kuo, Analytical History, book 2, pp. 273–76.

52. On 31 January 1931, Luo’s group set up an extraordinary CC with Sun Zhengyi (a worker representative) as secretary general and Luo himself as director of the Propaganda Department.

53. These are the two letters mentioned in Mao’s article “A Single Spark Can Start a Prairie Fire”; see below Doc. C.25. “Radical” and “moderate” are highly subjective terms in this context and need to be treated with care. With reference to Li, “radical” is used to indicate his tendency to interpret Comintern directives and policies as encouraging a policy of imminent uprisings. “Moderate” is used to refer to Zhou as he followed the more cautious, albeit ambiguous, tone set by Bukharin and the Comintern at the CCP’s Sixth Party Congress in Moscow. On the whole, the Comintern favored restraint over revolutionary adventurism. At this stage, however, Zhou, seeing no value in Mao’s exploits on the Hunan-Jiangxi border, claimed at the Sixth Party Congress that Mao’s troops were like “bandits” and were “flying from place to place.” Zhou’s comments in the stenographic records of the Congress are reported in E. H. Carr, Foundation of a Planned Economy 1926–1929, vol. 3, p. 867. I am grateful to Professor Stuart Schram for pointing out the problem of referring to Zhou as a moderate during this period; it is worth pointing out that the evidence is not clear-cut and that a case can be made for a more “radical” Zhou.

57. Li Jishen was a southwestern general who had supported the Nationalists. On 15 April 1927, Li turned on the Communists in Canton, arresting some 2,000 and killing over 100. On 17 November 1927, Li was driven out of Canton in a coup that seemed to provide the opportunity for a communist uprising. This uprising, the Canton Commune, was crushed between 11 and 13 December. Tang Shengzhi was a general in Hunan who supported the Nationalists. In July 1927, he supported Wang Jingwei’s extermination of the Communists in Wuhan.

58. An Zhongyuan is the code name used for the CCP CC. Zong Rongming is the code name for the Central Peasant Department.

59. “Zhongguo gongchandang zhongyang zhixing weiyuanhui gao quan dang dangyuan shu” was drafted on the basis of discussions at the 7 August Emergency Conference held in Hankou and disseminated to all party members. The translation here is based on that in Brandt, Schwartz, and Fairbank, A Documentary History of Chinese Communism, pp. 102–18. This was translated from the Chinese text in Zhongguo geming (The Chinese Revolution), January 1933: 149–205, on microfilm at the Hoover Institution Library, Stanford. It has been checked and modified against the text published in the Committee for Collection of Materials on CCP History and the Central Party Archives (ed.), Baqi huiyi, pp. 5–37. This latter text was taken from Zhongyang tongxun (Central Bulletin), no. 1 (1927).

60. This was the ECCI Resolution on the Chinese Question of July 1927. This resolution was to form the basis of the Chinese critique of past policy.

61. Xu was a militarist who turned against the Communists. On 21 May 1927, his troops were ordered to break up the peasant associations in Changsha. The resultant massacre was called the “Horse Day Massacre.”

64. The attack of Xu Kexiang’s troops on the Communists and the peasant associations on 21 May 1927.

65. General Tang first appeared to support the CCP but later turned against it. This refers to a telegram sent by Tang to the national government at Wuhan.

66. Tan Pingshan served in the GMD-left government as head of the Central Peasant Department.

67. In early 1927 General Zhu Peide had been considered hostile to Chiang Kai-shek. After the break between Chiang and the Communists, however, Zhu fell in line on 6 June 1927 when he ordered all Communists to be expelled from Jiangxi.

68. “Gongchan guoji daibiao Luominneisi de baogao” is a report delivered to the 7 August Emergency Conference. This translation is taken from the Committee for Collection of Materials on CCP History and the Central Party Archives (ed.), Baqi huiyi, pp. 49–55. This is a reprint from the notes of the Conference contained in the Central Party Archives, Beijing.

69. Tan Pingshan participated in the Temporary Action Committee of the Chinese GMD, one of a number of third parties that tried unsuccessfully to carve out a space between the CCP and GMD. This was the forerunner of the Chinese Workers and Peasants’ Democratic Party.

70. Ironically, Tan Pingshan had played a dominant role in the Nanchang Uprising and chaired the Revolutionary Committee of the GMD, the executive body supposedly in charge of the Uprising.

71. “Zhongyang changwei daibiao Qu Qiubai de baogao” is found in the Committee for Collection of Materials on CCP History and the Central Party Archives (ed.) Baqi huiyi, pp. 69–72. This is taken from an original copy in the Central Party Archives, Beijing.

72. “Zhongguo gongchandang zhongyang weiyuanhui dui zhengju xuanyan” (Statement of the CCP CC on the Current Situation), 13 July 1927, Xiangdao zhoubao, no. 201 (18 July 1927). The statement criticized the nationalist government for not protecting the workers and peasants as well as announcing the resignation of Tan Pingshan and Su Zhaozheng from their posts in the government. However, the statement maintained a commitment to working together with the GMD.

73. On 1 June 1927, the Communists in Wuhan received a telegram from Stalin sending instructions. It contained orders that were impossible to execute, calling for the seizure of land by the masses from below and the replacement of wavering GMD CC members by peasant and working-class leaders. Unreliable generals were to be relied on no longer, and a new army corps were to be created. On 5 June, the Comintern representative, M.N. Roy, revealed the contents to Wang Jingwei. Wang’s shock at the contents led to the break between the Wuhan government and the Communists.

74. General Zhang Fakui headed the Second Front Army, which had recently moved from Guangdong to take control of northern Jiangxi. Support of elements of his troops was seen as important for the uprisings in the southern provinces. If Zhang could not be persuaded to join by leading his troops back to Guangdong, the Communists would try to take over control of them.

75. At the time, Ye Ting headed the Twenty-fourth Division, and he became one of the leaders of the Nanchang Uprising.

76. On 24 July 1927, Song Qingling, Sun Yat-sen’s widow, had issued a statement denouncing Wang Jingwei’s anticommunist policies and announcing her resignation from the national government. This supported Deng Yanda’s earlier “Declaration of Resignation.”

77. At the time, Zhang, who was a Communist, was working in the Northwest Army.

78. “Zhongguo gongchandang zhongyang zhixing weiyuanhui zhi Zhongguo guomindang geming tongzhi shu” (Letter from the CEC of the CCP to Revolutionary Comrades in the GMD), 29 July 1927, in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 3, pp. 227–37.

79. “Mao Zedong guanyu gongchan guoji daibiao baogao de fayan,” in the Committee for Collection of Materials on CCP History and the Central Party Archives (ed.), Baqi huiyi, p. 58. These comments are reprinted from the original notes in the Central Party Archives.

80. This was Mao’s report on his investigation into the peasant movement in Hunan. See above, Doc. B.20.

81. This refers to the “Horse Day” (21 May 1927) massacre in Changsha. Party leaders, in order to preserve cooperation with the GMD, claimed that peasants had broken loose from control and had precipitated a reign of terror on the people.

82. “Zhonggong zhongyang guanyu Xiang E Yue Gan sisheng nongmin qiushou baodong dagang,” in the Committee for Collection of Materials on CCP History and the Central Party Archives (ed.), Baqi huiyi, pp. 102–4. This is taken from an original document in the Central Party Archives.

83. “Zhongyang gei Hunan shengwei xin—linshi zhongyang zhengzhiju duiyu Xiang sheng gongzuo de jueyi,” in the Committee for Collection of Materials on CCP History and the Central Party Archives (ed.), Baqi huiyi, pp. 112–14. This reprinted version is taken from the original in the Central Party Archives.

84. Mayeer was a Russian who acted as an advisor to the Hunan Provincial Committee. This is presumably the same person as Comrade Ma [Kefu] who provided a report on the circumstances under which the planned attack on Changsha was canceled. His account shows that there were severe internal divisions over the implementation of the Uprising. His report was originally published in Zhongyang tongxun, no. 6 (30 September 1927): 4–8; a translation can be found in Pak, Documents of the Chinese Communist Party, pp. 103–8. According to Hofheinz, “Comrade Ma” probably arrived together with Lominadze to direct the Uprising in Hunan. R. Hofheinz, Jr., “The Autumn Harvest Insurrection,” China Quarterly, no. 32 (1967): 76.

85. The three counties of Chenxian, Yichang, and Ruchen.

86. In the plan of 3 August Xia Xi was included as a member. See Doc. C.6.

87. This is a code name for the CCP CC.

88. “Guanyu Hunan qiushou baodong jingguo de baogao (jielu).” The extract of this report is reprinted in the Teaching and Research Department of the Central Party School, Zhonggong dangshi cankao ziliao, vol. 3, pp. 7–18.

89. On 15 July 1927, the Wuhan GMD Political Affairs Committee announced an end to all cooperation between the GMD and the CCP.

90. Zedong insisted most strongly that we reduce the scope of the uprising. Lirong, Minghan, and others all agreed with him. Gongda was the only one at that time to advocate an uprising throughout Hunan and insisted Zedong go to south Hunan immediately. He finally gave up his view because of the plan to launch an immediate uprising at Changsha. [Footnote in original Chinese text.]

91. “Zhongguo xianzhuang yu gongchandang de renwu jueyan” is reprinted in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 3, pp. 445–67. The Resolution was adopted by the Temporary Politburo at an Enlarged Session held in Shanghai on 9 and 10 November 1927. The session was presided over by Qu Qiubai. It was revised, examined, and approved by the Standing Committee on 14 November. The Research Department on Party History of the CCP (ed.), Zhonggong dangshi dashi nianbiao, pp. 63–64.

93. This notion was put forward by Marx and Engels in March 1850. They argued that after the petty bourgeoisie had achieved their limited demands, their interests would divide from those of the proletariat. In these circumstances, it was the duty of the proletariat to make the revolution permanent "until all more or less possessing classes have been forced out of their position of dominance, until the proletariat has conquered state power." See "Address to the Communist League," in K. Marx and F. Engels, Selected Works, vol. 1, p. 109.

95. "Zhengzhi jueyian." This translation is based on that in Brandt, Schwartz, and Fairbank, A Documentary History, pp. 127-55. This was translated from the mimeographed pamphlet Zhongguo gongchandang diliuci daibiao dahui jueyian (Resolutions of the Sixth Congress of the CCP). The title is also in Russian on the cover followed by Izdanie, KUTK [Komunisticheskii Universitet Trudyashchikhsya Kitaia (Communist University for Chinese Toilers)], Moscow, 1928. This version has been checked with that in the Secretariat of the CCP CC (ed.), Liuda yilai, vol. 1, pp. 1-17. The texts are virtually identical. The only significance difference is that the latter version contains no subheadings within the subsections.

96. "Suweiai zhengquan zuzhi wenti jueyian," in the Secretariat of the CCP CC (ed.), Liuda yilai, vol. 1, pp. 17-27. This can also be found in the mimeographed pamphlet Zhongguo gongchandang diliuci dahui jueyian (Moscow, 1928). The translation here is based on that in Chinese Studies in History (winter-spring 1971): 102-26. Here the title of the document is translated as "An Explanation of the Question of Soviets." The main difference is that the latter version includes subheads in the subsections. These are excluded here.

97. "Nongmin wenti jueyian." The translation here is based on that in Brandt, Schwartz, and Fairbank, A Documentary History, pp. 156-65. This is taken from the mimeographed pamphlet Zhongguo gongchandang diliuci daibiao dahui jueyian. This text has been checked against that in the Secretariat of the CCP CC (ed.), Liuda yilai, vol. 1, pp. 39-45.

100. Guomindang gaizu pai. This organization within the GMD grew out of the tensions between Chiang Kai-shek and Wang Jingwei. Its main figure was one of the founders of the CCP, Chen Gongbo. It was formally founded in November 1928 with the objective of rewriting the GMD's party program. In the elections at the GMD Enlarged Congress of August 1930 (after Wang Jingwei, Yan Xishan, and Feng Yuxiang had allied against Chiang Kai-shek), members of the group formed the majority in the central organs. Early in 1931, it was disbanded.

101. This group had been founded by GMD-left members such as Deng Yanda and CCP member Tan Pingshan. Tan had been expelled from the CCP in November 1927.

102. This letter was originally published in Pravda on 29 December 1929.

103. This refers to the Chinese Eastern Railway "crisis" of 1929. On 27 May 1929, the GMD regime conducted widespread raids on Soviet consulates along the strategic Chinese Eastern Railway. A Soviet note of protest was followed by the Chinese seizing of the railway and the arrest and deportation of a number of Soviet officials. On 13 July, the Soviet Union severed diplomatic relations with the Chinese government. The Chinese government followed suit on 20 July. Hostilities broke out between the Soviet forces in the Far East and those under the command of Zhang Xueliang. In November 1929 Soviet forces struck some 125 miles into Chinese territory. On 22 December, a settlement was reached that restored the status quo ante. Full diplomatic relations were restored in 1932.

104. Conflicts over the leadership of the nationalist movement led to clashes in north China during October–November 1929 between Chiang and Feng. Chiang defeated Feng but the latter joined up with Yan Xishan, Wang Jingwei, and the Guangxi warlords to present Chiang with a more formidable challenge in mid-1930.

105. The letter on the trade union question presumably refers to that sent by the Political Secretariat of the ECCI on 30 August 1929. It is reprinted in the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 5, pp. 744–48.

107. This probably refers to the letter sent by Chen Duxiu to CC members on 8 August 1929. For a copy of the letter see the Central Party Archives (ed.), Zhonggong zhongyang wenjian xuanji, vol. 5, pp. 724–43.

110. The letter is signed by eighty-two people, including Chen Duxiu and Peng Shuzhi.

111. “Xin de geming gaochao yu yi huo ji sheng de shouxian shengli” was passed at a meeting of the Politburo on 11 June 1930 as a resolution on the current political tasks. It is seen as the main expression of Li Lisan’s views. It was published in Hongqi (Red Flag), no. 121 (19 July 1930): 1–4.

112. “Zhongguo wenti jueyan” was the Comintern’s response to the Li Lisan line. It was originally published in Shihua (True Words), no. 1 (30 October 1930): 2–5. It was republished in Hongse wenxian (Red Documents), pp. 346–61. A full translation can be found in Pak, Documents of the Chinese Communist Party, pp. 567–80.

113. “Zhonggong sanzong quanhuì guanyu zhengzhi qingkuang he dang de renwu yijuean” was adopted in September 1930 at the Third Plenum of the Sixth CC held in Shanghai. The resolution is translated from the version in the Secretariat of the CCP CC (ed.), Liuda yilai, vol. 1, pp. 93–106.

114. See above, Doc. C.19.

115. On 27 July 1930, Peng Dehuai’s troops took Changsha but were only able to hold it for seven days. A second attack took place between 24 August and 12 September.

116. At the Second Plenum, the Jiangsu Provincial Party Committee was disbanded because of the “political mistakes” it was said to have committed in opposing the Party Center.

117. D. Manuïlsky was a central figure in Comintern affairs from 1929 to 1933, when he often intervened at enlarged plenums of the ECCI on behalf of Stalin. At the ECCI’s Seventh Enlarged Plenum held in November–December 1926 he became a member of the Comintern’s Political Secretariat. It was this Plenum that marked Zinoviev’s demise. Together with Zhdanov he signed the May 1943 order dissolving the Comintern.

This pamphlet is dated January 1931 and was issued shortly after the Plenum. However, the document produced in Liuda yilai is dated December 1930. This suggests that the document was drafted and possi-

This would not be surprising as it follows the guidelines of the Comintern directive on the question of Li Lisan that was received on 16 November 1930. The Rise and Fall of the Soviet Movement in Central China, 1931–January 1935

In November 1930, Chiang Kai-shek was victorious in the war with Feng Yuxiang and Yan Xishan.¹ Having resolved this problem, Chiang was able to turn his attention to central China, where the Communists had been able to build up their strength in the rural base areas. The decision was made to launch a campaign to suppress the communist movement. However, rather than direct the campaign himself, Chiang, for political considerations, appointed the governors of the relevant provinces (Jiangxi, Anhui, Hunan, and Hubei) to be concurrently in charge of their own anticommunist activities.

By late 1930, three major communist strongholds existed in the rural areas of central China. These major bases were: the Jiangxi Central Soviet, the E-Yu-Wan Soviet (Hubei-Henan-Anhui), and the Xiang-Exi Soviet (West Hunan–Hubei). They were located to the south, north, and west, respectively, of the cosmopolitan city of Wuhan. In an attempt to bring order to the scattered base areas, it was decided to convene the First All-China Congress of Soviets in November 1930. However, the date was changed to February 1931 and eventually postponed again until November 1931. The November 1931 formal announcement of the existence of a Chinese soviet republic at Ruijin, Jiangxi, marked an important step in the recognition that the dominant strength of the CCP lay in the rural base areas rather than with the Party Center in urban Shanghai. The collapse of legal communism in mid-1927, and the failure to find an alternative urban-based strategy, meant that the real strength of the CCP was in the soviets.

The disputes in the Party Center and the collapse of the Li Lisan line afforded the Red Armies a high degree of autonomy to manage their own affairs in the base areas. The involvement of Chiang Kai-shek in the conflict with Feng and Yan had provided the Red Armies with a much-needed chance to consolidate the areas under their control. However, this was to change very quickly. In October 1930 the GMD launched the first of five “suppression” campaigns intended to annihilate the communist strongholds. This caused the Red Armies to go on the defensive. The ability to resist these suppression campaigns was undermined by intraparty struggles that eroded unity in the face of a common enemy.

(a) The Jiangxi Soviet—Resistance to the GMD and Suppression of the Futian “Rebels”

In the summer of 1930, retreating from the Changsha expedition, Mao led the First Front Army back to southwest Jiangxi. At the end of October, a joint conference of the Front Committee of the Red Army and the Action Committee of Jiangxi Province was held at Luofang to devise a suitable strategy to deal with the GMD attack. A document drafted by Mao Zedong in December 1930 outlining the favorable factors facing the base area clearly mapped out the new strategy (Doc. D.1). The document laid down two fundamental features that were to characterize Mao's general military strategy during the Jiangxi Soviet period. First, Soviet territory was to be abandoned to lure the enemy deep into the base area, where the Red Army enjoyed such favorable conditions as support from the local peasantry and familiarity with the terrain. Second, mobile warfare was to be employed. Overwhelming force would be gathered together to destroy the enemy, leaving what remained to be picked off bit by bit. The document showed a marked divergence from the radical spirit of Li Lisan's policy. Despite references to the world revolutionary situation and attempts to dress the document in Marxist garb, it remained a practical response to concrete conditions.

While the party leadership was being reshuffled in the wake of the Li Lisan affair, contradictions between Mao's regular Red Army and other local communist forces began to intensify. Mao used the Jiangxi Soviet government to begin a purge of the Jiangxi Action Committee, which had been created just before the July 1930 offensive. Mao's opponents were accused of being members of a nationalist secret organization known as the "A.B. League" (Anti-Bolshevik League) and of being guilty of "liquidationist" tendencies. In response to the ensuing purge, a local Red Army battalion rebelled against Mao and was subsequently massacred at Futian in early December 1930. Mao's claims that the local Communists were anti-Bolsheviks and/or "liquidationists" were unfounded, as were the Futian rebels' counter claims that Mao intended to arrest Zhu De and Peng Dehuai and then surrender to the GMD army.² What the Futian Incident does demonstrate is the friction that existed between the newly arrived Red Army and local forces. Despite the rebels' claims and despite Zhu De's and Peng Dehuai's different political characters and approaches, the two, together with Huang Gonglue, expressed their unequivocal support of Mao. They vindicated his position vis-à-vis pressure from the GMD and the challenge from the local forces. The latter further criticized the "rebels" for their stand on land policy and military strategy. The three leaders criticized them for opposing equal land redistribution. Militarily, they had opposed Mao's strategy of luring the enemy into the red areas and then defeating them through guerrilla warfare and proposed a swift action and decisive war on enemy territory.³

The decisive battles of the First Suppression Campaign were fought primarily between the Jiangxi Provincial Army and the Red Army at the end of December 1930. After the GMD allied forces lost one and a half divisions, the campaign was called off. Because of the slow transportation of troops from the north, the Second Suppression Campaign did not begin until May 1931. Its importance is shown by the fact that Chiang Kai-shek appointed his trusted lieutenant General He Yingqin commander-in-chief. Again the campaign resulted in a defeat for the GMD forces, with two divisions effectively destroyed and another three badly bloodied.

The communist victory in these two campaigns appeared to vindicate Mao's strategy of luring in the enemy troops and then destroying them one by one. This enhanced Mao's position within the Red Army and among the other local communist forces. This, in turn, contributed to the pacification of the Futian rebels and helped with the consolidation of the Jiangxi base. Mao's total authority in the First Front Army is evident from the records of the meetings of the General Front Committee. All the meetings were chaired by Mao himself.⁴ Mao's dominance was confirmed at the Kangdu meeting of the General Front Committee held on 22 June 1931 (Doc. D.2). The meeting also displayed Mao's resourceful and calculating manner in dealing with both the enemy and those in the area under his control. The overriding objective was to build up military strength and political power. Tactics were to serve these purposes and were to be flexible. On the question of the GMD, Mao proposed that the Red Army be deployed in remote places so that Chiang Kai-shek's attention would not be aroused. As a result, Chiang would turn to fight the Guangdong Army. A revealing passage indicates how Mao felt opponents within the revolutionary ranks should be dealt with. Referring to the purge of the leader of a local peasant association who had resisted Mao's troops, he stated:

It was right to capture Hu Zhusheng, but technically speaking it was not so skillful. Before striking down a leader of the masses, we should find another one for them even if he is an A.B. League member. Afterward we can attack the leaders of the A.B. League. Nanfeng is without a leader. If it is necessary to arrest Hu Zhusheng, we must first disarm [the troops in] Nanfeng, detain them in great secrecy, and move them at night.

In the spring of 1931, the Party Center in Shanghai was still recovering from the problems created by Li Lisan, and divisions persisted. This weakened party authority and facilitated the GMD's apprehension of key communist members. Gu Shunzhang, the head of the CCP secret service, and Xiang Zhongfa, the CCP general secretary, were among the many arrested in 1931. Xiang was executed and Gu decided to collaborate with the GMD, thus endangering the entire party structure in central and east China. Almost all the underground branches of the CCP were exposed, and party work was greatly jeopardized. To a degree, the upsurge of the soviet movement and the escalation of the military struggle in the countryside had also contributed to the crackdown on the Party Center in Shanghai. For example, the Nanjing government had promulgated martial law, making all "leftist activities" in the major cities extremely difficult.

The Party Center in Shanghai was reduced to little more than a liaison organization relaying instructions from the Comintern to the soviets. Indeed, it appears that in early 1931 the Comintern made the suggestion that the Party Center consider a move to the rural soviets.⁵ While the Party Center became more involved in the work of the soviets, transferring key personnel, it was not until early 1933 that Bo Gu and the Party Center arrived at the Central Soviet.⁶ The conditions under which the Party Center began its move to the soviets meant that in reality legitimate leadership of the revolutionary movement had passed to the soviets. However, the process inevitably produced conflicts and frictions. Yet this is not to say that Mao and his supporters were an immediate conscious target of the “returned students” who dominated the Party Center when it began its transfer to the Jiangxi Soviet.

In formal terms, the soviets and the Red Army had been established under the leadership of the Party Center. Thus it was seen as natural that Party Center cadres would take over leading functions on their arrival. Lacking good connections in the area, they sought to consolidate their positions by applying ideological standards to judge and purge the soviet and Red Army leaders. In their eyes, many of the local leaders had committed errors such as abuse of power, expropriation of wealth, licentious behavior, etc. The “revolutionary idealism” represented by the Party Center was in sharp conflict with the political realism represented by the soviet and Red Army cadres. In this context, the Futian Incident thus became an issue in the readjustment of the relationships between the Party Center and Mao Zedong and the leaders of the Jiangxi Soviet.

At the CC’s Fourth Plenum (January 1931), the Comintern representative, Pavel Mif, had suggested that Zhou Enlai and some other veteran cadres move to the rural soviets. As a result, in the same month the Central Soviet Bureau was established with Zhou Enlai as its secretary.⁷ However, Zhou was unable to leave Shanghai immediately, and Xiang Ying went in his place to the Jiangxi Soviet as acting secretary. Formally, this put Mao under Xiang’s leadership. But partly because of the general mood against the Li Lisan line, in which Xiang had played an active role, and partly because of the Red Army victory in the First Anti-CCP Suppression Campaign, Xiang had to acknowledge Mao’s position on the Futian Incident. Nevertheless, Mao was mildly rebuked for labeling all participants in the incident as “A.B. elements” or “liquidationists.”⁸ Furthermore, the creation of the Central Bureau also gave Mao an opportunity to increase his influence from the local to the national level within the CCP.

In April 1931, a Party Center delegation arrived at the Jiangxi Soviet to attend an enlarged CCP congress. After the congress, the three delegates, Ren Bishi, Gu Zuolin, and Wang Jiaxiang, remained in Jiangxi, joining the Central Soviet Bureau. These newcomers, with little experience of military affairs, remained in the red capital of Ruijin. The first target of their criticisms was not Mao, who was with the Red Army at the front, but Xiang Ying, who was at the rear running the party and soviet headquarters. The Central Bureau under Xiang’s leadership was bitterly criticized for following a “reconciliationist line” and displaying a “rightist tendency” and for its resolution on the Futian Incident that had failed to recognize the incident as a “counterrevolutionary rebellion” (Doc. D.3). Ironically, this conflict led Mao to replace Xiang as the acting secretary of the Central Soviet Bureau. This was in May 1931, and in August, during Chiang Kai-shek’s Third Suppression Campaign, Mao was made secretary.⁹

It took a few months before the new Party Center commissioners realized that Mao, not Xiang, was the real powerholder and hence the chief challenger to their authority. At the Gannan Conference of November 1931, the verdict on the Futian Incident was altered.¹⁰ The emphasis was placed on Mao's harshness in handling the Incident rather than on the "crimes" of the Futian rebels. Mao lost his dominant position in the party and army and was transferred to work in the soviet government. Obviously such decisions on the Futian Incident had not so much to do with the Incident itself as with the subtly changing relationship between Mao and the Party Center commissioners.

In December 1931, Zhou Enlai arrived in the Jiangxi Soviet and formally assumed the position of secretary of the Central Soviet Bureau.¹¹ Zhou's arrival brought Mao into contact with a man who had not only a high position but also rich military and political experience. However, Zhou recognized a value in Mao and had no intention of destroying him completely so long as Mao's influence and experience remained useful to the communist cause. However, Mao's preeminent position in the soviet was now eroded.

(b) The Establishment of the E-Yu-Wan and Xiang-Exi Soviets

In early 1930, the Red Army troops in the E-Yu-Wan Soviet (Hubei-Henan-Anhui) included three divisions of only 2,000 men, and it did not attract much attention from the Party Center under Li Lisan. This was provident for them as they received no hard and fast orders from the Party Center to attack the large cities. By late 1930, the E-Yu-Wan Red Army had expanded to some 6,000 soldiers. After the CC's Third Plenum (September 1930), Zeng Zhongsheng was appointed secretary of the E-Yu-Wan CCP Committee. Zeng tried to correct the obvious mistakes of the Li Lisan policy and was later criticized for carrying out a "reconciliationist line." Under his leadership, the Fourth Red Army succeeded in breaking two suppression campaigns of the GMD troops in Anhui, and the army developed to a strength of 15,000. This rapid growth of the Fourth Army and the base area now attracted the attention of the Party Center. In April 1931, Zhang Guotao, Shen Zemin, and Chen Changhao were dispatched there. One month later, Zhang Guotao proclaimed the establishment of the E-Yu-Wan Subbureau of the CCP CC with Zhang himself as secretary. The former E-Yu-Wan CCP Central Committee was abolished, and Zeng Zhongsheng lost his leadership position. Zeng was assigned to be the temporary political commissar of the Fourth Front Army, where he carried out his activities in the name of the "new line" of the Comintern and the Party Center. Zhang's speech to the First Conference of the E-Yu-Wan Subbureau called for the new policy of the CCP Fourth Plenum to be carried out and for the mistakes of the incumbent E-Yu-Wan leaders to be corrected is (Doc. D.4).¹²

In the autumn of 1931, the GMD began its Third Suppression Campaign against the Jiangxi Central Soviet, and this provided the E-Yu-Wan Soviet with a good opportunity for expansion. However, differences of opinion emerged over the question of military operations between the Fourth Front Army and the CCP Subbureau. With the support of the Party Center, Chen Changhao set out to the front and took over Zeng Zhongsheng's position as political commissar of the Fourth Army. A major anticounterrevolutionary movement in the army and the soviet followed. Zhang Guotao acknowledged that some 600 men were arrested. However, in a speech by Chen Changhao to the cadets of the Peng-Yang Military and Political Academy, he stated that the number of people arrested and executed was far higher (Doc. D.5). The widespread purge followed what was said to be a planned uprising to start on 15 September 1931 at Mabu, Anhui. As with the Futian Incident, leadership of the plot was said to be in the hands of Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party.

There was no real foundation for such accusations and, fortunately, the purge did not affect the fighting capacity of the Fourth Front Army. In late 1931 and early 1932, the Fourth Front Army successfully conducted the battles of Huang'an, Shangcheng, and Sujiafu and broke up the Third Suppression Campaign. The Fourth Front Army grew to be 30,000 strong.

By contrast with E-Yu-Wan, the Red Army in the Xiang-Exi Soviet (West Hunan and Hubei) was badly affected by the Li Lisan line in the autumn and winter of 1930. The recovery of the Third Army and its growth can be traced to the GMD's engagement with the First Front Army in the Jiangxi Soviet and with the Fourth Front Army in the E-Yu-Wan Soviet rather than to the change in its leadership. In April 1931, Xia Xi and Xu Xigen arrived as the representatives of the Party Center and, as in the other two areas, began to find fault in the current leadership. In the name of the Xiang-Exi CCP Committee, a resolution was passed condemning Deng Zhongxia, the political commissar of the Third Front Army, presumably for his execution of the Li Lisan policy (Doc. D.6).

From late 1931 until early 1932, the Xiang-Exi Soviet also enjoyed a period of rapid expansion. Under the political leadership of Xia Xi and Guan Xiangying and the military command of He Long and Duan Dechang, the Communists managed to create a large V-shaped area of influence running from south to north and cutting through Hubei Province. In early 1932, the soviet covered about twenty counties, and the Red Army comprised three regular divisions with a total of 15,000 soldiers.

(c) The First All-China Soviet Congress—November 1931— Effective Recognition of Jiangxi as the Revolutionary Center

In the wake of the military victory and territorial expansion in Jiangxi and the other soviets, the First All-China Soviet Congress was convened in Ruijin from 7 to 20 November 1931. The Congress founded the Chinese Soviet Republic as a national regime and established separate state and military structures to operate at the national level. While Mao lost direct control over the military, he was appointed to the newly created post of chair of the soviet government. Xiang Ying and Zhang Guotao were appointed vice-chairmen. Zhu De was made chair of the newly created Central Revolutionary Military Commission, with Peng Dehuai and Wang Jiaxiang as the vice-chairmen.¹³

The Congress also adopted a Constitution for the Soviet Republic (Doc. D.7) and various resolutions, the most important of which was the Soviet Land Law (Doc. D.8). The Constitution officially designated the Soviet Republic a “democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry,” in accordance with Lenin’s formulation of 1905. However, in reality there was no pretense that the Soviet was anything other than a communist one-party dictatorship. Indeed, in the remote rural area there were no industrial workers, the proletariat consisted almost entirely of village artisans, handicraftsmen, and farm laborers.¹⁴ This notwithstanding, the Constitution acknowledged that “only the proletariat can lead the broad masses to socialism,” and thus they were to have extra representation in the Soviet.

While the land law called for confiscation, without compensation, of land belonging to “feudal lords and landlords, militarists and village bosses, gentry, and other big private landowners,” it was significantly more liberal than previous policy. Previous law had alienated the middle peasants, who were particularly frustrated by the clause forbidding the sale of property. Now, middle peasants could be exempted from the land distribution program if the “majority” of them so desired. Furthermore, there was no mention of land nationalization. Nor was any mention made of collectivization. In a conference of soviet delegates convened in Shanghai in May 1930 under the more radical atmosphere of the Li Lisan line, collectivization had been authorized. The first draft of the Land Law of 1931 had actually included a clause allowing for voluntary collectivization.¹⁵

By the end of 1931, the situation looked good for the communist movement. They had beaten off three GMD suppression campaigns, and the Congress had given them a framework of rule. Optimism was fueled further by the GMD’s preoccupation with the invasion of the Japanese army in Manchuria and by the Ningdu revolt in which an entire GMD army corps of 20,000 went over to the communist side. In the new circumstances, the Comintern sent a telegram to the CCP that was received on 29 December 1931 calling for a “national revolutionary war to oppose Japanese imperialists and all other imperialists.” The first step was to launch a “popular revolution to overthrow the GMD.”¹⁶ As a result, on 9 January 1932, the CCP Party Center passed a resolution urging an “initial victory in one or more provinces” (Doc. D.9). The title of the resolution shows the clear parallel with the radical policy of Li Lisan. The Central Soviet Bureau in Jiangxi accordingly adopted a “positive and offensive line” and launched an attack on the city of Ganzhou, a strategic location in southern Jiangxi. Ganzhou was defended by only one GMD brigade, and the Communists attacked with Peng Dehuai’s regular Red Army and Chen Yi’s local troops, some 30,000 soldiers. Instead of capturing Ganzhou, the Red Army lost an entire division and in March was forced to withdraw.

After the failure at Ganzhou, Mao was rehabilitated in March as the supervisor of the First Army Corps and in August 1932 as general political commissar of the First Front Army. However, Mao’s autocratic control of the Red Army troops at his disposal and his arrogant attitude toward party authority made him the focus of criticism at the Ningdu Conference of the Central Soviet Bureau in October 1932. He was criticized by virtually all the participants, especially Xiang Ying and Ren Bishi. Consequently, Mao was removed from the front and direct contact with the Red Army and was posted to the rear. The First Front Army was put under the collective leadership of Zhou Enlai, Zhu De, Wang Jiaxiang, and Liu Bochong and was brought under tighter party control.¹⁷

(d) The Loss of the E-Yu-Wan and Xiang-Exi Soviets

GMD attention had been diverted during the period September 1931 to April 1932 because of the problems caused by the Japanese intrusions into Manchuria and Shanghai. Once a truce was reached in May 1932, Chiang Kai-shek set up the General Headquarters for the Fourth Anticommunist Suppression Campaign. Chiang himself assumed command of the headquarters in Wuhan. Chiang's general plan was first to attack the E-Yu-Wan and Xiang-Exi Soviets and then shift the attack to the Jiangxi Central Soviet. He had some half a million troops at his disposal.

The Fourth Front Army of the E-Yu-Wan Base Area followed its previous strategy, leaving the Twenty-fifth Army to defend the eastern front while positioning the main force of the Fourth Army in the west poised for attack. On this occasion, however, the strength of the enemy was too great. In the battles fought between July and September 1932, the GMD and the Fourth Front Army suffered similar losses. While the GMD could afford such losses, they proved fatal to the Communists. The Fourth Front Army had to abandon the E-Yu-Wan Base Area and withdraw westward. After three months of flight, it arrived in north Sichuan. Its strength had been reduced to a mere 15,000. On 29 December 1932, the Revolutionary Committee of the Sichuan-Shaanxi Base Area was founded.

The backward economic conditions and the division of the local military forces, the result of decades of conflicts among the Sichuan warlords, were beneficial to the Fourth Front Army, and it experienced a rapid growth in strength during the following two years. Yet the Communists had to change their former attitudes to survive in this different environment. On arriving, the Fourth Front Army issued a number of propaganda tracts, the tone, language, and contents of which were designed to appeal to the local peasantry. In fact, land confiscation and redistribution were stricter and harsher than in the Jiangxi Central Soviet. Able-bodied peasants were drafted into the Red Army while youngsters were organized into Red Guards. Such radical measures were considered necessary for consolidating communist power. They arose from the Fourth Front Army's own practical needs and had little to do with the Party Center's mandate. Zhang Guotao's 1934 speech shows the same concerns for survival and development (Doc. D.10), and his citations concerning the international and domestic situations had less to do with Marxist doctrines than with the practical task of cheering up his audience.¹⁸ In addition, Zhang's bragging about the size and power of the Party Center and Jiangxi was designed both to boost flagging morale and to increase his own prestige. At the same time, the picture he painted of the Red Army in the Jiangxi Soviet must have seemed awesome to his men in the Fourth Front Army.

The decision to leave the E-Yu-Wan Base Area and engage in what was dubbed the “western flight” were criticized by the Party Center in March 1933.¹⁹ However, unlike the later flight from the Jiangxi Soviet, this did not result in a change of leadership, and the Party Center was careful not to apportion too much blame to Zhang Guotao.

The Xiang-Exi Soviet was also unable to withstand the pressure of the GMD troops. The Soviet leadership decided to station the major force of the Third Front Army outside the base for defense, leaving only a rump inside. In October 1932, the army was forced to leave Hubei and flee north. Taking a two-month detour, it returned to the Hunan-Hubei border where He Long had formed a base area in the late 1920s. He Long’s return to an old area where he could rely on former acquaintances helped the Third Front Army to survive temporarily. However, chances for rapid expansion were slim because it would require a new location with fresh supplies of material and personnel willing to take a risk. Yet the Hunan-Hubei Border Area was already exhausted both physically and mentally from the incessant communist revolution and war. In June 1933 the Third Front Army had to move on again. After roaming along the Hunan-Sichuan border for several months, it moved to northeast Guizhou in January 1934. Its strength had dwindled to only 3,000 troops.

The constant roaming and the difficult situation faced by He Long and the Third Army caused it to abandon open espousal of its revolutionary views and appeal to the local peasant rebels (see, for example, Doc. D.11). The revolutionary Military Affairs Committee of the new border region tried in this open letter to persuade the local peasants, organized as the “Celestial Soldiers,” that their cause was essentially the same. The attacks by the soldiers on exorbitant taxes and levies were interpreted as a primitive revolutionary struggle.

In June 1934, a party conference was convened at Fengxianxi, a village on the Hunan-Guizhou border. The conference corrected the former radical policies, stopped the anticounterrevolutionary measures, and adopted more opportune policies. On 21 and 22 July, a soviet congress was convened at which a complete set of records was kept. These records show the deviation of this small communist group from the Party Center’s line at this time (Doc. D.12). The Third Army’s situation caused it to call for an alliance with the native peasant rebels, the “celestial soldiers,” and the Miao tribes. Further calls were made for the protection of middle peasants and small merchants. The Third Army was able to found a new base on the Hunan-Hubei-Sichuan and Guizhou borders, where it was able to survive until it was reunited with the Sixth Army Corps in October 1934.

(e) The Jiangxi Soviet Under the Fourth and Fifth Suppression Campaigns

The GMD Suppression Campaign reached the Jiangxi Soviet in January 1933 just as the remainder of the Party Center headed by Bo Gu was moving in. The Party Center called for a more positive military policy and demanded that the General Headquarters of the Red Army besiege and capture the city of Nanfeng. This caused disagreements between Zhou Enlai and his army commanders at the front and Bo Gu and his Party Center leaders at Ruijin in the rear. The Party Center rejected Zhou's calls for a withdrawal, but after an unsuccessful attack on the city lasting for a few weeks, the Red Army had to abandon its attempt to take Nanfeng.

The first phase of the Fourth Suppression Campaign witnessed a few clashes on the northwest border of the Jiangxi Soviet in February 1933. The Red Army slowly retreated into the Lichuan area. In late February, two GMD divisions were ambushed by three Red Army corps at Yihuang. In two days of fighting, two GMD divisions were annihilated. After such losses, it was impossible for the GMD to continue with the campaign, and at the end of March it was called off. Since all the battles had been fought around the perimeter of the base area, the Party Center was able to declare victory for its new strategy. It appeared that the Red Army did not have to use the tactic of yielding up territory to draw the enemy deep inside. By contrast, the Red Army could engage and destroy the enemy outside its gates. The Party Center thus interpreted the victory as a justification for its more aggressive policies.

In October 1933, the GMD launched its Fifth Suppression Campaign. This campaign was bolder and larger in scale. According to communist claims, the GMD committed some one million troops. Chiang Kai-shek assumed personal command of the Nanchang Field Headquarters. He adopted a new strategy for the campaign, which he conceptualized as "strategic offense plus tactical defense." The keys to this strategy were the "blockhouse" and "highway" policies. Whenever his troops reached a new place, they would construct strongholds, or blockhouses, covering all strategic points. Then, highways would be laid to link the blockhouses one to another and also to link them with the reserve forces in the rear. The troops would not rush ahead to seize a new vantage point before securing the present one. Slowly this noose around the base area was to be tightened, strangling the communist forces.

This new, more thoughtful, campaign came at a bad time for the communists. The party was engaged in another inner-party struggle, usually referred to as the anti-Luo Ming line, as well as the mass movement of land investigation. While the 1933 anti-Luo Ming movement at the elite levels and the land investigation movement at the base levels might have temporarily increased the authority of the Party Center and created a militant mood, they did not create a long-term accord and stable environment that could serve as a basis for resisting the GMD's Fifth Suppression Campaign.

The attacks on Luo Ming were intended by the Party Center to strengthen the resolve of party cadres in the face of the GMD attacks. Panic and fear had been growing in CCP ranks, and some commanders were refusing orders to engage the enemy. Luo Ming had been acting secretary of the Fujian CCP Committee since March 1932. At an early stage of the GMD's Fourth Suppression Campaign, Luo expressed his opinions on the current situation and the party's work in two articles (one is included here as Doc. D.13). The repeated GMD attacks had, according to Luo, produced an atmosphere of panic and fatigue in west Fujian. He blamed the party military leadership for being too mechanistic; implementing the same plan in different counties and districts was inappropriate. In other words, Luo opposed the Party Center's call for an "all-around offensive strategy" and "all-out military recruitment." In its place, Luo argued for the adoption of flexible military measures tailored to suit the varying conditions. The local Red Armies and the new soviet bases, such as those in west Fujian, should implement policies different from those of the Party Center. For example, Luo did not think that he could or should fulfill the Red Army recruitment assignment in his jurisdiction.

Luo was immediately attacked by the Party Center. It adopted a critical resolution on 15 February 1933, marking the beginning of the anti-Luo Ming movement (Doc. D.14). A study of Luo's views and the resolution clearly shows that Luo expressed his opinions from a local point of view and had no clear intention of challenging the general political and military line of the Party Center. However, it served the Party Center's interests to interpret it as just such an attack on its General Line.

As noted, defeat of the GMD's Fourth Suppression Campaign strengthened the political position of Bo Gu and the Party Center. With the campaign over, the Party Center moved to consolidate its position within the party by attacking its opponents. The attacks on Luo Ming were felt in the Jiangxi CCP apparatus where Deng Xiaoping, Mao Zetan, Xie Weizun, and Gu Bai were picked out as targets for attack because of their alleged sympathy with the Luo Ming line and their "factional activities." In the central soviet government, Deng Zihui and He Shuheng were criticized for their pessimism, and in the Red Army, Tan Zhenlin and Xiao Jinguang were punished for their defeatism.

The Land Investigation Movement formally launched on 1 June 1933 was an important issue in the Jiangxi Soviet during 1933-34 (Doc. D.15). With the movement, the Communists sought to use the land question to create a favorable revolutionary atmosphere that would serve their political and military purposes. Land distribution, investigation, and redistribution were to incite the peasants to join, or at least support, the Communists in the revolutionary war. However, constant changes of landownership caused social and economic problems within the base area, and excesses would often occur. This required periodic retrenchment and the adoption of a mild or "antileftist" policy. Thus, in the period from June to September 1933 the land investigation movement was pursued with a vengeance, and many "middle peasants" were classified as "landlords." From October to December, the policy was moderated, and many of the "landlords" were reclassified as "middle peasants." January and February 1934 were marked by another more radical phase with an anti-rich peasant policy. Only the deteriorating military situation finally brought these oscillations to an end.

Initially, in October–November 1933, the engagements in the Fifth Suppression Campaign around Lichuan, in the northeast of the Jiangxi Soviet, resulted in a stalemate. On 20 November, a large-scale army revolt within the GMD ranks broke out in Fujian.²⁰ It was led by the commanders of the Nineteenth Route Army. They repudiated the GMD and declared their intention to move closer to the CCP and Soviet Russia. Shocked by these events, Chiang Kai-shek quickly transferred his troops on the northern front to deal with the Fujian rebels, thus leaving the Fifth Suppression Campaign dormant for a couple of months.

In October 1933 before the start of the revolt, the commanders in Fujian appealed to the Red Army for an alliance. After several days of secret negotiations between Zhou Enlai and Pan Hannian, representing the soviet government and the Red Army, and Xu Hongming on behalf of the Fujian People's Government and the Nineteenth Route Army, a preliminary agreement was signed on 26 October 1933 (Doc. D.16). While militarily the agreement only called for a simple truce between the two sides, economically and politically the Communists made a number of demands on the Fujian rebels. Indeed, over the next month Bo Gu and the Party Center were critical of the rebels for not fulfilling their "promises."

In late December, the loosely knit Fujian People's Government rapidly collapsed as the GMD troops drove into the province. Mao Zedong saw the events as providing a chance to step up military activities not to save the rebels but to begin a strategic offensive from northeast Jiangxi to Zhejiang Province. The Party Center also shifted its position. Consultations with the Comintern and the Shanghai Sub-bureau had led to the adoption of an even more antagonistic attitude toward the Fujian government (Doc. D.17). The Communists had lost a chance to win over Nationalist troops during the Fifth Suppression Campaign and had merely succeeded in winning one month of free time. This month they used to convene two national conferences to congratulate themselves on their successes and to continue the struggle for power and influence within the CCP, the soviet government, and the Red Army.

From 15 to 18 January 1934, the Fifth Plenum of the Sixth CC was convened at Ruijin and was attended by full and alternate CC members and by some delegates from provincial party committees. Given the pressing situation brought about by the GMD Fifth Suppression Campaign, Bo Gu's political report, which was accepted as the Plenum's resolution, is a good example of what Mao Zedong would term benben zhuyi ("bookism")—full of fine words but inappropriate to the real situation (Doc. D.18). According to the report, the revolutionary situation at home and abroad was excellent, and it deemed the policies of the Comintern and the CCP infallible. The party's major task was simply to continue the fight against the "right opportunists" who refused to see this excellent situation. Astonishingly, there was no formal report on military affairs at the Fifth Plenum.²¹ While clearly there was conflict between Mao and the Party Center, Mao was not dropped from the Politburo as many studies have suggested.²² was convened at Ruijin from 22 January to 1 February 1934. The Congress provided a chance for the regime to show off. A giant auditorium was constructed, and the ceremonies included a military parade and gunshot salute. As the “Organic Law of the Central Soviet Republic” (Doc. D.19) shows, no effort was spared to portray the soviet as a formal, national state rather than as a shaky local rebellious base area. This aspiration to statehood was reflected in the election once again of a full complement of people’s commissariats, including one for foreign affairs (headed by Wang Jiaxiang). Furthermore, the Congress proposed that all the soviet bases be designated as provinces. Their size hardly warranted such a description, let alone the fact that they were small islands in a large sea of GMD-controlled waters. As for the Fifth Suppression Campaign, the Congress called for the Red Army to adopt positional defense as its central task and basic strategy.

The most important speech to the Congress was delivered by Mao Zedong on behalf of the CEC and the Council of People’s Commissars. In broad terms, the speech follows the line laid down at the Fifth Plenum, an assessment that stands in stark contrast to the judgment sponsored by Mao in the 1945 Resolution on Party History (see Doc. G.25). In 1945, Mao criticized the Fifth Plenum for its bad judgment of the current situation. In 1934, Mao’s speech supported the “Russian returned students’” contention that currently the crucial factor in the Chinese revolution was the life-and-death struggle between revolution and counterrevolution. Again this counters Mao’s 1945 judgment that they had ignored the needs of the intermediate classes.²³ However, Mao did stress that the socialist revolution could not be achieved until the bourgeois democratic revolution was completed throughout China. This was in contrast to the views of the “Russian returned students.”²⁴

Finally, the Congress elected a new CEC of 175 members, which in turn elected a Presidium of seventeen members. Apart from Mao Zedong, the Presidium included Zhang Wentian and Bo Gu. Mao Zedong was reelected chair of the CEC, with Zhang Guotao and Xiang Ying as vice-chairmen. Zhang Wentian took over as the head of the Council of People’s Commissars.

On balance, these two meetings did little to resolve the fundamental problems facing the CCP. What would decide the life and death of the movement was the Fifth Suppression Campaign, and neither meeting had much impact on this. Seen in terms of the military situation, the two meetings had simply wasted much-needed time without providing any constructive views on how to proceed. In terms of intraparty struggle the results were ambiguous. Generally, the two meetings are seen in terms of an advance by Bo Gu and his supporters and a decline in Mao’s fortunes.²⁵ Clearly, politically and, to a lesser extent, organizationally Bo Gu and his followers had asserted their leadership through the two meetings. While Mao and his supporters suffered a decline in influence, they maintained important footholds within the administrative hierarchy. Indeed, in retrospect it was a good time not to be in control of the decision-making apparatus. Waller’s interpretation of the Second Congress as a personal failure for Mao is debatable. Mao had played a dominant role throughout the Congress: he opened the Congress on 22 January, on 24–25

January he delivered the main speech, he replied to comments on his speech on 27 January, and on 1 February he announced the closure of the Congress. In the eyes of many, Mao was identified with the one tangible achievement of the communist movement—the soviet.²⁶

In October 1933, the Comintern military advisor Otto Braun had arrived in Ruijin. Before then, Bo Gu had to rely on Zhou Enlai for advice on military affairs, but now he came to rely on Braun, a man well versed in the ways of modern warfare. Defense of the soviet was now the main priority, and Braun took over effective control of marshaling the defenses and operating what Mao later criticized as the “pure defensive line.” Braun’s tactic was what was referred to as the “short, swift thrust.” After two months of face-to-face confrontation with the GMD, the Red Army had been unable to win a single decisive victory.

The GMD followed its patient strategy, not making any rash pursuits of the Red Army forces. Along the northern front they developed their blockhouses and road networks and began to press slowly but steadily southward. By April 1934, they were approaching Guangchang, a strategic locality only twenty miles to the north of Ruijin, the red capital. Bo Gu took on the position of political commissar of the headquarters at Guangchang, thus removing Zhou Enlai from control and placing it effectively in the hands of Braun. Braun was given the chance to apply his tactics. While defending the soviet, the Red Army would make short, swift thrusts at the GMD troops to try to disrupt them before reinforcements could be brought from the rear. After two weeks the Red Army had suffered a stunning defeat and Guangchang was lost. During May–June, GMD troops penetrated deep into the Central Soviet. The defense of the soviet from inside the base area had proved unsuccessful.

A new strategy was needed. Thus in July and August 1934, two Red Army Corps were dispatched to engage GMD troops in the “white areas” to pull enemy troops out of the Jiangxi Soviet. The Seventh Army Corps, led initially by Xun Huaizhou and later by Fang Zhimin, was defeated and destroyed on the eastern flank. The Sixth Army Corps led by Ren Bishi eventually linked up with He Long’s Third Front Army in the southwestern highlands. Both failed to relieve the worsening situation in the soviet. Facing the blame for the Guangchang defeat, Braun tried to defend his position in the military command. He published a number of articles in his defense and persuaded some army corps commanders such as Lin Biao and Peng Dehuai to do the same. Lin Biao’s article “Short, Swift Thrusts” offers a concrete and positive description of this military tactic (Doc. D.20).

A plan for the evacuation of the Jiangxi Soviet was first brought up in the “Three-Man Military Group” of Bo Gu, Zhou Enlai, and Otto Braun.²⁷ Shortly afterward it was discussed and confirmed by the Standing Committee of the Politburo, comprising Zhou Enlai, Bo Gu, Zhang Wentian, Xiang Ying, and Chen Yun. In late August, members of the Politburo and the Military Council were notified of the decision. This is presumably why Mao was called back from the south to Ruijin. In September even senior military commanders were only informed “insofar as they were concerned with executing certain maneuvers in their area of jurisdiction.”²⁸

Public indication of the general retreat was made in the article by Zhang Wentian in Hongse Zhonghua (Red China) on 29 September 1934. Ironically, the title of the article was “All for the Defense of the Soviet” (Doc. D.21). The article put forward the possibility of retreating from and surrendering a soviet in a particular place in order to gain victory for the soviet throughout the whole country. Zhang Wentian also indicated his position on the inner-party struggle in the article. He labeled all those who still proposed the strategy of defending the soviets from within its boundaries opportunists. He was openly flaunting his disagreement with the Party Center and Bo Gu.

In October, as the GMD closed in more tightly, the CCP had to make the final decision for a “strategic transfer,” or the Long March as it was later known. Some 30,000 troops were left behind under Xiang Ying and Chen Yi, while the major force of the Red Army, some 86,000 in all, embarked on a westerly flight. Where they were heading was unclear. A number of possibilities existed: they could make a detour and fight back to the Jiangxi base; they could open a new base in central Hunan or on the Guangxi-Hunan border; or they could join up with He Long and Ren Bishi’s troops. The pursuit by the GMD army gradually began to close off different options.

(f) The Zunyi Meeting—January 1935— Criticism of the Former Military Line

By the time the Red Army reached northern Guizhou and found time for a rest in early January 1935, its forces had been reduced to 40,000. Here an Enlarged Meeting of the Politburo was convened from 15 to 18 January.²⁹ Presumably the meeting was convened to discuss the current situation and where the Red Army should go from there. It turned into a major review of past policy and heralded a shift in the party leadership.³⁰ The main report was delivered by Bo Gu, followed by a supplementary report from Zhou Enlai. Subsequently, Mao Zedong delivered a long speech criticizing the military line, and he was supported by Wang Jiaxiang.³¹ On the basis of the debates at the meeting, and in particular Mao Zedong’s speech, two formal written documents were drafted under Zhang Wentian’s guidance. The first was “The Resolution on Summing up the Campaign Against the Enemy’s Fifth ‘Encirclement’ ” (adopted by the Politburo Meeting on 8 January 1935);³² and the second, “The Outline Resolution of the Enlarged Politburo Meeting on Summing up Experiences and Lessons in Smashing the Fifth ‘Encirclement’ Campaign” (the Secretariat of the CC, 28 February 1935) (Doc. D.22). Chinese historians have viewed the second, shorter resolution as intended for communicating and propagating the meeting on a wider basis. This seems unlikely; it was more probably for senior cadres and laid out the principles for the lengthier version. For example, both Bo Gu and Hua Fu (Braun) are named in the shorter version, but not in the longer version, and an almost identical version to the short one was sent in telegrams to Ren Bishi, Zhang Guotao, and Xiang Ying, members of the Politburo and senior leaders of other Red Armies. The resolutions contained a compromise approving the party's political line, while ascribing the military failure during the Fifth Suppression Campaign to the erroneous military line of "pure positional defense" pursued by Bo Gu and Otto Braun. The most reliable factual details concerning the meeting are contained in notes drafted by Chen Yun that were intended to inform the lower-ranking party cadres and army officers (Doc. D.23).

Although Mao did not become the dominant figure in the party and army immediately, the Zunyi Meeting provided a decisive step in Mao's bid for supreme power.³³ He was appointed to the five-person Secretariat together with Zhang Wentian (general secretary), Zhou Enlai, Chen Yun, and Bo Gu. Along with Zhou Enlai and Wang Jiaxiang, he was to serve on the CCP Central Military Leadership Group. While Zhou was to be the chief decision-maker, Mao was to be his chief assistant. This broke up Bo Gu and Braun's control over military affairs. At Zunyi, Mao did not become chair of the Military Council or of the Politburo as some historians have suggested, but he did become one of the five top leaders of the party and had the right to be involved in all party and army decisions.

The Zunyi Meeting marked the end of the soviet movement in central China. Obsessed with ideological doctrines and basking in revolutionary enthusiasm, Bo Gu and his supporters lacked a profound insight into the political relationships within which the CCP found itself enmeshed. Neither could they balance this deficiency with an adequate experience in military command. The Jiangxi Soviet collapsed from the pressures brought to bear from the GMD without and the disintegration of the CCP from within. Mao's assumption of key leadership positions at the Zunyi Meeting paved the way for a transformation of the general orientation of the CCP as it would develop during the Long March and in subsequent years.

DOCUMENTS 1931—JANUARY 1935

D.1 Eight Conditions for a Great Victory (22 December 1930)³⁴

The General Committee of the First Front Army of the Red Army

I) The International Situation Is Advantageous to a Decisive Class War, But Not to the Imperialists

- [[A) The conflicts between the imperialists and their panic.
- B) The development of the international revolutionary high tide.

II) The Domestic Situation Is Advantageous for a Decisive Class War—But Not to Chiang Kai-shek and Lu Diping

A) There are major conflicts within the ruling class. Among Chiang Kai-shek, Zhang Xueliang, Yan Xishan, and Feng Yuxiang there is conflict. We must use class struggle to oppose this war that will slaughter workers and peasants. The problem of Guangxi has not been resolved.

- B) The development of revolutionary forces.]]

III) Our Strategy Is Good and We Win Every Time; The Enemy's Strategy Fails Every Time

A) Entice the enemy deep into the red areas. The enemy wants us to fight in the white areas; but we won't go there. We want the enemy to come to the red areas; he has to come. When we don't go [to the white areas], the enemy's ships, trains, and fortifications are useless. If he wants to come to the red areas, our spears will be more deadly. When the enemy comes into the red areas, he will be like a shrimp washed up on the beach—at a glance one can see that the enemy will be defeated and we will win.

B) Use the strategy of prolonged warfare. The enemy wants to fight a quick battle; but we won't fight a quick battle. There are internal conflicts among our enemies. They want to defeat us so as they can start another war among themselves. In the three-month period of "exterminating the red bandits," we have clearly seen through their weakness and intentionally avoided directly confronting them. At present, we have been playing hide-and-seek for almost two months and frustrated every move the enemy has made. We have exposed their spies and have hit them hard. The elements of the A.B. [Anti-Bolshevik] League planted by the enemy among our troops mutinied but were all eliminated. We killed dozens of regimental commanders and altogether have eliminated over 4,000 A.B. League members. We do not fight quick battles with them, but have found time to kill many small Chiang Kai-sheks and eradicate the spies inside the Red Army. This has united the Red Army more closely. The enemy has been defeated again; we have already won a major victory.

C) Subject the enemy to a prolonged encirclement. The enemy hopes to encircle us with concentric rings for a prolonged time. Several army groups from east and west of the river have encircled us. However, we have left nothing inside the houses or in the fields, and have called on the masses to join the battle in order to subject the enemy to a prolonged encirclement. At night, the enemy troops who had been enjoying a bit of peace scurry like rats in the darkness, running to the mountaintops and not daring to come down as soon as we fire a few shots at them. Because of our harassment, the enemy troops at Shijiabian opened up machine-gun and rifle fire through the night, killing several hundred of their own number. As soon as we begin to harass the enemy, they blow the bugle for assembly; they are frightened and nervous, unable to sleep all night. They want to attack, but cannot find us; when they cannot attack us, they fear that we will attack them. Now, you can see who is encircling whom. When the enemy comes into the red areas, it cannot find firewood, rice, cooking oil, or salt and has to send soldiers to look for them in the villages. It is a major effort for the enemy to make a proper meal. Now you can see who is encircling whom. We also put up many slogans and spread propaganda among the soldiers of the white army. The enemy is very demoralized. Even before the battle begins, the enemy has suffered defeat every step of the way, while we have won victories every step of the way. The enemy is both panic-stricken and demoralized; if we deliver a strong blow, we will surely win.

IV) We Have the Cooperation of the Masses; The Enemy Does Not

We have the cooperation of the masses; stretcher-carriers, transportation teams, first aid teams, reporting enemy movements—such is the help we have had from the revolutionary masses. The enemy does not enjoy such help. It does not have anybody to lead the way or send messages, but only those who destroy their communications, capture their spies, and disrupt their rear. Once we begin our battles, the masses climb the mountains to help us fight, so the enemy has little idea about the size of our forces and begins to panic. After the enemy is defeated, the masses seize the weapons of the enemy troops and take their soldiers prisoner, making sure that none escapes from the red area. This shows that we have the masses on our side while the enemy does not. The enemy is bound to be defeated, and we are sure to win.

V) Our Forces Are Concentrated; The Enemy's Forces Are Dispersed

Now our First and Third Armies have concentrated our forces by joining together. Our real strength and fighting power is sufficient for any battle. Although the twenty regiments of enemy troops constitute a large force, they are scattered, moving from west to east of the river, and they are separated by hundreds of kilometers. The number of rifles in each army group is no more than 4,000 to 5,000. We concentrate the largest amount of firepower to rout one of the enemy army groups. Even if other enemy army groups come, they will then be rendered useless. This is called concentration of forces, the principle of which is to defeat the enemy individually and ensure every victory.

VI) Our Troops Are United; The Enemy Troops Are Demoralized

The enemy soldiers have been demoralized for a long time. After entering the red areas, they see our slogans "Brothers in the white army, kill your officers," and "Welcome our brothers in the white army to join the Red Army." After they see these slogans and think about them, they will begin to have doubts. In Le'an, enemy troops sold their rifles to the people and then ran away. In addition, there were many instances of enemy soldiers running away to join the Red Army. Our Red Army is an army led by the proletariat and fights for itself, uniting all hearts into one. Through the joint efforts of its soldiers, nothing can prevent this class-based Red Army from defeating the demoralized white army.

VII) We Have Enough Resources in Reserve; The Enemy Faces a Financial Panic

The Red Army never carries much food or money during battles. Soldiers in the Third Army Corps carry only enough rice for breakfast, and yet they captured Changsha. This is a special characteristic of our Red Army. Now we have stocked up enough food and money for three months. Thus, we can fight all kinds of battles with the enemy. This time our officers and soldiers even donated money to [preparations for] the battles. Only the Red Army can do something like this, because we contribute our own money to the fight. This kind of spirit in the Red Army supplements our good preparations. The enemy is in the grip of a financial panic; he has levied a housing tax, but now has to impose a shop tax, in addition to the salt tax and treasury bonds. The money always flows into the wallets of the warlords, while the soldiers get no pay. We must entice more enemy troops to come here and annihilate them all.

VIII) We Have the Advantage of Terrain; The Enemy Does Not

The areas of Ningdu, Yongfeng, and Xingguo are red areas with many mountains and steep hills. The roads there are narrow, and the terrain dangerous. The enemy cannot make major maneuvers, and even his artillery loses its effectiveness. The Red Army moves fast and knows the terrain well. With a frontal attack on the forward slope of the mountain and an encirclement behind the mountain, the Red Army will corner and trap the soldiers of the white army and smash them to pieces.

These conditions will ensure our victory in the decisive class war. However, we must fight bravely since victories cannot be won simply by sitting at home. Let us talk about one thing. For example, the soldiers in the white army are demoralized, so we can win victories. However, the officers are diehard running dogs of the warlords, local despots, landlords, and the bourgeoisie. They will fight us to save themselves. Therefore, we must still resolutely and firmly attack the enemy in order to win. With our eight major conditions for victory and eight major handicaps for the enemy, however, we will be more assured of victory. Comrades, march bravely forward and fulfill your class responsibilities.

D.2 Minutes of the Ninth Meeting of the General Front Committee of the First Red Army (22 June 1931)³⁵

The Ninth Meeting of the General Front Committee

Eight P.M. at the headquarters in Kangdu, 22 June 1931

Present: Mao [Zedong], Zhu [De], Peng [Dehuai], Lin [Biao], Tan [Zhenlin], Zhou [Yishu].

Auditors: Wang Jiaxiang, Hui Wen [Cai Huiwen], Geng Kai, Hua Yu [Guo Huaruo].

1) Deployment of Troops

The Fourth Army (with the exception of one division) should concentrate its forces and then march at full speed along the shortest route to attack Sha County. Then it should (quickly) disperse and collect money. It should be dispersed over the two counties of Guihua and Yongan to collect 400,000 yuan. The timing for the transfer [of troops] from Sha County to Guihua and Yongan depends on the enemy disposition in Nanfeng. If the enemy retreats, we may postpone the transfer.

The Third Army Corps is to march with its full force toward Jiangle, drive out Zhou Zhiquan, occupy Jiangle and Shunchang counties, and collect 600,000 yuan.

The Twelfth Army should be dispersed over Ninghua, Qingliu, and Tingzhou to collect 150,000 yuan and to dispatch personnel to Tingzhou to purchase quilts and clothing and Western medicine and to open up communications in the western part of Fujian. If the enemy troops in Nanfeng retreat, the two divisions of the Third Army should occupy Nanfeng but only advance to Litayu. If the enemy does not retreat, only one division is to be left in Xingyu. If Jiang and Cai turn against Chiang Kai-shek, we should not put pressure on Ganzhou.

2) Evaluation of the Current Situation and the Principles for Action

It is a fact that Chiang Kai-shek is currently preparing to launch a third attack against the revolution. Chiang has reached a compromise with the north. Naturally, Zhang Xueliang will use this opportunity to take over the whole Shandong front, while Feng [Yuxiang] and Yan [Xishan] still present problems. Chiang will certainly take a defensive position vis-à-vis Guangdong, while attacking the Red Army first. If the Guangdong Army attacks Changsha and the Red Army attacks Wuzhou, Chiang will, of course, attack Guangdong first. Therefore, at the moment we are no longer advancing on Wuzhou. If the enemy retreats from Nanfeng, we will use only a small force to take Nanfeng, but will not use a large force to advance on Wuzhou. Our forces will stay in areas far from Chiang Kai-shek and will not go to the areas controlled by the Guangdong government. This will force Chiang to take a defensive posture against the Red Army and turn around to deal with the Guangdong government.

3) The Problem of Discipline in Attacking Qifang

If the enemy does not withdraw from Nanfeng, the Third Army will attack Qifang in line with the former plan. However, meetings of cadres must be called, and troops must be gathered together for lectures on discipline; the masses and the Red Guards are not allowed to go [to Qifang]. After we reach Qifang, we shall convene a peace conference and sign peace treaties. First, neither side should attack the other; both sides should attack the local despots. Second, the Red Guard Army in Xinghuo has the duty to help the peasants in Qifang to fight the reactionaries; cattle are not to be returned because not all of them can be returned. With the exception of those who have been killed, prisoners taken by both sides must be returned.

4) The Deployment of the Twelfth Division of the Fourth Army

One regiment is deployed along the Hetian-Kangdu line, one along the Xichengqiao-Shigouyu line, and one will follow the divisional headquarters at Jianning. The Twelfth Army is to send a company to Lixing to maintain communications (with Guangchang); one regiment is stationed at Anyuansi.

5) The Special District of Fujian and Jiangxi

Comrade Zhou Yishu is to be the secretary in command of Ting[zhou], Lian, Bai, and Rui[jin]; Zhou and Li [Jingquan] are county secretaries of Ting[zhou] and Rui[jin].

6) The Nanfeng Problem

In dealing with the Nanfeng problem, it was right to capture Hu Zhusheng, but technically speaking it was not so skillful. Before striking down a leader of the masses, we should find another for them even if he is an A.B. League member.³⁶

Afterward we can attack the leaders of the A.B. League. Nanfeng is without a leader. If it is necessary to arrest Hu Zhusheng, we must first disarm [the troops in] Nanfeng, detain them in great secrecy, and move them at night. When they are interrogated, none of them is to be told about it [the interrogation] in advance. Some are elements of the A.B. League, but we should not talk about this at random. Now, we should first find the armed forces. The political department and one division of the Third Army should go to the Nanfeng area. We should announce immediately Hu Zhusheng's crimes, distribute land, form peasant regiments, find³⁷ . . . and use every means to collect weapons.

D.3 Resolution on the Futian Incident (16 April 1931)³⁸

The Enlarged Meeting of the Central Bureau has listened to the report from the Party Center's delegation on the Futian Incident and completely agrees with the views of the delegation. (When the Party Center received news of the Futian Incident, lack of information prevented it from drafting a resolution. Therefore, the Party Center specially dispatched Central Bureau Comrades Ren Bishi, Wang Jiaxiang, and Gu Zuolin as its delegation empowered to solve the problem of the Futian Incident. They are empowered to represent the views of the Party Center.)

1) The Reasons for the Emergence and Development of the A.B. League

The A.B. League (or the Anti-Bolshevik League) is a counterrevolutionary organization comprising landlords; local despots, tyrants, and gentry; rich peasants, intellectuals born of wealthy families; and hoodlums. It is a national organization. Although its name varies across the country (such as the A.B. League in southwest Jiangxi, the Social Democratic Party in west Fujian, the North Pole Association in west Hubei), they are all fascist parties and groups directly under the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek. Their sole objective is to destroy the revolution and the CP, attempt to overthrow the political regime of workers and peasants in the soviet areas, and restore reactionary rule. In the white areas, apart from undermining the CP, [they] are doing their best to occupy important positions within the GMD to help realize a fascist dictatorship to rule the whole country.

At the moment, class struggle within the soviet areas is still very intense. Although landlords, local tyrants, the gentry, and rich peasants have been toppled, and workers and peasants have seized political power, the conflict between classes has not disappeared; class struggle has not abated. On the contrary, the remnants of the landlord class, rich peasants, hoodlums, and all reactionary elements, taking advantage of their previous economic, political, and cultural privileges and the help from the reactionary rule in the white areas, are resorting to every means to undermine the revolution and wage their last struggle. In particular, the deepening of the land revolution and the reform of the soviet regime have intensified class struggle. In this class struggle, there are, on the one side, the workers and peasants who hold political power and are under the leadership of the CP; on the other side, there are the reactionary classes that are being ruled by and form the class basis of the A.B. League; the A.B. League is the leader of these reactionary elements.

The A.B. League is able to expand greatly primarily because it can infiltrate the CP. In general, the important members of the A.B. League, the Social Democratic Party, and the Reorganizationists³⁹ are all members of the CP who occupy comparatively responsible positions within it. Therefore, the A.B. League has become a small party within the CP. It takes advantage of the CP's position to infiltrate the soviets, labor unions, and all the mass organizations, carrying out counterrevolutionary activities under the flag of revolution.

Why has the A.B. League been able to expand rapidly within the party recently? The main reasons are:

The CCP and, in particular, the party organizations in the soviet areas contain many children of local tyrants, the gentry, and landlords, as well as rich peasants and hoodlums. Moreover, these elements often are in responsible positions in party and governmental agencies. Landlords and rich peasants have found it easy to infiltrate the CCP particularly because of the past mistakes it has committed such as Chen Duxiu's opportunism and, later, the policy of relying on the rich peasants. Not surprisingly, as the revolution develops and thorough land redistribution is carried out, these elements are bound to betray us and go over to the side of counterrevolutionary organizations—such as the A.B. League.

During the period of expansion of the soviet areas, the party also followed the mistaken political line of Li Lisan and forced the Red Army to advance blindly on the cities instead of consolidating the soviet areas. This provided the A.B. League with an opportunity for major expansion. This was just what the A.B. League needed. In addition, Li Lisan's political line used "leftist" words to oppose the equal distribution of land. This was just what the A.B. League needed to use against the land revolution. Thus, the A.B. League attempted to use the pretext of the Li Lisan political line to engage in counterrevolutionary activities. At the same time, the A.B. League made use of the catastrophic results of the implementation of Li Lisan's political line to instigate the masses and fan their dissatisfaction with the party and the soviet areas. Moreover, while the General Front Committee opposed Li Lisan's political line, the Jiangxi Provincial Committee firmly supported it. In fact, several members of the Provincial Executive Committee (like Cong Yunzhong and Duan Liangbi) were all members of the A.B. League. In the name of supporting the CC's line and opposing so-called rightist tendencies, they fought the General Front Committee and worked for the counterrevolutionaries. As a result, the A.B. League used the inner-party struggle to cover up their antiparty activities, thus making it all the more difficult for ordinary party members to see through the A.B.

League's conspiracy. Party members who supported Li Lisan's political line were used by the A.B. League to undermine the party and the revolution. Thus, the A.B. League was presented with another opportunity to expand its organization.

In the past, we did not pay sufficient attention to the work of purging subversive elements. The captured members of the A.B. League were shot on the spot, instead of being used to dig up further clues. We did not set up an organization of political security agents to carry out the purges. All this was because in the past we did not take the problem of the A.B. League seriously. Neglect of work to purge subversive elements also made it possible for the A.B. League to expand.

2) The Futian Incident Is a Counterrevolutionary Rebellion Led by the A.B. League

The confessions by the principal perpetrators of the Futian Incident such as Li Baifang, Xie Hanchang, Jing Wanbang, Zhou Mian, Cong Yunzhong, Liu Jinghua, Hu Jiaju, and Zeng Juefei completely prove that the Futian Incident was a counter-revolutionary rebellion led by the A.B. League. The principal criminals in the Futian Incident—Duan Liangbi, Li Baifang, Xie Hanchang, Liu Di, Jing Wangbang, Zhou Mian, Cong Yunzhong, Liu Jinghua, and Zeng Juefei—were all important members of the A.B. League and also occupied important positions in revolutionary agencies. [[The positions of these figures are listed.]] When the imperialist GMD was attacking the soviet areas and the Red Army, the A.B. League was plotting an armed rebellion in response to the white army's attack. Therefore, we arrested Duan Liangbi, an important member of the A.B. League, but Liu Di immediately engineered an armed rebellion in Donggu, commanded soldiers to release the captured A.B. members, detained the commander of the Twentieth Corps, Li Shaojiu, and Yi Ershi and the CC's revenue collector. He also expelled the chairman of the provincial soviet, Zeng Shan, attacked the Red Army's school, disarmed a company of the Twelfth Corps, and commandeered his troops to the west of the river. Moreover, he instigated the masses in all areas to leave the Red Army, posted reactionary slogans, spread rumors, and sowed seeds of discord, attempting to undermine the unified leadership of the party and the Red Army. These are the most egregious facts concerning the counterrevolutionary rebellion.

After the Second Plenum of the Southwest Jiangxi Special Committee and the Provincial Executive Committee (except for a few members) before the Futian Incident they opposed the General Front Committee. The A.B. members in the Provincial Executive Committee and the Southwest Jiangxi Special Committee used this opportunity to implement their plot. The Second Plenum, held in August 1930, was totally dominated politically by the Li Lisan line and overthrew the correct line of the "February 7" meeting, particularly in its resolution on the equal distribution of land.⁴⁰ It also dismissed Liu Shiqi who firmly implemented the line of the "February 7" meeting. The A.B. League did indeed play an important role at this meeting. Since that time, the A.B. League has waved the flag of the Li Lisan line to oppose the party and the revolution. When Liu Di mutinied and set free the A.B. League members, the A.B. League still held up the flag of the Li Lisan line and purposefully attacked Ji'an to deceive the masses and call for opposition to the leadership by individuals and the Red Army. Under such circumstances, some comrades who supported the Li Lisan line were used. They joined the counterrevolutionary Futian Incident and became tools of the A.B. League.

To sum up, the Futian Incident was a counterrevolutionary rebellion led by the A.B. League under the flag of the Li Lisan line. More precisely, the Futian Incident was a counterrevolutionary rebellion led by the A.B. League and participated in by some supporters of the Li Lisan line. The A.B. League engineered this rebellion in order to overthrow the revolution. Supporters of the Li Lisan line joined this rebellion to support the Li Lisan line and oppose the General Front Committee, thus simply committing the same counterrevolutionary acts as the A.B. League.

3) The Mistake of the Central Bureau in Solving the Futian Incident

In the past, the General Front Committee adopted a policy of firmly attacking the A.B. League. This was entirely correct and, from a class standpoint, was necessary to protect the revolution. In dealing with the Futian Incident in particular, it was completely correct to define it as a counterrevolutionary rebellion led by the A.B. League and to call on the masses to attack [it] resolutely. At the time the enemy's large-scale attack was moving closer. Many A.B. League members were discovered in the Red Army, while, during this cruel struggle, something like the Futian Incident took place. If we had not adopted the strategy of firmly attacking [the enemy], we would never have been able to unite the revolutionary forces, or crush all the rebellions being plotted by the counterrevolutionaries, or defeat the enemy attacking the revolution, or fight for the great victory in the battle of Longgang. We regard those in the A.B. League who falsely upheld the flag of the Li Lisan line as liquidationists. This was a mistake in terminology. In truth, this was against the Li Lisan line; this was correct. However, in its efforts to eradicate the A.B. League, the General Front Committee committed some methodological and technical errors. For example, in some instances we believed too much the confessions of [members of] the A.B. League, adopted too harsh methods during interrogation, and failed to establish a complete security system organization to purge subversive elements. Therefore, sometimes we caused some party members and the masses to be uninformed and frightened.

The line adopted by the Central Bureau to solve the Futian Incident was completely wrong. The Central Bureau pointed out in its announcement and other documents: "In light of the history of our party's struggle in southwest Jiangxi, of our party's organizational basis, and of the objective facts of the Futian Incident, the Central Bureau cannot reach a subjective conclusion affirming that the Futian Incident was an armed rebellion by the A.B. League and the liquidationists" (see Circular No.11).⁴¹ "They [referring to some in the Provincial Executive Committee] are engaged in unprincipled factional fighting among small groups; if such tendencies are allowed to develop, it is likely to lead to antiparty and counterrevolutionary activities similar to the Futian Incident" (see Circular No. 2).⁴²

This evaluation was of course very wrong and divorced from the class standpoint. The Central Bureau fundamentally failed to point out that the Futian Incident was a counterrevolutionary armed rebellion led by the A.B. League. Instead, it affirmed that the Futian Incident was not an armed rebellion by the A.B. League. This has completely obscured the counterrevolutionary nature of the Futian Incident. It also said that the Futian Incident was the result of the development of unprincipled factional fighting. This was an even bigger mistake. In the past, the Provincial Executive Committee opposed the Party Committee of the First Army and later its General Front Committee. It accused them of having a "peasant mentality," "resisting the Party Center," "right opportunism," etc. To view these most important struggles of principle and political line and of supporting and opposing the Li Lisan line as factional squabbles was to obscure the serious mistakes of principle and of past political line. It was also a very dangerous mistake, because such an evaluation will make people believe that the Futian Incident was a struggle against factional fighting within the party, rather than a class struggle. In fact, unprincipled factional fighting within the party will never evolve into a counterrevolutionary armed rebellion. This is the most obvious fact.

Because of this evaluation, to solve the Futian Incident, the Central Bureau adopted methods of "penalizing both sides," "using the method of education," and "seeking a peaceful resolution." Therefore, it decided to strip Comrade Li Shaojiu of his party membership (although it was not enforced later on) and expel or warn those who took part in the Futian Incident. In reality, [the Central Bureau] completely relaxed its efforts to investigate whether these people were A.B. League members. At the same time, [the Central Bureau] also informed party organizations at all levels not to speak of the Futian Incident as armed rebellion by the A.B. League. On receiving these resolutions and announcements, our party organizations at all levels thus relaxed, softened up, and diminished their struggle against the A.B. League. The A.B. League was able to hide under the erroneous resolution of the Central Bureau, under the "counterrevolutionaries in practice," and under "a certain kind of factional fighting" to continue their counterrevolutionary activities and develop counterrevolutionary organizations. Therefore, this erroneous resolution of the Central Bureau completely relaxed the struggle against the A.B. League. This was very dangerous.

The Central Bureau produced the erroneous resolution on the Futian Incident that diverged from the class standpoint and that made concessions to the A.B. League. This was because from its beginning the Central Bureau was under the rule of the Third Plenum's political line of conciliation with the Li Lisan line.

This is why it failed to recognize the substance of the struggle over principle between the previous Provincial Executive Committee and the General Front Committee, let alone to understand why the supporters of the Li Lisan line would organize the counterrevolutionary Futian Incident together with the A.B. League. This failure could only lead to the wrong conclusion that “the Futian Incident was a factional fight.”

4) Our Lessons from the Futian Incident

The Futian Incident did not happen by chance, but was a very serious problem in the history of the soviet and our party. The Futian Incident has further awakened us to the question of reforming the party and the soviet and, in particular, the question of intensifying the purge of counterrevolutionaries. We must step up our efforts to reform the party’s composition, weeding out children of landlords, local despots, the gentry, as well as rich peasants and hoodlums, to train and reform the cadres, and promote and educate cadres from among the workers and peasants. At the same time, we must continue to reform the soviet, eliminating undesirable elements and destroying dictatorship by the director of the Secretariat.

To purge the counterrevolutionaries we should implement the following:

A) Firmly implement the party’s correct line—the international line. Use the class standpoint to lead correctly the class struggle within the soviet areas, to step up the work of purging counterrevolutionaries, to adopt every means to attack the A.B. League, and to correct the serious previous mistake of relaxing the struggle against the A.B. League in order to destroy completely the conspiracies and organizations of all counterrevolutionary factions and groups.

B) Organize a governmental security organ specialized in dealing with counterrevolutionaries. The party should appoint the best and most reliable members to do this job. In the future, regulations and documents will explain the organization and working methods of our security bureau.

C) Expand our propaganda against the A.B. League and other counterrevolutionary parties and factions. We should apply the mass line in our trials so that the masses will rise up to oppose the reactionary factions and actively support the Communist Party and the soviet government.

D) Concerning interrogation, we should not use only harsh methods, but rather both soft and harsh methods interchangeably, and ask about all details. Concerning sentencing, we should consider the social background of the subject being sentenced (workers and peasants who have been deceived are allowed to turn themselves in and get a second chance). Stubborn counterrevolutionaries must be eliminated; we must avoid random arrests and killings; we should know that random arrests and killings can only frighten the masses and help the A.B. League instead of eliminating it.

Only by strengthening the soviet regime and winning continuous victories can we resolutely implement the above political line and methods.

D.4 Conclusions to the First Enlarged Meeting of the [E-Yu-Wan] Subbureau. Zhang Guotao (28 June 1931)⁴³

Comrades! The main agenda of this meeting is to review the reports of the CC's Subbureau, the CC of the League's CC Subbureau, and the Northwest Anhui Special Committee. Time constraints have prevented every comrade from speaking as much as he would like. This is a flaw. However, speeches by thirty-eight comrades were full of the spirit of self-criticism, and they were devoid of empty talk and closely related to practical work. This is an excellent phenomenon. However, there are some weaknesses, which include a lack of a correct understanding of self-criticism, an inability to criticize one's own work first and then criticize others' work, and the phenomenon of superiors criticizing subordinates while subordinates criticize superiors. Only comrades working in the Red Army can expose all mistakes and flaws in previous work more thoroughly. This is excellent self-criticism. [We] should use the party's Bolshevik spirit to carry out [self-criticism]. We should oppose any attempts to sabotage the party's discipline and organization under the flag of self-criticism. For example, when a county committee goes to a district committee to inspect work, the district committee must not attribute its own mistakes to the county committee; the district committee should criticize itself. However, if the policy direction given by the county committee has been incorrect, the county committee must not blame the district committee. The county committee must take the responsibility. This requires that both superiors and subordinates should all use self-criticism correctly.

What is a correct line? This is a revolutionary line led by the proletariat and based on Marxist-Leninist scientific analysis. For example, the Lisan line is not formulated according to subjective or objective facts. It is a non-Marxist-Leninist, unscientific, and incorrect line. Rightist tendencies are opportunistic. "Leftist" tendencies are also opportunistic. Nothing is more leftist and revolutionary than the line of the Comintern. The Lisan line used leftist slogans all the time, such as disarming the peasants, abolishing the peasants' armed forces, etc. They themselves believed that these were very leftist and revolutionary; in fact, they were utterly opportunistic. Many comrades often make the following criticism: someone did not grasp the key of their work or had a bad work-style. What is work-style? Work-style ensures the implementation of the correct line and is the most effective instrument to implement the correct line. It is wrong and unscientific to make a general claim that the key to work has not been grasped. Is it your fault or the Center's if you fail to grasp the key to work? Only by being informed can the key to work be grasped. There should not be similar unscientific critical remarks.

Now let me talk formally.

First, it is wrong to say that the enemy has now adopted a defensive approach; in many places the enemy is still organizing local militia to attack us. At the same time, we have learned that the enemy is massing forces to attack the Central Soviet

Area and then us. Before the enemy aggressively attacks us, we should take the opportunity to launch large-scale attacks against the enemy; we must not relax even a little the efforts of "countering encirclement and extermination."

Second, in implementing the Fourth Plenum's line [January 1931], the Central Bureau indeed began to change its practice. For example, militarily speaking, the existing soviet area has been increasingly strengthened; the enemy in Dushan in northwest Anhui has been annihilated; the enemy in Machen was frightened and took to flight. One enemy regiment in Taohua and Huang'an was destroyed, and this frightened away from the Popi River the enemy troops who were going to occupy Xingji. Also, many new soviet areas have developed. Within the Red Army, a basis has been established in terms of the organizational relationships of the party, of the army, and between the Red Army and local organizations. In particular, many good cadres were transferred to leading posts in the Red Army. The Central Branch Bureau has made expansion of the Red Army a priority.

The CC's Subbureau has called for resistance to coercion of the masses and the bureaucratization of the soviets, and for the establishment of supervisory committees of workers and peasants. It has sent many detailed instructions and methods to solve the food problem. The CC's Subbureau has called for resolute opposition to the bad phenomenon of peasants from the soviet areas going to the nonsoviet areas taking things away from the poor people. Change has now begun; for example, on the issue of labor unions, [we] specifically pointed out the tendency to neglect the workers' interests and the bad relations with the peasants. The work of the Political Security Bureau [zhengzhi baoweiju] has been strengthened. We also waged a firm struggle against the tendencies of Xu Pengren, Chao Dajun, Chen Dingho, and others. We intensified our efforts in the nonsoviet areas; the work of the special committees of Jinghan, Huangchuan, and central Hubei was reassigned and inspected. We rectified the county committees of Poxiaobei and Poannan counties and organized two training courses to rectify and strengthen party leadership. These are all the achievements of our work in the past.

However, there are many flaws, the principal reasons for which being: (a) There are too few personnel in the organs of the Central Branch Bureau; the work of the various departments has yet to be established. Therefore, we often cannot inspect work everywhere, thus causing relations between counties and the Central Branch Bureau to be distant. (b) In the past, there were no workers or peasant comrades in the Standing Committee of the CC Subbureau. Today we must elect a few comrades who are workers and peasants to join the standing committee, who will serve not only in name, but also will take charge of real work. (c) A few additional questions will be discussed here. The ways through which leading party organs realize their leadership include roughly the following forms: directives, party newspapers, inspection tours, and individual talks. Comrades, please do not think that the party newspaper belongs to the leaders (in the Soviet Union, party members will be expelled from the party if they forget to read the party newspaper each day). Such views are incorrect. If there are mistakes in party documents and newspapers, we should make suggestions to the superiors. When the party newspaper is correct, subordinates should treat it as an announcement and implement it. (d) In the past, very few reports were made by local party organizations. Even when the occasional report came in, it was either untrue, empty, and simplistic, or long and boring without a central issue. This was true of all kinds of meetings. Either there was no report or discussion, or the report began with the earth's creation or focused on questions that were neither practical nor necessary. (e) Previously we did not understand all kinds of organizational relationships. From now on the Central Branch Bureau should do its best to improve these relations. (f) Comrade Zheng Weisan said that the leadership provided by the Central Branch Bureau to the government of the special soviet area was fragmented, restricted to only individual conversations and without systematic and planned leadership. In fact, although the government of the special soviet area often has only one or two persons in its administration and is rarely able to give directives—through meetings—to comrades working in the special soviet area, the government has intensified, instead of relaxing, its efforts concerning the key work of the special soviet area, such as grain, economics, training of cadres, the relationship between the CC's Subbureau and the special soviet, newspapers in the special soviet, and the committee on political work of the special soviet. The CC's Subbureau once said to the comrades working in the special soviet that if comrades who were workers and peasants committed mistakes, the party could excuse 30 percent of their mistakes. If comrades who were intellectuals committed mistakes, the party should increase the penalty by one-third. This is an extremely correct method. Since these words were spoken, we have heard that some intellectuals have been afraid to do anything out of fear of making mistakes. This does not have to be so. This tendency should not exist; those petty bourgeois comrades who are intellectuals should make greater efforts.

Third, now I would like to speak about the party's current principal tasks:

(A) The task of "countering encirclement and extermination" (military operations). The main missions here include (i) Clear the areas that are close to the enemy, reopen commerce, establish communications, solve the grain and economic problems in order to expand the soviet area. (ii) Support the Central Soviet Area. Now the enemy is concentrating enormous forces to attack the Central Soviet Area. Comrade Peng Yongjun said that consolidating the soviet area was a conservative view; this is wrong. A Comintern comrade said, "If Comrade Lisan said that strengthening the soviet area is conservative, then we would rather be a conservative party." One cannot separate solving economic problems from political tasks.

(B) The soviet congress. (i) The congress must set up a party and league Secretariat [dang tuan ganshihui] and subdivide the comrades present into several small groups. Comrade Zhou Chunquan is appointed responsible secretary, and it comes directly under the command of the CC's Subbureau. (ii) This congress should establish a good soviet; in the past, government institutions did not have representatives from the Red Army, or representatives from among youths and women. This time it should include their representatives. Once there are representatives from the Red Army, no one will forget the families of the Red Army and the problem of the wounded. Once there are women representatives, there will be no incorrect limitations on women's development. With youth representatives, there will not be the phenomenon of oppressing the youth. The special soviet should emphasize the implementation of this line. (iii) Reexamine the mistakes in past work and fully carry out self-criticism. Moreover, determine policies for future change and transform the existing situation. For example, it is not enough simply to form an inspection commission composed of workers and peasants; [we] must let the masses know how to use it. (iv) The congress should not have too many documents. There should be only the manifesto, land law, labor law, economic policy, [documents on] issues of marriage, youth, organization of the soviet, the Red Army, etc. . . . Every party member should treat these documents as party documents. Should they not do so, they should be considered as violating party discipline. (v) After the conclusion of the congress, every delegate should go to the grass roots to call mass meetings [to propagate] the line and reform soviet administrations at lower levels. The enlarged meeting should explain to the comrades chairing the meetings that all the meetings' proposals should be approved by the party. This is the guideline adopted by the CC's Subbureau in leading the soviet congress. We request that the enlarged meeting approve it.

(C) On the issue of the Red Army. (i) A committee has already been organized to draft a resolution to be issued in the name of the enlarged meeting. The enlarged meeting is also requested to approve it. (ii) In dealing with the question of expanding the Red Army, we should regularly and continuously mobilize the masses to join the Red Army. With their consent, we should mobilize the masses as long as they are not rich peasants or members of the Reorganization clique or other political factions and as long as they are workers, hired hands, poor peasants, and reliable middle peasants. We oppose the practice of unauthorized conscription (without approval from the soviet) and failure to get good youths to join the Red Army. We oppose recruiting rich peasants and those suspected of being in the Reorganization clique into the Red Army. Those who have joined already must be purged from the Red Army. In the future when similar incidents occur, [perpetrators] must be severely punished. This is the first point. (iii) Do our best to help solve all the material problems of the Red Army and improve Red Army life. (iv) Oppose the failure to observe discipline within the Red Army, improve the soldiers' education, voluntarily obey discipline, establish a relationship between the Red Army and the masses, oppose incorrect sexual relations, and oppose sexual harassment of women. In particular, Red Army commanders should correct their own faults first in order to influence the soldiers. (v) Intensify the work of political education, reform members of the Red Army, and gain excellent results in training over the short term. (vi) Intensify party leadership over the league in the Red Army and oppose the liquidationist view of neglecting league work. (vii) Political commissars must firmly execute these party policies and train commanders in the Red Army to resolutely execute the above [policies] on the several problems in the Red Army. (viii) Party organization within the Red Army is different from local party organizations; there can be self-criticism only from the top down; [we] cannot develop self-criticism from the bottom up within the Red Army. Only this will avoid weakening discipline within the Red Army. Only this will strengthen the Red Army.

(D) The problem of grain. Continue the policies for solving the food problem. Every comrade should work hard to grow melons, sweet potatoes, oats, beans, and other crops. Moreover, they should lead the masses well to work on the land of the families of Red Army soldiers. This point should not be neglected. We must examine frequently the execution of this work.

(E) The problem of the land and the peasantry. (i) Hired hands are the proletariat in the countryside; poor peasants are semiproletariat; middle peasants do not exploit others and are not subject to exploitation by others, so they are the petty bourgeoisie; rich peasants exploit labor, rent land, lend at high interest rates, and are the exploiting elements in the countryside. (ii) We may penalize families of reactionaries with hard labor or otherwise expel them and deprive them of the right to get land. (iii) We should inform the good peasants about the land so that when they go to the countryside for inspection tours they will correct all the mistakes concerning land. (iv) We should recruit more good peasants to work in the land committee. We should train specialists in the land problem to solve the problem completely in all villages. In particular, the villages in west Anhui urgently need such a solution.

(F) Work in eliminating counterrevolutionaries. (i) The principal danger is the rich peasant line. We must firmly oppose, but not exterminate, rich peasants. (ii) Perfect our work in establishing security bureaus. (iii) Intensify the work on eliminating the Reorganization clique. We must wage a tremendous political struggle against the rumors and reactionary propaganda of the Reorganization clique in order to weed out its influence. (iv) Confiscate the weapons of rich peasants.

(G) The peasant association should drive out landlords and rich peasants. The association should carry out one investigation per set period (every six months or one year).

(H) The question of labor unions. Quickly promote cadres and ensure that the unions are led by the party. Resolutely implement labor laws.

(I) Economic policies. Immediately impose excise taxes on goods not needed by workers and peasants.

Work in the nonsoviet areas. Establish a good communications network with the nonsoviet areas. Where possible, the party in the soviet areas should directly guide party work in the nonsoviet areas and attract the comrades and masses in the nonsoviet areas for training in the soviet areas. We should set up training courses. Step up our efforts on the soldiers' movement.

(J) Various organizational relationships. (i) Only under the leadership of the CP can all organizations avoid conflicts. The party is the supreme leading organ. In a county, only the county party committee is the supreme leading organ. Even when one disagrees with the views of the county committee secretary, one has to abide by his or her views and then report to the superior party. In the Red Army, it is not the military commander but the supreme leader who is the political commissar, who is the party and soviet representative. (ii) Every county should accomplish at least the following: (1) All important political documents from the county and districts must be approved by the county committee. (2) Economic distribution and cadre allocation must be authorized by the county committee. (3) The soviet government can only inquire about the policies of the Political Security Bureau and should not manage everything. (4) The soviet government is not allowed to give orders to labor unions and peasant associations. Only party organizations can perform the leadership functions. (5) Absolutely avoid dictatorship by secretaries, especially by non-party secretaries. (6) Overcome all difficulties, train all kinds of personnel, actively cultivate cadres, run all kinds of training courses, adopt the system of internship, and use meetings to train personnel. (7) In the future all organs and groups should have simple work plans that are fully implemented. (8) On the question of inner-party struggle, we should actively encourage self-criticism and intensify the struggle between two lines. Party organizations at all levels should establish a supervisory committee to enforce strictly party discipline. Inner-party struggle and struggle within government organs are different. To carry out inner-party struggles properly we rely on the strength the party and the masses. In principle, we oppose right opportunism and the remnants of the Lisan line, and we particularly oppose opportunism in practice. We also oppose the line of reconciliation and peace tendencies both within and outside the party. Because of the restrictions of time, I cannot deal separately and in detail with questions of how to improve party branches and district committees, the question of economic associations, etc.

Comrades! The environment of struggle in which we now find ourselves is extremely complex. On the one hand we must fight the enemies from without, while on the other we must fight the enemies from within. This is our line of attack.

After the conclusion of the enlarged meeting, all comrades should swiftly implement these resolutions; do not wait for the resolutions and announcements of the CC's Subbureau. We will use the evaluation system to assess the results of our comrades' efforts.

D.5 The Great Victory of Purging Counterrevolution Arises in the E-Yu-Wan Soviet. Chen Changhao (22 November 1931)⁴⁴

Report on the Details of the Current Purge of Counterrevolutionaries by Comrade Chen Changhao, Commissar of the Fourth Front Army of the Chinese Red Army of Workers and Peasants

Place: The Peng-Yang Military and Political Academy in the E-Yu-Wan [Hubei-Henan-Anhui Soviet] Area

Comrades:

The process of the current purge of counterrevolutionaries within the Red Army's Fourth Front Army is well worth the serious attention of all the armed comrades in the Peng-Yang Academy and all the poor working people in the E-Yu-

Wan Soviet Area. This purge demonstrates the great significance of the consolidation and expansion of the Fourth Front Army and the Soviet Area. All comrades have heard that the Central Soviet has broken through the enemy's encirclement and captured over 100,000 weapons. Even the relatively underdeveloped peasant movement in Shaanxi and Shanxi is now thriving and providing an enormous impetus over a large region of the Soviet Area. The victory in the E-Yu-Wan Soviet Area is even greater. Every day it is strengthening and expanding. Thus, the revolutionary tide is surging ahead daily. This has frightened the wits out of the reactionary rulers and shaken their rule. Therefore, to maintain its deathbed struggle, the enemy is concentrating even more on attacks against the Soviet Area and the Red Army. However, the enemy has already seen how useless its airplanes, guns, and machine guns are. Therefore, it is making use of the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party to infiltrate our Soviet Area and the Red Army to try to sabotage them. This is a very vicious plot. It is easy for us to see the enemy attacking with airplanes and guns, but it is not easy for us to see the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party. How vicious the enemy is in dealing with us! No comrade should forget this. Now let us talk about the activities of the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party in the Red Army and the process of our current purge:

1) The routes of infiltration into the Soviet Area by the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party. The infiltration began as early as 1928. (a) For example, Xu Jishen came from Shanghai. At that time he had very close connections with the Third Party, and thus the CC sent someone to talk to him. Old Xu expressed repentance and, as a result, the CC dispatched him to become the commander of the First Army. In fact, Xu Jishen came with the orders of the Third Party's CC. Xiong Shouxuan was also entrusted by the Third Party's CC and the A.B. League to develop their organizations. (b) Gao Jiandou was a battalion commander under Zhang Fakui. He came from Wuhan also on an assignment for the A.B. League and the Third Party. (c) Feng Jun used to serve under Yang Hucheng's command. He was a CP member who had betrayed the party. He came [to us] while the Red Army was attacking Xingyang. (d) Li Ronggui joined the Third Party in Shanghai and then came here to become political commissar of the First Division. That Pan Banfu could stay, regain his party membership, and be promoted to chief-of-staff was the work of Ronggui. (e) Pan Banfu was an officer under Tang Shengzhi. On Tang's orders he went from Xingyang to Xiaogan and then came here. He also brought his wife to engage in joint sabotage. We should also report that when Gao Jiandou came here, he was told by the A.B. League that to establish contact with Xiong Shouxuan he should tap him on the shoulder three times. Thus, they formed an organization within the Red Army and the local government as soon as they arrived.

2) The development of the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party within the Red Army. Our comrades all know that these [elements] have had a long history of infiltration and, as a result, they have been frantically developing their organizations. In the past year and this year alone, they set up a governing agency and a counterrevolutionary Military Affairs Committee of nine members: Xu Jishen, Zhou Weijun, Gao Jiandou, Liao Yeqi, Xiao Cai, Wu Jingchi, Xiong Shouxuan, Pan Banfu, and Jiang Jingtang, with Xu Jishen as chair. Under them, they have developed organizations in individual divisions, regiments, battalions, and companies. However, if we destroy their links at the lower levels, it is very difficult for those at the top. Let me cite another example for you. Zhou Weijun was a hero. He used the cover of the CP to create bases for them. For him, there was no such thing as the soviet or the CP. He once murdered two party representatives and a CC inspector. He expelled comrades Guo Shusheng and Liu Ying. Long ago he had already established organizations of the A.B. League and the Reorganizationists in the town of Shangcheng. This aided the Reorganizationists' further development. In particular, when Shang Guanglu, Ye, and Li came south, they were very active. In the current process of purging traitors, we can see, simply from the example of the Tenth, Twelfth, and Thirteenth divisions of the Fourth Corps, that two division commanders (Xu Jishen and Zhou Weijun), one division political commissar (Liao Yongjun), eight regiment commanders, five regiment political commissars (regiment commanders: Pan Banfu, Wu Yunsan, Gao Jiandou, Wang Zhexian, Xiao Fang, Wang Ming, Wei Mengxian, Cao Guannan; regiment political commissars: Feng Jun, Jiang Zhiying, Yuan Liang, Wu Jingchi, and Liu Xingmao), two directors of divisional political departments, and twelve directors of regimental political departments have joined the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party. There were also many managers, staff officers, and aides who joined. Some company and platoon commanders also joined. For example, Jiang Jingtang of the Military Affairs Committee for west Anhui, the party secretaries of the four counties in west and north Anhui (rich peasants), several members of the special party committees (rich peasants and landlords), and most of the organizations in Xinhuangguang were all such elements. This is proof of the attempt by Chiang Kai-shek and Wang Jingwei to attack the soviet areas and of the enormous size of the counterrevolutionary organizations. This proves that in the past the Fourth Army of the Red Army was effectively under the command of the Reorganizationists. Principal Red Army leaders turned a blind eye to this and even reported to the branch bureau that the Red Army was in a state of perfect health. This time, altogether about 1,000 people have been eliminated as well as roughly 1,500 or 1,600 rich peasants and other undesirable elements. Most of the 1,000 Reorganizationists and A.B. League and Third Party elements were landlords, rich peasants, hoodlums, gangsters, GMD spies, students from the Whampoa [Huangpu] Academy, mutineers, prisoners of war, and expelled CCP and YL members. There are hardly any workers or peasants among them. Among the 1,000 people, there were over 700 CP members (fools) and a few youth members. At the same time, we can see a massive convergence of parochial mentalities and sentiments of local talents (local nepotism). This is fairly common in the cities of Shan and Liuhe but less so in Huangma.

3) Comrades, let us look at their strategies, lines, plots, and conspiracies. In general, their strategies are: to defect with their guns; murder workers, peasants, and CP members; surrender to the GMD; and sabotage the Red Army and the soviet areas. These elements were extremely pleased when the veteran Twenty-eighth and Twenty-second regiments lost most of their men in the attack on Dashanzhai. We employed a strong force in the attack on the Qing district, but we could not achieve a breakthrough. Zhou Weijun and Xu Jishen often sent men to report to Gu Jingzhi, the head of the Qing district police. Thus, he knew everything. On the Shanguang Route, Gu had one wireless set with which he sent their messages to Chiang Kai-shek and reported on their activities. A long time ago, they wanted to defect with their guns. When the second meeting was convened in Xingji, Jiang Jingtang, Xu Jishen, and Zhou Weijun exerted a great effort in recommending that we continue to the Yangtze River. At that time, Zeng Zhongsheng (follower of the Lisan line) completely agreed. As a result, they decided that going south provided the best opportunity of destroying the Red Army. The day after Yingshan was taken, Chiang Kai-shek sent two fully empowered representatives, Zhong Junzhong and Mei Qiao, to connive with Xu Jishen and the others, promising them positions as commanders of the temporary Fourteenth Corps; Xiao Fang and Zhou Weijun were given divisional command posts and promised 300,000 in silver dollars. They planned to drag the Fourth Corps of the Red Army, which our heroic comrades created with their blood and lives, to Wuxue where it could be destroyed and its guns handed over. They wanted it to raise the GMD flag. After the Red Army took Yingshan, the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and Third Party elements mobilized to support the plan by Zeng Zhongsheng to occupy Wuxue. They held a secret meeting in the mansion of Xiong Shouxuan to change the course of action and go to Wuxue. At the same time, Xu Jishen immediately sent Zhong Jun to Hankou to meet with old Chiang [Kai-shek] to discuss details. At Wuxue, three huge warships were waiting, loaded with money. They planned to use the troops of Xu and Xia to attack from both sides. Xu Jishen and the others also located two Reorganizationists from Huangguang who disguised themselves as peasants. They acted as a liaison informing them [Xu, etc.] on the other side's actions. They decided to go to Wuxue and change the plan for the Fourth Army of the branch bureau of the CC. Writing from Yingshan, Zeng Zhongsheng said: Jing Huangguang organized many responsible elements for liaison and wanted the Fourth Army to go to Wuxue. These representatives were sent by the Reorganizationists. Chiang Kai-shek sent Zhong Jun. They did not reveal his real name, saying that he was Zhong Suowu. They posted an announcement stating that Zhong Suowu was a spy sent by Chiang Kai-shek and had been shot. In fact, Old Xu set him free, giving him a letter, travel expenses, and a pass. There was another character, Zhong Meiqiao, who was the younger brother of Zhong Jun. He stayed for thirty-one days in the Political Department of the Twelfth Division, and when he left, he was given a letter of introduction as a pass. He ran a secret station at Luotian to contact the representatives of Xia Douyan and Zeng Qiyu. Hundreds of soldiers died to take Yingshan, yet it became an exhibition center for their gambling, drinking, lust, and gluttony. Every day they feasted at the Xiong mansion and looked for concubines. Long Yongjun was a worker who had returned from the Soviet Union. This rotten egg was also involved. Xu Jishen, Xiong Shouxuan, and Xiao Fang said at a public meeting in Yingshan: the GMD's encirclement and suppression is too strong and the Red Army has too few soldiers. Only by supporting the GMD can we find a way out. An aide to the Twelfth Division said this. It was entirely accurate. The Twelfth Division remained at Yingshan and engaged in such activities. The entire Political Department and Political Section had Reorganizationist meetings. They said that those peasants who had been given some land and arms were gangsters of the Green and Red Gangs, local hoods, and rich peasants. Cao Zhongshen, in his letter opposing the CC's branch bureau, explained such political efforts at length: redistribution of tens of thousands of shi of land and arming tens of thousands of masses. In fact, this was to deceive himself and the CC's branch bureau. The guns for which hundreds and thousands of soldiers shed their blood and lost their lives were given to the Reorganizationists. The land was given to landlords and rich peasants. How chilling. How poisonous are the Reorganizationists!

Let us look at the situation when the Fourth Army arrived at Xinshui. A few days after its arrival, it was said that the enemy had been at Shangba for two weeks. The army headquarters immediately ordered the staff department to send out investigators. In so doing, they fell into the trap set for them. A Reorganizationist, Fan Lun, immediately sent a traitor, Tao Rong, the chief-of-staff of the Thirty-first Regiment of the Eleventh Division. When Tao left, he took with him several couriers. They did not go to Shangba, but to a place several miles from Shangba. Then he ordered the couriers to return to Xinshui, while he himself convened a Reorganizationist meeting, saying that the Fourth Army should go to Wuxue. The gold obtained at Xinshui was under the tight custody of the corps headquarters. When it was transported to the Military Affairs Committee at the rear, however, Xu Jishen gave one package to his concubine (who was the sister of Wang Ganzao and very beautiful); Xiong Shouxuan gave a package to his wife. Moreover, he gave the 76,000 silver dollars that was to be used to purchase winter clothing for the Fourth Army to the Third Party's CC and the Reorganizationists in Hubei and E-Yu-Wan. Even now one-third of the Fourth Army officers have little protection against the cold and freezing weather. An even more shameful act was the following: when the Red Army was attacking Xinshui, about 300 local despots, dressed in government-issue clothes, welcomed the Red Army with ceremonial cannon fire. The second day, dressed in blue clothes and wearing straw shoes, they all disguised themselves as peasants to welcome the Red Army with a huge rally. According to the accounts of the masses, the chair of the revolutionary committee of Xinshui was a rotten hoodlum. At that time, the Department of Military and Political Affairs did not concern itself with the matter. Zhou Weijun's headquarters was situated in a pawnshop. He feasted often, and when they finished eating and drinking, they went out to convene Reorganizationist meetings.

[[Other examples exist. Yan Desheng fired two shots at Xu Xiangqian but both missed. In the battle for Maban, we suffered many casualties, and the murderous Xu Jishen abandoned the sick and wounded, and thus many died at the hands of the Red Spear Society and the Big Sword Society.]]

Second, the Reorganizationists completely controlled the economy and conducted extensive sabotage. The head of the Department of Military Logistics, Wang Shaohuan (the general head of the Reorganizationists), abused his economic power, produced false accounting, and spread the rumor that every day those in the corps headquarters received 4.6 cents, those in the political department of the corps received 6.8 cents, while soldiers got only 1.2 cents. In this way he spread discord among the soldiers. Lu Zunwu of the Tenth Division got some clothes for Liu Ying. Lu himself then used the example of Commander Liu being well-dressed to claim that the Red Army was not equal. The commander of the Thirty-third Regiment, the traitor Gao Jiandou, asked the battalions of his regiment to compete in dispossessing local despots. As a result, they got more than 10,000 dollars and yet we received only 1,600 dollars of the total amount. No one knows where the rest of the money has gone. When he [Gao] was arrested at the security bureau, 480 dollars were found on him. Comrades, while we traveled south, every reformist had money. At their feasts, they were eating and drinking the blood of our red soldiers. The Reorganizationists engineered an enormous sabotage of the Red Army's economy. Wang Chaohuai himself claims that he spent between 20,000 and 30,000 silver dollars. This deprived our Red Army soldiers of cooking oil, salt, and decent food. These are all examples.

[[In case the 15 September mutiny at Wuxue should fail, another mutiny was arranged at Mapu on the same day. However, disagreements brought about the plot to mutiny at Huangma. We reached Mapu on 13 September and smashed their plan for revolt, arresting Pan Banfu, Zhong Xingshan, Ding Chao, and about twenty others. Following the purge, we discovered the plans of the Reorganizationists and the A.B. League.]]

When we stayed for a few days at Wumiao Village, local Reorganizationists launched activities in the Shanggu area to respond to the internal strife of the Red Army. In northwest Anhui, the Reorganizationists indeed had much strength. The recruits they had mobilized to join the Red Army were mostly bad elements. They disguised rich peasants as middle peasants and hired hands to be infiltrated into the Red Army. They stepped up their deception and oppression of the workers and peasants to prevent them from joining the Red Army in large numbers and frighten them away from us. Most party and league organizations within the Red Army were composed of members of the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party. In general, they recommended that rich peasants and hoodlums join the party and the league while suppressing workers and peasants. They promoted Reorganizationists to cadre positions while persecuting workers and peasants. Thus, the lower-level organizations and leadership of the Red Army and the party were completely controlled by the Reorganizationists. It was like the time when we, the CP, were operating within the GMD. I remember that when Zeng Zhongsheng was giving a report on the work of the Red Army at the branch bureau, Comrade [Mao] Zemin raised the criticism that there was no party presence within the Fourth Army. At the time, Comrade Zhongsheng did not take this seriously. In fact, in retrospect, we can see that party members in the Red Army at that time were not really CCP members, but GMD members; a point Comrade Zhongsheng especially denied.

[[With the internal strife, the Fourth Army could not concentrate all its power on the external enemy. To do so it had to stress the purge of counterrevolutionaries.]]

In particular, the main force of the Fourth Army reached the soviet area near Huangma to conduct a special purge. At the same time, it transferred two regiments, the Thirty-fifth and Thirty-sixth, of the Twelfth Division to Huangma to join the purge. This led to the arrest and interrogation of all the traitors who had been exposed by such substantive evidence (with the exception of a very few combat troops). Thus, the principal leaders of the traitors (Xu, Zhou, Xiong, Gao, Li Ronggui, Jiang, Xiao, and others) were arrested. The purge of counterrevolutionaries was continuously stressed as was political work for the entire unit. As a result, we have won today's great victory while the counterrevolution by the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party has suffered a serious defeat.

4) The victory of the purge—our victory with this purge was that of the tens of millions of poor workers and peasants in E-Yu-Wan and throughout China. It is a great victory under the correct leadership of the CP. The reasons for this victory are: (a) The majority of the worker-peasant soldiers and masses within the Red Army did not follow the Reorganizationists as they matured through the land revolution and the liberation struggle. Workers and peasants genuinely understood that the CP was their only leader and participated resolutely in the purge under the leadership of the CP. This dealt the Reorganizationists a disastrous defeat, as they were without the support of workers and peasants. (b) The CCP CC's Branch Bureau in E-Yu-Wan, under the correct leadership of the Fourth Plenum, resolutely carried out the purge. It mobilized the majority of the masses to counterattack the traitors and left them no place to hide. (c) The current purge within the Red Army received the assistance of the majority of the poor workers and peasants. The wave of purges within the Red Army not only gave extra momentum to local purges of counterrevolutionaries but also meant that we were able to recruit large numbers of worker-peasant cadres. Local governments kept a close watch on the purged traitors and rich peasants. In particular, local governments mobilized the masses to support the Red Army's southern move. The principal reasons for the failures of the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party were: (i) They did not have the masses of workers and peasants on their side, and they could not command the guns of the red soldiers. (ii) The counterrevolutionary program of the Reorganizationists was completely bankrupt and was rejected by the masses of workers and peasants. Their pro-imperialist capitulationist program of "reduction of rent on a two-by-five basis," "compromise between labor and capital," and a "national assembly" represents only the interest of the gentry, local tyrants, landlords, and the bourgeoisie. They used this program to slaughter workers and peasants and sabotage the soviets. It was nothing but arbitrary propaganda. (iii) The propaganda, fabrications, conspiracies, and sabotages by the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party were smashed by cast-iron realities. The particular undeniable facts were the victory of the revolution in the soviet areas, the revolutionary high tide, and the worsening bankruptcy and collapse of the GMD Reorganizationists.

Our victory not only eliminated 1,000 traitors, A.B. League members, and Third Party elements, and nearly 2,000 rich peasants, but also contributed to the following: (i) The firm implementation of the class line and the winning back of the few grass-roots masses who had been deceived by the traitors (we organized training teams and production teams and used political education to win them back). (ii) We mobilized the masses to run a check on every red soldier and officer. At the same time, we put traitors on public trial to publicize their conspiracies. (iii) We resolutely mobilized the masses to deal with the traitors' leaders. At present, all the red soldiers at the front are calling loudly for the execution of Xu Jishen, Zhou Weijun, and others. (iv) We have promoted a large number of cadres from among the workers and peasants. Now military, administrative, party, and league cadres in the Red Army have all been changed. Twelve workers have recently been promoted to the position of regimental commissar; seven or eight workers and peasants have been promoted to director of the regimental political department. Commanders and political instructors of divisions, regiments, battalions, companies, and platoons all come from among the workers, hired hands, poor peasants, and good middle peasants who have been seasoned through class struggle. (v) We have greatly strengthened and thus raised the morale and fighting power of the Red Army soldiers. (vi) We have reformed political work within the Red Army. The previously superficial political work now has an impact on the fighting soldiers. (vii) We have fundamentally reformed the party's organization and continued the purge of large numbers of rich peasants. We have recruited many active workers and peasants in the party (in the past they were completely oppressed by the Reorganizationists and rich peasants). Moreover, we have educated the majority of party and league cadres. We have truly established the leadership of the party and the proletariat. (viii) We have restructured the entire military, political, and economic organizational system. (ix) On a large scale, we have begun real and practical military and political training. (x) We have fulfilled the seven-day work plans. The Fourth Army moved south and took Huang'an. Mobilization has been expanded and is more penetrating. (xi) We have recently established the Fourth Front Army of the Chinese Red Army of Workers and Peasants and greatly strengthened the Fourth Army. Under the Fourth Front Army, we have established the Twenty-fifth Corps, and expanded the Seventy-third, Seventy-fourth, and Seventy-fifth divisions. This has enabled the Red Army to survive any losses caused by the sabotage by the Reorganizationists. Furthermore, it has expanded and strengthened the Red Army. This is our victory.

5) The current primary tasks. This does not at all mean that the anti-

Reorganizationist efforts have been completely victorious and that we do not need to continue the purge of counterrevolutionaries or that these efforts need to be suspended for a period of time. Absolutely not! Precisely because the enemy's encirclement and attack against us are continuing, the remnants of the Reorganizationists within the Red Army have not yet been eliminated. There are a very small number of rich peasants who still remain [in the Red Army]. The proletariat lacks leadership and has not yet been strengthened to the necessary extent. While the party's work is just beginning to change, the anti-Reorganizationist efforts at the local level have not yet deepened. All this shows that there are still remnants of the Reorganizationists within the Red Army. If we relax our purge slightly, it is possible that the Reorganizationists may make a comeback. Moreover, there remain within the Red Army a very small number of stubborn elements who do not want to turn themselves in. There is an even smaller minority of workers and peasants who have been deceived by the Reorganizationists or who worship particular individuals. They have been intimidated by the traitors and dare not turn themselves in. There are even some traitors for whom we have built up a file and placed under surveillance. The party wants them to wake up and turn over a new leaf, and [if they do so] we will promise them immunity and a decent position. Instead, however, they operate secretly, saying, "We now have suffered a defeat; so we temporarily suspend our activities only to resume them later." All this demonstrates that [we must continue] to use disciplinary means to deepen and intensify the effort to purge counterrevolutionaries and rich peasants politically, and the Reorganizationists, the A.B. League, and the Third Party organizationally. This remains our primary task at the moment.

Now we must:

a) Deepen all our political work so that every soldier can understand the redistribution of land, all the political programs of the soviet government, and all CC directives and resolutions—so that every soldier can understand fully that only the political programs of the CP offer a salvation. By contrast, the GMD and the Reorganizationists who are engaged in the slaughter of workers and peasants are moving day by day toward extinction.

b) We must frequently hold individual investigations of every soldier and officer; firmly oppose the rich peasants; never let a rich peasant infiltrate our ranks; firmly recruit and promote cadres from among the workers and peasants.

c) Expand and strengthen the responsibilities and activities of party and league members so that they may become real models for, and leaders of, the masses; recruit good workers and peasants and strengthen political education.

d) Local governments should utilize fully the experiences and lessons of purging counterrevolutionaries in the Fourth Army and plunge into the work of purging so that counterrevolutionaries will have no place to hide. In particular, this means the reform of all operations of the party, the league, the soviets, and the labor unions, so that the majority of the Red Army soldiers, hired hands, poor peasants, and middle peasants may reap the benefits of the land revolution and so that the Reorganizationists have no opportunity to stir up trouble.

Comrades, the Fourth Army of the Red Army now is a genuine worker-peasant army. It is truly the pillar of the red areas in E-Yu-Wan. It is a weapon to overthrow GMD rule. With such changes, however, cadres become a serious problem. Thus, I have the following requests for the conference:

Comrades, at the moment, the revolutionary tide is rising even higher, while counterrevolutionary rule is collapsing even faster. The Japanese imperialists have occupied the three northeastern provinces and partitioned China. They are attacking the Soviet Union and suppressing the Chinese revolution. At the same time, Chiang Kai-shek, Wang Jingwei, and all the counterrevolutionaries are surrendering to the imperialists in order to seek a compromise so that they can attack the soviet areas together. We should continue tirelessly and relentlessly to purge the counterrevolutionaries. We should use the victory of smashing the enemy's second encirclement campaign to prepare for a large counterattack on the enemy and further smash the enemy's third encirclement campaign. This will strengthen the soviet areas in E-Yu-Wan and help the attempt to bring about an initial revolutionary victory in one or several provinces. Final victory is ours.

D.6 Resolution of the Xiang-Exi Provincial Committee on Comrade Deng Zhongxia (9 December 1931)⁴⁵

The party in the Xiang-Exi [West Hunan–Hubei] area and in the Second Army Corps of the Red Army, under the former leadership of Comrade Deng Zhongxia,⁴⁶ did not implement the policy of consolidation and development. As a result, many Red Army units fled from the soviet areas to the mountains. This has caused a drastic reduction in the soviet areas and serious damage to the Red Army during the enemy's encirclement offensives. In particular, no effective steps were taken to divert the enemy force from attacking the Central Soviet Area. This meant that the main force of the Red Army in Jiangxi faced numerous difficulties in its battles. This was caused by Comrade Deng Zhongxia's serious political errors.

2) Comrade Deng Zhongxia's party leadership in the Xiang-Exi area and in the Second Army Corps of the Red Army amounted to the implementation of the [Li] Lisan line (the rich peasant line, adventurism, and fleeing from soviet areas) in violation of the Comintern line. It then openly drifted toward a line of right opportunism (flight toward the mountains, overestimation of enemy strength, and pessimism about the revolution) when the Lisan line caused setbacks. These indisputable facts were obvious to all.

3) A key point in Comrade Deng Zhongxia's errors was his distrust of the strength of the masses. It was 100 percent mountaintopism. During the attack on Jinli in Hunan, he advanced the strange theory of "leaving the water to take to the land." He also mistakenly considered the ideal revolutionary base area as being situated in "rugged mountains good for defense." This was the major reason for choosing Wufeng and Hefeng in west Hubei as the base area, the opening up of new base areas at Jingmen, Tangyang, and Yuanan, and the retreat of Red Army troops toward west Hubei. Therefore, he credited the victory of the Red Army in Jiangxi to the "superior terrain at Donggu." Because he confused a revolutionary base with "mountains," he attached a priority to "mountains" in all military operations. He thought about "winning over the masses everywhere" using dependable "mountain positions." For this reason, he shared the liquidationist dislike of the Honghu base, which is devoid of mountains. Therefore, he put forward the shameful opportunist thesis of "leaving the water to take to the land," deeming that "Honghu is a sanctuary good only for small units" and that "to return to Honghu is to hole up in a well without chance of rescue." He adopted a contemptibly hostile attitude toward the Honghu base and despised it. He said sarcastically, "What is good about Honghu? All it has are 'free brothels,' " thus preventing the Red Army cadres and warriors from demanding a return to their revolutionary base areas. He committed the crime of tarring the revolution with scandal.

4) Under the leadership of Comrade Deng Zhongxia's persistent opportunist line, the party program could not be enforced. The Party Center once criticized him for "forgetting the important responsibility of the Red Army of workers and peasants toward the Chinese soviet revolution and the basic task of the land revolution," and for "giving up the work of developing mass struggles and of organizing the masses, abandoning the work among trade unions altogether, and doing nothing to carry out the task of reforming and consolidating the Red Army." This criticism was entirely correct. Yet, he still tried to conceal the real face of his opportunism with the "leftist" lie of "creating new base areas."

5) The provincial committee deems that Comrade Deng Zhongxia is completely insincere in admitting his own errors. He has simply attempted to put the blame on others. Though he admitted in a perfunctory manner certain errors in the reports, he concluded that the "errors were caused first by the Party Center in the period of reconciliation and later by the special committee in the Xiang-Exi area." In other words, it was not he, but the Party Center and the special committee, that had caused these errors. In fact, during the period of reconciliation some of his errors did originate with the Party Center. However, Comrade Deng Zhongxia was sent to the Xiang-Exi area to "consolidate and develop" the Comintern line. He did precisely the opposite. The provincial committee does not deny the errors made by the special committee during the period of the Lisan line. However, when the Second Army Corps was instructed to attack Jinli from Shimen, the special committee instructed "the Second Army Corps to return to the battle line of Nanxian, Huayong, Anxiang, and Gong'an and then fan out in waves." When it received Deng Zhongxia's report about the withdrawal to Yanglin, it again instructed "the Second Army Corps to return to the battle line of Nanxian, Huayong, Anxiang, and Gong'an so as to advance with a rear base and push forward from a fixed position." This was an entirely correct instruction. After the retreat of the Second Army Corps into the mountains, the special committee dispatched no fewer than thirty couriers to ask "the Second Army Corps to return to the soviet areas to coordinate with the broad masses to break through the enemy's encirclement." This was also a correct view. In light of these facts, Comrade Deng Zhongxia cannot legitimately blame the Party Center in the period of conciliation for the error of his departure from this soviet area and his flight into the mountains. Further, he should not blame the special committee for his wanderings of the past few months. Had he listened to the special committee's instructions, it would have been possible for him to return to the soviet area after the battle at Jinli or later after his withdrawal to Wufeng and Hefeng. He would have been correct if he had done that. He would also have made the right move if he had returned to the soviet area following his arrival at Jinmen. Moreover, Comrade Deng Zhongxia used the March instruction to repudiate the special committee's instructions of the Party Center the previous month. He deliberately confused the Party Center's instructions of 29 June to the Second Army Corps with those of the Central Bureau and the provincial committee's instructions that were based on the Party Center's instructions. This was an obvious attempt at confusion in order to cover up his own mistakes. He even refused to accept the criticism by the Party Center and the Central Bureau of his policy of "alliance with rich peasants" and his "anti-Comintern errors" during his tenure of office in the Comintern.⁴⁷ He rejected these criticisms as mere slander. This was a non-Bolshevik attitude.

6) The provincial committee agrees entirely with the resolution of the Front Committee of the Third Army on Comrade Deng Zhongxia. It agrees with the Party Center's request to relieve him of all posts and send him to work among the masses at the lower levels so that he may see his errors. In addition, the provincial committee has decided to give Comrade Deng Zhongxia one last serious warning and ask the Party Center to decide about his party membership.

D.7 Outline of the Constitution of the Chinese Soviet Republic (7 November 1931)⁴⁸

The First All-China Soviet Congress hereby proclaims before the toiling masses of China and of the whole world this Constitution of the Chinese Soviet Republic, which recites the basic tasks to be accomplished throughout all China.

The accomplishment of these tasks has already begun in the existing soviet areas. However, the First All-China Soviet Congress holds that the complete realization of these tasks can come only after the overthrow of the rule of imperialism and the GMD and the establishment of the rule of the Soviet Republic throughout all China. Only then will this outline Constitution of the Chinese Soviet Republic find more concrete application and become a more detailed constitution of the Chinese Soviet Republic.

The First All-China Soviet Congress calls on all Chinese workers, peasants, and laboring masses to carry out the struggle, under the guidance of the provisional government of the Soviet Republic, for the realization of these basic tasks:

1) The task of the Constitution of the Chinese Soviet Republic is to guarantee the democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry in the soviet areas and to secure the triumph of the dictatorship throughout the whole of China. This dictatorship aims to destroy all feudal remnants, to eliminate the influence of the imperialist powers in China, to unite China, to limit systematically the development of capitalism, to carry out economic reconstruction of the state, to promote the class-consciousness and solidarity of the proletariat, and to rally to its banner the broad masses of poor peasants in order to effect the transition to the dictatorship of the proletariat.

2) The Chinese soviet regime is setting up a state based on the democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants. All the power of the soviet shall belong to the workers, peasants, and Red Army soldiers and the entire laboring population. Under the soviet regime the workers, peasants, Red Army soldiers, and the entire laboring population shall have the right to elect their own deputies to give effect to their power. Only militarists, bureaucrats, landlords, the despotic gentry, capitalists, rich peasants, monks, and all exploiting and counterrevolutionary elements shall be deprived of the right to elect deputies to participate in the government and to enjoy political freedom.

3) In the Chinese Soviet Republic supreme power shall be vested in the All-China Congress of Soviets of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies. In between congresses, the supreme organ of power shall be the All-China CEC of the Soviets; the CEC shall appoint a Council of People's Commissars, which shall conduct all governmental affairs and promulgate laws, decrees, and resolutions.

4) All workers, peasants, Red Army soldiers, and all laborers and their families, regardless of sex, religion, or nationality (Han Chinese, Manchus, Mongolians, Muslims, Tibetans, Miao, Li, as well as all Koreans, Taiwanese, Annamese, etc., living in China) shall be equal before the soviet law, and shall be citizens of the Soviet Republic. In order that the workers, peasants, soldiers, and laboring masses may actually hold the reins of power, the following regulations concerning soviet elections shall be established: All the above-mentioned soviet citizens of sixteen years or older shall be entitled to vote and to be voted for in the elections of the soviets. [They] shall elect deputies to all congresses of workers, peasants, and soldiers (soviets); they shall discuss and decide all national and local political questions. The method of electing deputies [is as follows]. The workers shall elect their deputies in the factories; the artisans, peasants, and urban poor shall elect deputies according to their place of residence. Deputies to the local soviets shall be elected by these basic units [i.e., factory districts] for a definite term; they shall participate in the work of one of the organizations or commissions attached to the town or village soviets and shall periodically submit reports to their electors concerning their activities. The electors shall have the right at all times to recall their deputies and demand new elections. Since only the proletariat can lead the broad masses of peasants and laborers to socialism, the Chinese soviet regime grants special rights to the proletariat in the elections to the soviets by allowing it a greater number of deputies.

5) The purpose of the soviet regime is to improve thoroughly the living conditions of the working class, to pass labor legislation, to introduce the eight-hour working day, to fix a minimum wage, and to institute social insurance and state assistance to the unemployed as well as to grant the workers the right to supervise production.

6) In setting itself the task of abolishing feudalism and radically improving the living conditions of the peasants, the soviet regime of China shall pass a land law and shall order the confiscation of the land of all landlords and its distribution among the poor and middle peasants, with a view to the ultimate nationalization of the land.

7) The purpose of the soviet regime of China is to defend the interests of the workers and peasants and restrict the development of capitalism, with a view to liberating the laboring masses from capitalist exploitation and leading them to the socialist order of society. [The soviet government of China] shall announce the abolition of all burdensome taxation and miscellaneous levies introduced during the counterrevolutionary regime and shall put into effect a single progressive income tax. It shall harshly suppress all attempts at wrecking and sabotage in the party by either native or foreign capitalists; it shall pursue an economic policy beneficial to the workers and peasant masses, which shall be understood by these masses and which shall lead to socialism.

8) The soviet regime of China shall set itself the goal of freeing China from the yoke of imperialism. It shall declare the complete sovereignty and independence of the Chinese people, shall refuse to recognize any political or economic privileges for the imperialists in China, and shall abolish all unequal treaties and foreign loans contracted by the counterrevolutionary governments. No foreign imperialist troops, whether land, sea, or air, shall be allowed to be stationed on any territory of the Chinese soviets. All concessions or territories leased by the imperialists in China shall be unconditionally returned to China. All custom houses, railways, steamship companies, mining enterprises, factories, etc., in the hands of the imperialists shall be confiscated and nationalized. At the present time, it shall be permissible for foreign enterprises to renew their leases (for their various businesses) and to continue production, provided they fully comply with the laws of the soviet government.

9) The soviet government of China will do its utmost to develop and ensure the final victory of the workers and peasants' revolution throughout the whole of China. It declares that it is incumbent on all laboring masses to participate in the revolutionary class struggle. The gradual introduction of universal military service and the change from voluntary to compulsory military service shall be especially worked out. The right to bear arms in defense of the revolution shall be granted only to workers, peasants, and the laboring masses; all counterrevolutionary and exploiting elements must be completely disarmed.

10) The soviet government of China guarantees the workers, peasants, and laborers freedom of speech and the press as well as the right to assembly; it is opposed to bourgeois and landlord democracy, but is in favor of the democracy of the worker and peasant masses. It breaks down the economic and political prerogatives of the bourgeoisie and the landlords in order to remove all obstacles placed by the reactionaries on the workers and peasants' road to freedom. The workers, peasants, and laboring masses shall enjoy the use of printing shops, meeting halls, and similar establishments by the power of a people's regime, as a material basis for the realization of these rights and liberties. Furthermore, under the soviet regime, all propaganda and other similar activities by reactionaries shall be suppressed and all exploiters be deprived of all political liberties.

11) It is the purpose of the soviet government of China to guarantee the thorough emancipation of women; it recognizes freedom of marriage and will put into operation various measures for the protection of women, to enable women gradually to attain the material basis required for their emancipation from the bondage of domestic work, and to give them the possibility of participating in the social, economic, political, and cultural life of the entire society.

12) The soviet government of China shall guarantee to all workers, peasants, and the laboring masses the right to education. The soviet government will, as far as the conditions of internal revolutionary war allow, begin at once to introduce free universal education. Above all, the soviet government shall defend the interests of laboring youth and give them every opportunity of participating in the political and cultural revolutionary life with a view to developing new social forces.

13) The soviet government of China guarantees true religious freedom to the workers, peasants, and the laboring population. Adhering to the principle of the complete separation of church and state, the soviet state neither favors nor grants any financial assistance to any religion whatsoever. All soviet citizens shall enjoy the right to engage in antireligious propaganda. No religious institution of the imperialists shall be allowed to exist unless it complies with soviet law.

14) The soviet government of China recognizes the right of self-determination of the national minorities in China, their right to complete separation from China and to the formation of an independent state for each national minority. All Mongolians, Muslims [Hui], Tibetans, Miao, Yao, Koreans, and others living on the territory of China shall enjoy the full right to self-determination, i.e., they may either join the Union of Chinese Soviets or secede from it and form their own state as they prefer. The soviet regime of China will do its utmost to assist the national minorities in liberating themselves from the yoke of the imperialists, the GMD warlords, the nobility, the lamas, the tribal headmen from the national minorities [tusi], and others, in achieving complete freedom and autonomy. The soviet regime must encourage the development of the national cultures and of the respective national languages of these peoples.

15) The Chinese regime offers asylum to Chinese and foreign revolutionaries persecuted for their revolutionary activities; it will assist and lead them in recovering their strength so that they may fight with increased vigor for the victory of the revolution.

16) All foreign toilers living in areas under the jurisdiction of the soviet regime shall enjoy equal rights as stipulated by soviet law.

17) The soviet regime of China declares its readiness to form a united revolutionary front with the world proletariat and all oppressed peoples and proclaims the Soviet Union, the land of proletarian dictatorship, to be its loyal ally.

D.8 Land Law of the Soviet Republic (November 1931)⁴⁹

The peasant struggle launched under the leadership of the proletariat continues to develop and each day rises to new heights. Despite the violent resistance of the imperialists and militarists, the soviet movement grows and expands. In one area after another the Chinese peasantry, armed and organized in the ranks of the Red Army, casts off the centuries-old yoke of feudal barons and landlords, the village bosses [tuhao], and the gentry; it confiscates and redistributes the land of these oppressors; it demolishes the feudal order of society, destroys the power of the GMD, and builds up the workers and peasants' Soviet regime—a regime which will consistently and finally accomplish tasks in the anti-imperialist and rural revolutions.

The First All-China Congress of Soviets of Workers', Peasants', and Soldiers' Deputies ratifies the confiscation of the lands of the landlords and of other big private landowners. In order to establish uniform regulations for the confiscation and distribution of land, the First [All-China Soviet] Congress, in defense of the interests of the basic peasant masses and in order to safeguard the further development of the revolution, has passed the following land law, which will best secure the solution of the rural question.

Article 1: All the lands of the feudal landlords, village bosses, gentry, militarists, and other big private landowners shall be subject to confiscation without any compensation whatever, irrespective of whether they themselves work their lands or rent them out on lease. The soviets will distribute the confiscated lands among the poor and middle peasants. The former owners of confiscated lands shall not be entitled to receive any land allotment. Hired farmhands, coolies, and toiling laborers shall enjoy equal rights to land allotments, regardless of sex. Independent workers living in villages who have lost their previous work shall likewise be entitled to a portion of the land, subject to the consent of the peasant masses. Aged persons, orphans, and widows who are not in a position to work and who have no relatives on whom to depend shall be given social relief by the soviet government, or be taken care of after the land redistribution.

Article 2: The Red Army is the front rank fighter in the defense of the soviet government and in the overthrow of the rule of imperialism and the government of landlords and capitalists. Therefore, each Red Army soldier must be given a plot of land, and the soviet government must see to it that the land is tilled, whether or not his home is in the soviet area or in an area ruled by the reactionaries.

Article 3: It is a peculiar feature of the Chinese rich peasant that he is at one and the same time a landowner and a usurer; therefore, his land shall also be subject to confiscation. If a rich peasant, after his land has been confiscated, does not participate in any counterrevolutionary activities and works his land by the use of his own labor power, he may be assigned land, but not of the best quality.

Article 4: All the property and lands of all counterrevolutionary organizations and of the military organizations of the White Army, as well as of the active participants in counterrevolution, shall be confiscated. However, exceptions to this rule shall be permitted in the case of poor and middle peasants who have been drawn into the struggle against the soviets because of their ignorance. [These] shall be granted pardons by the local soviets, but their leaders shall without fail be dealt with according to the provision of the present law.

Article 5: The First [All-China Soviet] Congress recognizes the principle that an egalitarian distribution of land is the most thorough method of destroying all feudal agrarian relations and the shackles of the private ownership of land by the landlords. However, the local soviet governments shall on no account carry out this measure by force or by an order issued by higher authorities, but shall explain this procedure to the peasantry from every angle. This measure may be put into operation only with the direct support and at the desire of the basic masses of the peasantry. Thus, if the majority of the middle peasants so desire, they may [be allowed] not to participate in the redistribution [of land].

Article 6: All lands belonging to religious institutions or to temples and all other public lands shall be unconditionally delivered into the possession of the peasants by the soviet government. However, in disposing of these lands, it shall be essential to obtain the voluntary support of the peasants, so that their religious feelings may not be offended.

Article 7: The rich peasants seek to have the land distributed according to the means of production. The First [All-China Soviet] Congress considers this to be a counterrevolutionary effort on the part of the rich peasants to hinder the development of the rural revolution and to further their own ends, and it must be strictly prohibited. The local soviets, in conformity with the local conditions in each village, shall choose the method [of land division] most advantageous to the poor and middle peasants, i.e., either division on a mixed principle according to the number of consumer workers in each family, or division of the land among the middle and poor peasants, as well as hired farmhands, in equal portions according to the number of consumers, and among the rich peasants according to the labor power supplied by them (i.e., in localities where egalitarian distribution shall take place according to the number of consumers, every rich peasant capable of working shall receive as much land as is allotted to one consumer). In dividing up the land, not only the area of the land assigned but also the quality of its soil (especially its productivity) shall be taken into consideration. Furthermore, in dividing up the land it shall be essential to introduce all possible land reforms in order to create the necessary conditions for destroying feudal remnants like state-owned uncultivated land, scattered land holdings, or demarcating lines running across fields.

D.9 Resolution of the CCP CC on Winning Initial Revolutionary Successes in One or More Provinces (9 January 1932)⁵⁰

I) The heavy blow of the world economic crisis and the oppression and exploitation of the landlords and warlords have led the Chinese national economy to the verge of general collapse. Depression has occurred in all sectors of the economy. The industrial crisis has severely damaged major branches of light industry. For example, silk factories, textile plants, and flour mills are now all in crisis: the silk factories in Shanghai are operating at 20 percent of capacity. The situation is similar in other cities, with the result that over 100,000 workers in the silk industry have lost their jobs. Textile plants such as Houshang and Sanxing have gone bankrupt, but the production of Japanese textile factories in Shanghai has increased rapidly. Only half of the flour mills are now operating fully. Heavy industry has been further monopolized by the foreign capitalists. The conditions of the rural economy are even worse. In addition to the exploitation and oppression of the landlords and usurers, the looting of the warlords, and the plundering of the imperialists, there is also unprecedented flooding. Several hundred thousand peasants have drowned, several hundred thousand houses have been destroyed by floods, and tens of millions of peasants are starving and freezing in the cold winter. The flood has destroyed altogether 1.4 billion mu of crops. The oppression and the exploitation of the GMD regime and the imperialists have caused the unprecedented flooding, but they have done nothing to help these starving and freezing peasants in the flood-stricken areas. The GMD regime has issued 80 million yuan of government bonds for flood relief, increased dozens of taxes and levies, and taken loans at high interest from the American imperialists in order to buy wheat from the United States. However, none of the money or food has been sent to the flood victims. On the contrary, the GMD regime has used the excuse of emergency relief and industrial relief further to exploit the people. They have increased dozens of taxes and levies in the flood-stricken areas. Taking advantage of the surplus cheap labor power, the numerous jobless workers, and the landless peasants, and the capitalists have further reduced the wages of the workers and increased their working time. The landlords and usurers are also taking this opportunity to make more profits. The catastrophe of the national economy has brought millions of workers and peasants horrible suffering, poverty, hunger, disease, and death. The bitterness of the working people has increased to an unbearable degree.

II) The heavy blow of the economic crisis, the deterioration of the national economy, and the bitterness of millions of workers and peasants have intensified the revolutionary struggle. Against this background, the soviet movement in China has achieved many great victories. The GMD regime has failed to check the rapid progress of the revolutionary movement, much less wiped it out. The GMD warlords met with total failure during all three "encirclement campaigns" while the Red Army has routed over fifteen divisions of GMD troops. In the battles of the third "encirclement campaign," the Red Army in south Jiangxi alone captured over 10,000 rifles, 5 million bullets, 150 machine guns, and took 20,000 prisoners of war. Since then, the Red Army has won many new victories. In the Fujian-Guangdong-Jiangxi area, we have recovered the Hang-Wu-Yong soviet area, taken over Yongding, Dingzhou, and Liancheng, and expanded our territory to Ninghua and Qingliu. In the northeast Jiangxi area, we have not only linked up the territory with the Chong'an-Qianshan soviet area in north Fujian, but also advanced toward the Zhejiang-Anhui border and taken over the counties of Changshan and Wuyuan. In the E-Yu-Wan area, smashing the scheme of the counterrevolutionaries to sabotage the Red Army, we have greatly strengthened soviet political power and the Red Army and have taken over the counties of Yingshan, Houqiu, and Huang'an. In the west Hunan-Hubei area, under the command of Comrade He Long, the Third Army has joined forces with the Ninth Division, thus further consolidating the Honghu Base Area. Now they are fighting heroically against the enemy to found a new base on the northern bank of the Xiang River. In both the Hunan-Hubei-Jiangxi and the Hunan-Jiangxi border areas, our forces have expanded throughout the territory and are now moving toward Puqi, Jiayu, Shangyou, and Chongyi. In the Central Soviet Area, apart from recovering the territory we held before the first "encirclement campaign," we have taken over the counties of Huichang, Xunwu, Anyuan, and Xingfeng in south Jiangxi and are now besieging the central city there—Ganzhou.⁵¹ Since the revolt of the Twenty-sixth Army (over 20,000 soldiers) of Sun Liangzhong's forces and their joining the Red Army, Ningdu and Guangchang have again fallen into our hands, and now the news has arrived that our troops have taken over Fuzhou. Ji'an has been completely isolated. The reactionary regime now has control of only eight or nine counties along the Nanchang-Jiujiang Railway throughout the whole of Jiangxi Province. The Red Army has tempered itself on the bloody battlefield of the current civil war. Armed with weapons captured from the enemy forces, it has build itself into a powerful army and a tough and strong fist of the revolutionary movement. Moreover, we have uncovered counterrevolutionary organizations inside the soviet area, firmly gotten rid of the evil influence of the Lisan line, distributed the confiscated land to the farmhands and poor peasants, reorganized the soviet government, and eliminated the alien class elements who sneaked into the revolutionary ranks. All these achievements have greatly raised the revolutionary initiative and enthusiasm of the workers and peasants and heightened the prestige of soviet political power among them. The establishment of the All-China Soviet Central Provisional Government [quanguo suweiqu zhongyang linshi zhengfu] has provided the revolutionary movement in both the soviet and nonsoviet areas with general guidance, hence guaranteeing more effective proletarian leadership over the peasants' rural revolution. Our task at present is to strive for the expansion of territory in order to link up the separated soviet areas and struggle hard to win an initial victory of the revolution in one or several provinces [emphasis here and below in original].

III) The triumph of the Red Army and the soviet movement and the decline of the GMD regime have made the imperialists switch from secret armed interference (such as providing reactionary forces with weapons and ammunition, money, and military advisors) to direct, open aggression. Japan's armed occupation of Manchuria is a clear example. It is the prelude to the redivision of China by the imperialists and a dangerous and concrete step toward an attack on the Soviet Union. Japanese imperialism not only plans to turn Manchuria into its own colony as well as a military base for invasion of the Soviet Union, but also wants to attempt to take over North China and attack the Mongolian People's Republic using running dogs such as Han Fuqu, Yan Xishan, and Feng Yuxiang. The French imperialists agree entirely with Japan's actions and have aided it because France has the ambition to take Yunnan and Guizhou Provinces away from China and plans to attack the Soviet Union. British imperialists are also willing to support Japan as long as the latter does not violate Britain's interests in China. Hoping to bring all of China under its control, the American imperialists adopted a wait-and-see attitude at the beginning of the Manchurian Incident.⁵² In reality, this was acquiescence that allowed the Japanese imperialists to exploit the Chinese people and establish an antisoviet base area. Now as the [Manchurian] Incident continues, conflict has arisen between the United States and the imperialist group headed by Japan and Britain. This is the current situation: the various imperialist countries have agreed with each other to prepare for the antisoviet war, turning Manchuria into an anti-soviet military base, exploiting the Chinese people, and suppressing the Chinese revolution. (The United States and the countries of the League of Nations are in essence the same robbers and aggressors of China.) However, they scheme and clash against each other trying to divide the spheres of influence in China and on seizing China's rich natural resources. At present, however, the focus of their plot is to prepare for the antisoviet war, carve up China, and suppress directly and openly the Chinese revolutionary struggle. At present, they are rapidly implementing this plan. The progress of the Red Army and the soviet movement have made the imperialists interfere more openly with armed forces in the Chinese revolution. The confrontation between the worker-peasant revolutionary movement in China and the armed forces of the imperialists is thus inevitable. Therefore, our party's mission is to mobilize, organize, direct, and arm millions of the working-class and peasant masses in order to launch a revolutionary national liberation war to defend China, to fight against the Japanese and all other imperialists, and to win the liberation, independence, and unification of China.

IV) The deterioration of the economy, the triumph of the Red Army and the soviet movement, and the imperialists' invasion of China and suppression of the Chinese revolution are the three basic elements that have brought about the rapid development of the Chinese revolutionary struggle. The collapse of the national economy caused by the economic crisis has caused millions of workers and peasants to lead an extremely miserable life. Having lost jobs and land and suffered hunger and coldness, they have realized that there are only two choices before them: either to wait for death or to rise up and fight. In this way, they have participated in the revolutionary struggle. The soviet movement and the Red Army under the guidance of the CP have become the backbone of the new revolution and the leaders as well as the organizers of the working people's struggle all over China. The success has pointed out a road toward national liberation and social progress for the broad masses of the working people under the GMD's rule. The Manchurian Incident has awakened the national consciousness of the working people and the petty bourgeoisie in cities and in the countryside, raised their revolutionary enthusiasm, and stimulated their hatred and anger toward imperialism. The GMD regime's submission to the imperialists has further promoted and shifted the anti-imperialist movement to the direct revolutionary struggle against GMD rule.

The labor movement in cities is on the rise. Despite the prohibition by the GMD regime, strikes have frequently occurred: at factories, in mines, on railways, on ships, and among coolies and rickshaw pullers. Although most strikes have economic goals, there is a close association between economic and political goals. The strikes often last for a long time. These are the characteristics of the current labor movement. Strikes against imperialism are no longer an isolated phenomena. In some cities, general strikes have already broken out. For example, in Taiyuan, there was a one-day general strike. There have also been joint operations by workers in the same trade, such as the general strikes held by the shipbuilding workers, textile workers, printing workers, and civil construction workers in Shanghai. The working class has fought heroically to resist the persecution of the GMD regime, the capitalists, and the yellow trade unions. As the GMD regime is now in decline, the antilabor nature of the yellow trade unions has been gradually exposed. As a result, the struggle against the yellow trade unions has developed vigorously. However, the yellow trade unions are not willing to take their defeat lying down. They have schemed to come up with various new ways to deceive the workers and have tried to sabotage the labor movement by leading it in a wrong direction. In addition, there are some workers who still have illusions about the yellow trade unions. We must also be fully aware that most of the strikes are spontaneous, and the leadership of our party and the red trade union among workers is very weak. So far we have not made a patient or painstaking effort to organize working-class strikes. Because of erroneous strategy and tactics, some strikes launched by the red trade unions have met with failure. We have not studied carefully the experience of strikes and have not tried hard enough to win over the workers in the yellow trade unions. Meanwhile, the struggle against right opportunism among the red trade unions has not fully unfolded. We have not formed a strong link between the red trade unions and the masses of the workers.

The anti-imperialist movement has drawn millions more people to participate in the revolutionary struggle, and it has been transformed from presenting peaceful petitions to violent demonstrations in which the participants fight with their fists against the police and destroy the GMD organizations and government offices. Based on their experience of struggle during the recent months, the broad masses of the people have realized that the GMD regime has shamelessly submitted to the imperialists. They have been aware that unless they overthrow the GMD regime and build up a government by the people, they cannot win national independence and liberation. Thus, demanding political power and the establishment of a people's government have become the common desire among the broad masses of the people. There have even been a few initial attempts in this respect such as the establishment of the people's courts. So far, however, this movement is sponsored mainly by the students. The working class has not become the main force in the anti-imperialist struggle. Hence, it lacks persistence, an indomitable spirit, and clear ideas. Our party has not built up a strong leadership through the struggle or exposed the nature of all the reactionaries. Some party organizations are lagging behind the masses, some fear criticizing the tendency of bourgeois liberalism among the students, and others (such as in Shanxi) have even adopted the absolutely wrong policy of closed-doorism and abandoned the leadership of the anti-imperialist movement. In general, we have not been able to combine closely the anti-imperialist movement with the economic struggles of the working class.

The struggle launched by the peasants in GMD-controlled areas has developed rapidly. The peasants boycott taxes and levies, seize grain and distribute food, destroy GMD offices, and organize guerrilla warfare. In some areas, uprisings have even broken out in which the peasants took over the towns of county seats (such as Changle).

There are also mutinies and revolts among the GMD soldiers. The Twenty-sixth Army, with over 20,000 soldiers, revolted, and all joined the Red Army. There are individual mutinies and revolts in various areas. These facts demonstrate that the progress of the rural revolution has affected the reactionary army and caused its collapse. On the other hand, however, our strength among the peasants and the GMD soldiers is still quite weak, and there remains the pessimistic influence of opportunism.

V) The triumph of the Red Army and the soviet movement, the rise of the worker-peasant revolutionary struggle in GMD-controlled areas, and the conflicts and schemes between the different imperialist countries have brought down the Chiang Kai-shek military dictatorship. Having ruled China for four years, this decadent regime has sold out the national interest and has exploited and suppressed the working people. But Chiang's group continues to have the dominant influence in the new government. The government is a coalition of various factions inside the GMD. In essence, the new regime is still one of landlord-bourgeois dictatorship and it has adopted the same domestic and foreign policies. Since there is a strong pro-Japanese faction in the new regime, it will submit more completely to Japanese imperialism and betray our national interests. Meanwhile, this regime is no more than an unstable, transitional government. Supported by different imperialist groups, the various warlord factions have sped up their preparation for a new warlord war, which so far has been checked by the victory of the Red Army and the rise of the anti-Japanese movement throughout China.

The current situation proves that the GMD regime has definitely collapsed. The broad masses of the people have seen through the GMD's dirty tricks and its shameless submission to the imperialists. Hence, its contemptible means and arbitrary propaganda can no longer deceive the people. In light of this background, all the reactionary opposition parties now begin to work actively. They include the "National Salvation Conference" of the Reorganizationists, the "Disaster Relief Committee" of the old politicians in Jiangsu Province, the "Peace Cabinet" of the Third Party, and the "Convention for a National Assembly and People's Government" set up by the Trotskyite-Chen Duxiu Liquidationists. The purpose of these parties is the same—to help the GMD maintain its rule. They advocate "government-people cooperation" in order to divert the struggle of the people to overthrow the GMD regime. These organizations will be the most dangerous enemies when the revolutionary high tide arrives. Thus, we should concentrate our strength to strike at these reactionaries who call for compromise.

VI) Analyzing the current situation, we must realize that the balance of the domestic class forces has changed, and that this change is favorable for the workers, peasants, the Red Army, and the soviet movement. The strength of all the factions within the GMD has been weakened. On the other hand, the worker-peasant struggle and the soviet movement are growing stronger. The Red Army has now become a very powerful force, and the soviet government controls areas with a population of millions. The Red Army and the guerrilla forces have now surrounded a number of large or middle-sized cities such as Nanchang, Wuhan, and Ji'an. We used to avoid attacking large cities. This strategy was correct in the past but is no longer right because circumstances have changed. Our task now is to expand the territory, link up the separated soviet areas to form an integrated soviet area, and take advantage of the present favorable political and military conditions to seize one or two important central cities so as to win an initial victory of the revolution in one or more provinces. Now is the time to put this task on the agenda of the party and the soviet movement. In order to complete this general task, the party must further strengthen the Red Army and consolidate soviet political power as well as its Central Provisional Government. We must carry out the correct land, labor, and economic policies in order to serve the interests of the workers and peasants, make every effort to wage the worker-peasant revolutionary struggle in the GMD-controlled areas, improve our direction of the anti-imperialist movement, strengthen our leadership over the spontaneous strikes by the workers, organize workers into red trade unions, win over the masses in the yellow trade unions, launch and guide the peasant struggle, enhance our work to sabotage the GMD army, and win over the enemy soldiers.

VII) First of all, with regard to our work in the soviet areas, the Red Army must operate more actively. Its troops must act in close cooperation with each other and launch offensives in accordance with the present favorable conditions. It should follow the recent CC instruction on military issues to link up the Central Soviet Area, and the Fujian-Guangdong-Jiangxi, northeast Jiangxi, Hunan-Hubei-Jiangxi, and Hunan-Jiangxi areas to form a large integrated soviet area. It should aim at taking over the central cities such as Nanchang, Fuzhou, and Ji'an, so as to unite the present scattered soviet base areas together. In this way, we can win an initial victory of the revolution in the provinces of Hunan, Hubei, and Jiangxi. To the north of the Yangtze River, taking the E-Yu-Wan area as its core, the Red Army should link up northeast Anhui, east Hubei, the Hubei-Henan border, and the west Hunan-Hubei areas to create a position that will threaten Wuhan, the upper and lower reaches of the Yangtze River, and the Beijing-Hankou Railway. To mount successful revolutionary offensives, we must strengthen the Red Army, improve the political education of the Red Army fighters and their class background, and raise their revolutionary consciousness. Only in this way can we defeat all the reactionaries' schemes to sabotage the Red Army.

Second, a correct solution to the land problem is of decisive significance in raising the revolutionary enthusiasm and creativeness of the working people and for paving the way for the success of the soviet movement. We must forbid anyone issuing orders in the name of the soviet government to force the equal distribution of land. Land redistribution should be carried out to develop the organizational and creative abilities of the peasants. Our party's principle in distributing land is to defend the interests of the farmhands and poor peasants, oppose the rich peasants, and take care of the middle peasants. Without the permission of the middle peasants, no one should change or replace their land. The party must confiscate without hesitation all the land of the landlords and distribute it to the coolies, farmhands, poor peasants, and middle peasants. Since most of the rich peasants are feudal exploiters, their land should also be confiscated. However, they should be given a small lot of bad "subsistence land" on the condition that they farm it themselves.

Third, the party must rectify immediately all the radical and immature economic and tax policies as well as measures that have violated the interests of the peasant masses (such as the attempt to organize collective farms in northeast Jiangxi and the heavy taxes in the E-Yu-Wan area). Poor peasants should be exempted from all taxation.

Fourth, we should reorganize the soviet government at the grass-roots level, ruthlessly purge all counterrevolutionaries and alien class elements, and raise the enthusiasm and creativeness of the people to develop the soviet movement. It is necessary to improve the daily work of the soviet government because it is an important means to consolidate soviet political power.

Fifth, since neglecting labor protection and improvement of the living standard of the workers will provide the class enemy a good excuse to sabotage the proletarian leadership, we must not delay any longer the founding of the red trade unions among the workers in the soviet areas, and we should immediately choose capable cadres to implement this task.

VIII) In the GMD-controlled areas, the party's task is to develop all kinds of mass movements, direct the daily economic struggle of all the people, lead the anti-imperialist movement, and transform it into a general attack on the GMD regime. Thus, the movement can cooperate with Red Army operations and serve the purpose of winning an initial victory of the revolution in one or more provinces.

The most important task is to make every effort to organize strikes in cities because only working-class strikes can provide the anti-imperialist movement and the struggle of the urban poor and the unemployed with courage, persistence, and a revolutionary determination. Therefore, now it is more urgent than at any other time for the party to carry out work in factories and among members of the yellow trade unions. We must organize carefully all kinds of struggle of the working class, lead the spontaneous strikes of the workers, advocate better treatment for the workers during the Spring Festival period, expand the red trade unions, win over the masses in the yellow trade unions, establish a strike committee elected by the workers and turn it into the leading organ of the factory, set up a joint struggle committee for both workers who have jobs and those who are unemployed, and organize pickets recruited from unemployed workers. These are our current major tasks. We must be good at transforming the economic struggles of the working class into an anti-imperialist movement and into a struggle to assist the Red Army and the soviet movement. The labor movement is the party's central task in the GMD-controlled areas. We must focus our efforts on work in factories, the trade unions, and the leadership of strikes.

The party must make full use of the continuous outrages committed by the Japanese imperialists, the attempt of the French and other imperialists to carve up China (such as France's invasion of Yunnan and Britain's occupation of Xikang), and the GMD's submission to the foreign powers (its policy of nonresistance, the secret agreement with Japan, and the Mitsui Loan) to educate the people in order to push the anti-imperialist struggle to a new stage. Party organizations at all levels must implement bravely and firmly the recent instruction of the Comintern on strengthening our leadership over the anti-imperialist movement.⁵³ In our propaganda work, we must further expose the GMD's mean tricks to sell out the national interests and uncover the schemes of the various counterrevolutionary parties to help the GMD maintain its reactionary rule. We should step up our propaganda work and call on people to rise up to make revolution and establish the people's government. We should let the people understand that only the soviet government is the true political power of the people. The party and the soviet government should encourage the people to take up arms to wage the national revolutionary war, fight against all the imperialists, and win the independence and unification of China. We must also tell the people that only by overthrowing the GMD regime, the running dog of the imperialists, can we win victory in the national revolutionary war.

We must develop further the anti-imperialist movement: set up anti-imperialist mass organizations in factories, schools, barracks, and neighborhoods; establish an anti-imperialist conference in every city; organize anti-imperialist demonstrations; and win the freedom to hold such demonstrations. We must enhance our struggle against all the opposition parties, strengthen our party's organizations, and expand our political influence. These are our party's central tasks in the anti-imperialist movement.

The party must exert firm leadership over various kinds of antitax movements in the flood areas and the struggle waged by the GMD soldiers. We must correct completely the opportunist pessimistic attitude toward our work. Our party must stand at the head of all the struggles launched by the oppressed and exploited people, use these struggles to sabotage the GMD regime and support the operations of the Red Army, and coordinate them with the Red Army's attacks on the GMD troops.

It is of vital importance to consolidate party organizations and prepare party members well for the forthcoming decisive class battle. Here, we must pay special attention to the political education of party members, promote new cadres with working-class backgrounds to leading positions, and educate old cadres. We should take strict precautions against the enemy's scheme to sneak into the party and carefully examine party organizations. Meanwhile, we must recruit many workers and peasants as well as some poor revolutionary students into the party, improve the leadership methods of all party organizations, particularly those at the party branch level, strengthen our work at the grass roots, and establish our party foothold in factories and mills.

IX) To carry out the task facing the party and to win an initial victory of the revolution in the provinces of Hunan, Hubei, and Jiangxi, we must wage a ruthless and staunch struggle on two fronts. At present, right opportunism is still the greatest danger to the revolution. One can see it in the underestimation of the revolutionary situation and in the pessimistic attitude toward the Red Army. Spreading rumors that the Red Army is lax in discipline, the right opportunists refuse to take advantage of the current favorable circumstances to launch attacks, regard the outdated strategy as forever-correct dogmas, adopt a pessimistic attitude toward work in the trade unions, and overlook the workers' economic struggles. They think that it is impossible to organize the labor movement in the present economic crisis and act as followers of various factions in the GMD and other opposition parties. We must concentrate our strength to fight against rightism. On the other hand, as the revolutionary high tide arrives, there has also appeared the danger of the "leftist" tendency and the attempt to revive the Lisan line (such as the plan to hold a one-day general strike in Shanghai and the idea to ask a small number of workers to withdraw from the yellow trade union rather than making every effort to win over all the masses). We must not neglect the struggle against the "leftist" tendency either. In general, we should fight against all kinds of double-dealers who in speech admit the correctness of party resolutions but who in deeds either resist them or implement them reluctantly. The Party Center believes that with painstaking Bolshevik-style efforts, self-criticism, and the struggle on two fronts, our comrades in party committees at all levels will surely carry out this resolution and win an initial victory of the Chinese revolution in one or more provinces.

D.10 Political Report to the Conference of the Fourth Front Army of the Red Army on Party and Political Work. Zhang Guotao (2 November 1934)⁵⁴

1) The significance of our great victory

What is the significance of this conference of ours? This must be understood first.

The task of political work and the party's work in the Red Army is to strengthen, increase, and develop the Red Army's combat capability. Therefore, this conference of the Red Army's Fourth Front Army on political and party work is to prepare ourselves politically to defeat the enemy. This has a great significance for us. The victory of the Fourth Front Army will help realize an initial victory of the revolution in the whole of Sichuan and one or several provinces in the northwest. This victory is a basic factor determining the Chinese revolution. This initial victory must provide a basis for the success of the entire revolution. We are responsible for the future of the revolution.

We all know that we have already gained great victories. This year of prolonged warfare was the first in the history of the Fourth Front Army. It has demonstrated the bravery and firmness of the Fourth Front Army of the Red Army and its spirit of never stopping unless the enemy has been defeated. In the past year, we have dealt our enemy blows in the battles of the Dongling River and the Huofeng Mountains. The Ninth and Thirtieth corps, Seventy-third, Seventy-fifth, 263rd, 268th, and 264th Regiments demonstrated extraordinary heroism in these battles. In the battle of Dakou Village, the 269th Regiment showed its contribution; in the battle of the Tonghua Mountains, the 268th and 265th Regiments displayed enormous bravery; in the battle of the Ma-An Mountains, the 265th Regiment completely wiped out Commander Hao's troops. The 265th and 268th Regiments, the Ninth and Thirtieth Corps all achieved great things. Our counterattacks in several great battles, such as those at Zhenlong Pass, Gaobei Village, and Wanyuan, have demonstrated our firm spirit. In the battles of the past year, our triumph over the enemy has doubtlessly been achieved through the determination and political correctness of the commanders of the Fourth Front Army, as well as the bravery of the soldiers. These victories of ours were won under the command of the Party Center. The Party Center has praised these great victories. This should be made public and made known to the fighting men and officers.

One further major significance of our victory is that we have severely undermined the entire reactionary rule in Sichuan and given confidence to the masses in all the red areas. The Fourth Front Army is self-confident; the masses depend on us; [we] have proved to all the comrades that victory certainly belongs to us. Our victories have an enormous impact not only on the masses in the red areas, but also on the masses in the white areas. They have learned that the soviet republic and the Red Army have won; their savior has won. This fact has fundamentally shaken the reactionary forces throughout Sichuan Province.

For the same reasons, this has further shaken the GMD's rule throughout the whole country.

Not only have we gained political influence, but we have greatly expanded the forces of the revolution. Tens of thousands of rifles have fallen into the hands of the workers and peasants, increasing the strength of the revolutionary forces. This has also dealt a great blow to the imperialists' attempts to partition China and gives a great impetus to and support for the entire revolution. These are great victorious steps taken to wipe out thoroughly the counterrevolutionary fifth "extermination campaign" and are capable of utterly smashing this campaign by the imperialists and their lackeys.

However, these victories did not end the war. It will not end unless we have completely destroyed the enemy. Without annihilating the counterrevolutionary rule of the GMD throughout Sichuan Province; the rule of landlords, local despots, the gentry, and the bourgeoisie throughout the country; and the rule of the imperialists, there will be no break in this war; nor will we see its final conclusion. Therefore, our task is to continue the war. The war still rests on our shoulders, and we must strive for greater victories until the final triumph has been obtained.

How should we estimate our victories? We have dealt the enemy a severe blow, prevented it from attacking us in the short term, and defeated the enemy's original plans so that it cannot continue its attack without adding new forces. However, our victories are not yet substantive. We have merely prepared the ground for greater victories—such as the complete annihilation of enemies like Liu Xiang, Tian Songrao, and Deng Xihou and the routing of Chiang Kai-shek's main forces and all enemies in Gansu, Hubei, and Shaanxi. This will provide the possibility and conditions to turn Sichuan and the northwest into red areas. Such a possibility lies before us. Future battles will turn this possibility into reality.

This calls for strengthening our ranks and determination through unwavering struggles despite countless difficulties; it is the task of this conference to make this possibility a reality.

If it is true that we have the capacity to attack Chengdu as the soldiers of the 271st Regiment claim, we should do so. We should be clear that we must not make self-serving estimates [of the situation]. We have damaged the enemy, but have not annihilated it. While we have won great victories, they are not yet complete. Expansion and consolidation are inseparable. Therefore, we must apply the offensive principle to strive for greater victories. This is the conference's task.

Victory in any war requires basic conditions and resolute struggles. Through resolute struggle and hard work, we can change the ratio between the forces, increasing our own strength and weakening the enemy. The problem now is how to increase our strength most quickly. This problem must be solved by the conference.

My political report will focus on the following points:

First, class struggle throughout the world.

Second, the situation of the class struggle in China.

Third, the situation concerning the red areas in Sichuan and Shaanxi and the Fourth Front Army of the Red Army.

Fourth, tasks for the future.

[[2) Class struggle throughout the world

a) Revolutionaries must be internationalists. Thus, comrades in the Soviet areas of Sichuan and Shaanxi must study the international situation.]]

Since little anti-imperialist work has been carried out among the Red Army soldiers, we know little about the “world” of the imperialists and the situation in the world. We do not know what is necessary to defeat the enemy. For example, at the battlefield when the reactionaries shout out propaganda such as “you are the running dogs of the Soviet Union,” many of our comrades do not know how to respond. Our comrades did some very stupid things and let us be accused rather than turning on our accusers. This has confounded us all.

The bourgeoisie’s world is one of imperialism. There is no imperialism in the Soviet Union. What the rich fear most is that others will point out that they are the running dogs of the imperialists. Moreover, they fear that we will expose this fact. However, we do not know how to expose this. Our inability to use good propaganda to attack the enemy renders us passive and allows the enemy to appropriate the term [running dog]. We do not understand how to use our best weapons. It is like a guerrilla soldier being unable to use a machine gun. This is the biggest mistake in our political work. The enemy slanders us, accusing us of being the running dogs of the Soviet Union. The question can be very easily answered. Because the bourgeoisie fear most the unity of the proletariat—it is afraid not only of the alliance among our workers and peasants and the Soviet Union, but of our alliance within China. The rich are most afraid that the poor will unite. Thus they plot their sabotage. Things will be easy if we present the facts. If we study properly the international situation, as instructed by the Party Center and the Comintern, [we can see] our basic task is to conduct a land revolution to oppose imperialism. Now we have relaxed our efforts on one important task. Neglecting work to oppose imperialism is like being able only to shoot a rifle but not being able to command a machine-gun company in a battle. The principle is the same.

Therefore, fundamental changes must be made at this conference. We must understand how to oppose imperialism and win over the majority of the masses.

[[The imperialists are the number one enemy of the workers and peasants.

b) The Soviet Union is the great base of the world revolution.

c) The development of the world revolutionary situation.

d) The fundamental contradictions of imperialism and the danger of an imperialist war.

e) The imperialists are stepping up preparations to attack the Soviet Union. The pivotal class war in the world is that between the Soviet Union and the imperialists.]]

f) The savagery of the fascists is a new cycle in the revolution and war at the present time.

Germany is where fascism is at its most rampant, and Italy is where fascism has lasted longest. What is fascism? Fascists are open robbers. Chiang Kai-shek is also learning from the Fascists. His fascism is betraying the country and [perpetrating] open slaughter. This is the content of his fascism. Second, there is the world proletariats' war against fascism.

Third, there is the attack on the Chinese revolution and the partitioning of China. The GMD has sold out four provinces of China (in the northeast) and all the most important places. With the help of the GMD, the imperialists have carved up China. The greatest event in China is the emergence of the great soviet republic and the Red Army. This has given a great impetus to the revolutionary movement in colonial countries, but has also compelled the imperialists to attack the Chinese revolution. Now, the imperialists' attack on the Chinese revolution is our greatest danger. The imperialists attack China in order to attack the Soviet Union and partition China.

The war launched by the imperialists and the GMD on the Chinese revolution and our war against the fifth "extermination campaign" [are reflected] at the international level in the imperialists' war against the Soviet Union. This is a fundamental problem. Meanwhile, the international imperialists are preparing for war among themselves. The oppressed peoples in colonial countries are waging fierce wars to expel imperialists and liberate themselves. This is the national revolutionary war.

Therefore, the world now is in the "period of revolution and war." That is, it is the period for the workers and peasants to rise up and fight the imperialists to the death. The Comintern has warned workers and peasants throughout the world. The Comintern's warning is: the situation now is very urgent; the wars of the world revolution and the wars of plunder are about to be launched. We must prepare.

In these wars, our war does not stand alone. We are making revolution. The workers and peasants the world over are also fighting their governments. The workers in Britain, France, and the United States have risen up to support the Chinese revolution. Chiang Kai-shek had seventy airplanes in Hangzhou, but all of them were set on fire by us in a minute. Who did this? The CP led the people to do this. The bombs dropped by Chiang Kai-shek's airplanes on the Central Soviet Area often failed to explode. This is the manifestation of the support for the Chinese revolution and the organized sabotage of the enemy's attack by workers in various foreign countries. Therefore, in these struggles, the oppressed battlefronts and the oppressed classes in all countries are helping each other. If we undermine the enemy's forced conscription, that will benefit them [those conscripted]. Therefore, land distribution is not carried out because we are somebody else's running dogs, but is to help ourselves. In order to crush the Chinese revolution and betray China, the GMD puts forward slogans to protect the foreign devils wherever it goes. This is why we are not willing to be slaves without a country. This is why we fight the GMD. This is our proposal. Because of the interrelated nature of the world revolution, the Chinese revolution now occupies an extremely important position in the world. Our war is part of the war to liberate the workers and poor people throughout the whole world—it is the most important part. The Soviet Union makes greater efforts than we. The Chinese soviet areas have played enormous roles in the world revolution. What has been said above explains that the Soviet Union presents a very bright picture for the world revolution and that the revolution in various countries has also developed very fast. Yet, there have been instances where the economic and revolutionary crises in individual countries have not been able to support the revolution and war. Here the Chinese revolution is of enormous significance. The historic period we are in today is one of earth-shattering changes. We are struggling against this period. This situation affects every one of us.

In this period of revolutionary development, with an international situation favorable to us, we should step up our efforts, take over responsibilities, win even greater victories through difficult struggles, and fight for the final victory. The task for the Fourth Front Army of the Red Army and the party is to prepare ourselves to ally with the Soviet Union and the proletariat throughout the world in order to defeat the imperialists. In the war against the fifth "extermination campaign," in the war against imperialism, and in the war of national revolution, the CP must be able to lead the majority of the workers and peasants to overthrow imperialism and gain the victory for the soviet republic. Only this will bring about the realization of the world revolution.

3) The situation of the Chinese revolution

a) The situation in the soviet areas throughout the country

The soviet areas throughout the country and the Red Army have fought a war against the fifth "extermination campaign" for over a year. We have gained many victories in this war. In the Central Soviet Area alone, we routed over 100 enemy regiments and wiped out about fifty regiments. There have been great victories in the soviet areas in the border regions of E-Yu-Wan and Xiang-Exi. In our soviet area covering Sichuan and Shaanxi, we have defeated 200 enemy regiments and wiped out over fifty regiments. In this red area, we have obtained many rifles and defeated warlords like Liu Xiang, Deng Xihou, Tian Songrao, Liu Cunhou, Yang Sen, Li Jiaju, and Ruo Zezhou. Excluding munitions factories, we have captured over 40,000 rifles. In the Central Soviet Area, [our comrades] have fought a slightly better battle by using extensive guerrilla war. They have dispatched many special teams to the enemy's rear to attack the enemy 50 to 100 kilometers behind the front line. Most of the able-bodied middle-aged men have joined the Red Guards. They number half a million and some 200,000 often take part in the action. There are over 100,000 Young Pioneers. [The Red Army there] can deploy tens of thousands of Red Guards, who can dig trenches, construct false positions, deploy units to deceive the enemy, and fulfill missions on their own. Therefore, the main forces of the Red Army can be concentrated in one place to attack the enemy. The Red Guards can dig traps filled with sharpened bamboo sticks all over the fields and slopes. Such traps are dug on all the entries into the red areas, making it difficult for the enemy to find its way when it attacks. The enemy cannot move at night, and can only do so slowly during the day. If the bandits come in, we concentrate some forces to launch an attack, rush to the edge of the trap-infested positions, and take the enemy's surrender. When things become tense, we immediately withdraw. The enemy has no way to find us. [The Red Guards] also make many tiger arrows to be mounted on important roads, so as to make it difficult for the bandits to attack. They also know how to make mines. They have used every means of attack and all kinds of homemade rifles and guns. It is a pity that we know too little about these methods and cannot talk about them all. They can use all kinds of methods to hit the enemy; they fight an excellent guerrilla war and can take tens of thousands of white soldiers prisoner in one battle. The guards watching over the white soldiers are all Red Guards and Young Pioneers. The Red Guards are also in charge of clearing the mountain of enemy troops. That is why the soldiers of the white army say, "We are at the end of our wits when we fight the Red Guards and Young Pioneers of the Central Soviet Area." There are certain conventions when they fight the Red Army, but the Red Guards hit you hard without using any conventions or giving warning. The Red Guards can build all kinds of artillery positions, but that is not all. The Red Guards all help take care of the wounded and the sick. That is why their local armed forces have developed very fast. Special political and party work is carried out among the Red Guards and Young Pioneers. We have not yet learned this; we are very far from [using this method].

For battle, the Red Army there has more guns than we do; it has several hundred metal guns. Its machine guns and mortars are more numerous than ours. Every division has a wireless so that when it fights, it can concentrate the fire of several hundred guns on one GMD stronghold. Their assault fire is devastating. When their main forces, the First, Third, and Fifth army groups, are together, each of their regiments is stronger than our Seventy-fifth or 268th Regiment. The enemy has a headache whenever these three army groups are gathered and attack the enemy. They are best at moving at night and maneuvering the troops. When they maneuver at night, they are protected by the local armed forces. This means that the enemy has no way of knowing where our main forces are.

They have a regular Red Army University with over 10,000 students who, on graduation, can become battalion commanders. It is much bigger than our Peng-Yang School. The students there cannot only build fortifications, shoot, and throw hand-grenades, but many of them can fire cannons and pilot airplanes. They have the Red Army's Articles of Discipline and detailed political regulations, and they receive regular training. Even the Red Guards and Young Pioneers get the same modern military training and learn to aim [guns] and command troops. A regimental commander of the Red Guards perhaps knows more than our own regimental commander. Of course, they have some difficulties caused by the enemy's blockade. But food is not a problem. Women have joined in production. Salt? They can produce it themselves. These problems have been solved. Medicines? They have also developed them. If we do not capture enough from the enemy, we can organize many doctors of Chinese traditional and herbal medicine to solve this problem. They have invented many things. The inventors are amply rewarded. They print paper currency and sell public debt. The people and Red Army soldiers all use paper money. Whether in terms of guerrilla warfare or commanding military operations, they have done better than we in many respects. Not long ago six divisions of Chiang Kai-shek's troops attacked a certain place, but were immediately defeated by them. Later Chiang Kai-shek again mobilized his officer corps, but it was decimated. That they could achieve this is owing to the fact that their work among the masses is better than ours, their land distribution is better, their soviets are better than ours, their party and government work is better than ours. The masses there are very enthusiastic and vie with each other to join in the battle. Not too long ago, the Central Soviet Republic convened a meeting of families of the Red Army soldiers. Over 10,000 representatives of families of Red Army soldiers attended. They wrote tens of thousands of letters to the front and sent a delegation which told the Red Army soldiers to fight resolutely. They also sent a telegram to the Fourth Front Army telling us to fight resolutely as well.

The work they have done is far superior to ours. They bravely fight for the revolution with their lives. Now the Central Soviet Area is fighting for the revolution with its life. It wants to defeat the enemy, drive Chiang Kai-shek into the sea, and render Chiang Kai-shek's airplanes useless.

Let's talk about Xiao Ke. He leads the Sixth Army Corps of the Red Army that has fought heroically all the way from east to west Hunan. His troops are fierce. He has fought more fiercely than we have. The enemy is busy transferring troops to attack him. He Long is an expert in guerrilla warfare; wherever he attacks, he distributes grain and clothing. This is much better than some of the comrades in our Fourth Front Army who everywhere forbid the masses to cut down the rice crops.

[Our forces] in E-Yu-Wan are also fighting fiercely. They have taken over Jingjia Village from Zhang Xuiliang. Several months ago, Comrade Wu Huanxian brought the war to the railway station at Xingyang, frightening the wits out of the GMD.

Thus, the red areas and the Red Army all over the country are fighting fierce battles with the enemy. In every aspect they have provided us with examples to follow and learn. In general, every place is in the middle of a red-hot war with the enemy. In Sichuan and Shaanxi, we broke through the fifth "extermination campaign" but it has not been thoroughly destroyed. As long as we continue our efforts, we can thoroughly smash this fifth "extermination campaign." Therefore, our coordination with the soviet areas throughout the country is of great significance. Even now, we should thoroughly defeat the fifth "extermination campaign" in the spirit of Wanyuan when we had to eat potatoes and corn [to survive].

How many CP members are there in the country? There are 380,000. They have led the party struggle in the soviet republic and the white areas. We should view this struggle as part of the struggle of the soviet areas throughout the whole country. Our responsibilities are indeed very critical. We should never stop, even for a minute, the fight to smash thoroughly the fifth "extermination campaign."

b) The situation of the struggle in the white areas and the dramatic development of the labor movement

First, apart from the extremely important aspect of the expansion of the soviet areas, let us take a look at the situation of the labor movement in the major cities in China. Large cities are under the control of the imperialist forces. Recently, the CP led the general strike of 50,000 workers in Tangshan, which raised the slogan of overthrowing the GMD. The [workers] in the textile, silk, and British-American tobacco factories are on general strike. The strikers often fight street battles with the GMD police—this has enormous political significance.

In Hebei, under a severe reign of white terror, one of our labor unions has over 6,000 members. No matter how severe the reign of white terror, the CP is leading the workers to fight. The party's strength has expanded.

Second, these struggles have been of a ferocious character. A solid foundation has been laid among the workers in the north. The work in the white areas is underground. However, as a result of the party's many efforts, we have our people in all the major factories. We have also organized major struggles among the unemployed workers.

Therefore, the Party Center has said, "the struggle of the Chinese working class is surging forward in a fierce, lively, and strong manner." This has a great deal to do with our struggle.

In addition, the CP in "Manchuria" (the Japanese imperialists occupied the three provinces of the northeast and called them "Manchuria") has organized many people's volunteer fighters and attacked the Japanese imperialists. Their fighting is fierce. It is said that they have captured many rifles. They kill the Japanese one day, and Japanese officers the next. They have established people's military revolutionary committees, volunteer armies, and guerrilla forces.

Fourth, the peasants' guerrilla warfare is also getting fierce. Let's simply talk about the areas around Sichuan.

In the areas of south Sichuan, Gusong and Mabian, and the sixteen counties of Yinglai, there are several armies of tax resisters. In Qushan and Wudu, guerrilla wars are being waged by peasants everywhere. There are so many of them that they must have spread to countless provinces and counties. In Wudu, Gansu, after the peasant uprising, the flag of "the special brigade of the Fourth Front Army of the Red Army" was raised.

Concerning the soldiers [of the white army], defectors to the Red Army are increasing daily. The troops of Sun Liangzhong that have defected to the Central Soviet Area included four divisions with over 26,000 rifles. They were reorganized into the Fifth Army Corps. Now mutiny among the GMD troops is a serious problem. Soldiers cut off the heads of their company commanders, take their rifles, and run in our direction.

Therefore, our comrades can see that as far as the revolution throughout the entire country is concerned, there are so many soviet areas, workers' strikes, peasants' uprisings, soldiers' mutinies, and many other things—this is roughly the revolutionary situation throughout the country.

4) The character of GMD rule

[[a) The GMD's certain capitulation to the imperialists

The most shameful example is in northeast China. GMD rule has now become openly and shamelessly fascist. The GMD's treason has caused a vast anti-imperialist movement to develop. The petty bourgeoisie in every city hates the imperialists.]]

b) The Three Principles of the People are murderous! The GMD is a party of extortion

Therefore, their so-called Three Principles of the People were called murderous principles by the workers during the Canton Uprising [1927]. The GMD was called the party of extortion.

Lenin has said very clearly that the CP's definition of the national problem is: national self-determination and opposition to oppressing weak and small nations. What is the national problem? There are several races in the world: whites, yellows, blacks, reds, and browns. Even in China, there are special regions like Tibet, Mongolia, and Manchuria. The Chinese people are of the yellow race. There are strong and weak races. The imperialists take advantage of their superior force to oppress weak and small nations. The imperialists do not treat the Chinese as humans. At the gate of a park in Shanghai hangs a sign, "Chinese and dogs not allowed." They simply do not regard the Chinese as human beings.

The comrades from Hong Kong can tell us many stories. Our view on nationalism is that under the principle of liberty [nations] unite to oppose imperialism and liberate all nations. The GMD's nationalism amounts, first of all, to the betrayal of China. Second, it oppresses the Muslims, Miaos, Koreans, and Mongolians. The CP's and Lenin's views are the only correct views. Sun Yat-sen was a traitor of China—he was the leader and teacher of treason. His program for nation-building amounts to a plan to sell out China's treasures, selling everything in China to the imperialists to get money from them. His program oppresses the weak and small nationalities within China.

What is the doctrine of people's power? The doctrine of people's power is to beat the poor people everywhere, slaughter workers and peasants. Where is people's power?

There is no power whatsoever. There is forced conscription everywhere. Liu Xiang [a warlord in Sichuan] has power; the people have no power at all. The people's power of the GMD is the power to kill and burn. Only the communist views and soviet political programs grant people power; the soviets do not have forced conscription; people have the right to vote and be elected. Under the soviet regime, 90 percent of the poor in China participate in the government.

The doctrine of people's livelihood means death for the people. In the last few years countless people have been killed and persecuted to death. [The GMD] has done everything imaginable in terms of slaughtering poor people, like selling opium and morphine. Only the CP gives the masses a real life. It redistributes land and finds jobs [for them]. Therefore, the doctrine of people's livelihood is a doctrine of killing and burning. The GMD can do nothing about the problems facing the masses in China. The masses can only rise up and overthrow the GMD, and seize power.

These reactionaries are also saying: communism cannot be realized in China. We all know the ten political programs of the CP. Which one cannot be realized? First, drive the imperialists out of China. Second, confiscate all the imperialists' businesses and banks in China. Third, national self-determination for the Chinese people. Fourth, overthrow GMD rule. Fifth, establish soviet power. Sixth, the eight-hour workday. Workers should receive unemployment, labor, and social insurance. Seventh, confiscate the land of the rich and redistribute the land to workers, peasants, and soldiers. Eighth, provide soldiers with a livelihood and land. Ninth, abolish levies, establishing a unified tax law. Tenth, unite with the world proletariat, weak and small nations, and the Soviet Union.

Which one of the above ten proposals cannot be realized? Only communism can improve the livelihood of soldiers. Only communism can help China gain independence and freedom. This "ism" is the only "ism" that can be realized in China. The political program of the CP is the only political program demanded by the workers and peasants in China and has already mobilized many millions of people to fight for it. Only communism represents the interests of the masses. Our comrades struggle to realize the political program of the CP. The GMD can only succeed in turning the Chinese people into slaves without a country, and in starving workers and peasants to death. Such a party will only perish—it will be overthrown by us.

The reactionaries are also saying: China can only have Germanism—which is fascism. In China there are two forces locked in struggle: one kind is the fascist doctrine of the Three Principles of the People; the other kind is the flag of communism. Many millions of people not only hope, but also struggle, for the realization of the political program of communism. You can reply: "The doctrine of the Three Principles of the People will certainly be overthrown. Only communism can save the poor people in China; only communism meets the demands of the majority of the people of China."

c) China can only travel along the road to a soviet republic

The situation in China at present is simply the betrayal of China by the GMD and the partition of China by the imperialists. Therefore, this situation invites all imperialists to compete for China and to carve it up. The British move into Tibet, the French into Yunnan, and the Americans to the Yangtze River, while the League of Nations uses its technical committees. China is a juicy piece of meat. In confusion, the imperialists are fighting over it. The GMD paves the way for them and carves out a route for the imperialists—this route is called the route to colonization. The other route is national self-determination, opposition to the imperialists, and overthrow of the GMD. This is the soviet route. The GMD troops and the Red Army led by the CP are fighting to decide which route is to be taken. The workers and peasants in China can win the soviet victory only by resolutely struggling forward.

Which comrades have read the five programs for fighting the imperialists and resisting the Japanese? These five programs for fighting the imperialists and resisting the Japanese are the mobilization order for us to struggle for a new independent and free China.

The most critical battle against the fifth "extermination campaign" in China is in the midst of a life-and-death struggle. The workers and peasants throughout the country must all regard this war as their task and thoroughly break down and smash the fifth "extermination campaign." This is a very serious problem, requiring that we mobilize our forces on all fronts and use all our might to fight and win victory.

5) The general situation of the Chinese revolution

[[The imbalance in revolutionary development means that many industrial centers are under reactionary rule. The workers have risen but have been unable to form soviets or a Red Army. To preserve its rule, the GMD must use many deceptions. The vying for spheres of influence by warlords within the GMD is a destabilizing factor. The conditions to defeat the enemy exist. We must beat the "extermination campaign" and extend our control from one area to the whole of the northwest.]]

6) The future struggle in the Sichuan-Shaanxi Soviet Area

a) The mass struggles in the Sichuan-Shaanxi Soviet Area

The situation in the Sichuan-Shaanxi Soviet Area is: Liu Xiang (was called Magician Liu) has collapsed and cannot continue. He resigned, saying, "We have lost 5,000 officers, and 80,000 soldiers have been killed. The results of twenty years of military buildup have been destroyed once and for all." His First, Second, Third, and Fourth Divisions were routed by us at the Suiding and Xuanhan front. The paper money issued by his local bank is useless. As a consequence of his defeat, huge riots took place in Chengdu. The rich are fleeing in droves because all of Liu Xiang's forces—over 100 shabby regiments—have been defeated at the front. Of the thirty regiments of Deng Xihou's troops, eighteen have been routed. Of the twenty to thirty regiments of Tian Songrao, we have annihilated six out of the ten relatively good regiments. The regiments of Li, Ruo, and Yang have all been defeated by us. Thus, the reactionary rulers throughout Sichuan have panicked. Although the enemy is still collecting its tattered troops and is supplementing them with many recruits from the militia to plug holes, there are so many deserters that the officers have to lock up the soldiers in houses. In addition, many soldiers have died; there is hardly a regiment which has not suffered 50 percent casualties. Who knows how many have died or deserted. In Suiding and Xuanhan, there were many men, but all of them have been forcefully conscripted, so that not a single shadow remains. In Liangshan, nobody comes to the market any more. The people do not use the paper money printed by Liu Xiang. Such a humiliating defeat has greatly demoralized the enemy. Thus it has begun to draw on the landlords' militia and all the filth it can get. The workers in the paper factory in Liangshan have rebelled and raised the red flag.

There is a great deal of guerrilla activity in Liangkai. The mass activities in the Mabian area are very important. For example, did the masses in the southern and Xuanhan areas disapprove of us last year? No. Because of the weakness in the CP's forces and opportunism, some organizations in the white areas did not lead the mass struggles in Sichuan. After the decisive defeat of the Sichuan warlords, the CP in those areas adopted a right opportunist attitude and did not provide active leadership. This reminds us that it is very important to intensify and deepen our work in the white areas.

The situation is the same in Shaanxi. A few days ago reactionary newspapers reported that the Twenty-sixth Corps of the Red Army captured a GMD county secretary and many rifles. In Longxi, over 100 cavalry soldiers mutinied. There are CP guerrilla forces in Hanzhong. There have also been Muslim revolts in Gansu that have turned very fierce.

A few days ago, four soldiers from the white army facing our Twelfth Division deserted to our side. Two of them even actively propagandized for us on the firing line. They shouted to Liu Xiang's soldiers to come over to our side. This shows the increasing revolutionization of the reactionary troops in Sichuan, providing us with an even more favorable situation.

b) The focus of our work is the "joint extermination campaign in Sichuan-Shaanxi"

First, the warlords in Sichuan are now attempting to replenish their battered troops and are inviting Hu Zongnan and Sun Wei to come here and join the battle. This would create a "joint extermination in Sichuan-Shaanxi." The enemy has made quick preparations to attack us. We should prepare to break this "joint extermination campaign in Sichuan-Shaanxi," attack the enemy, take the initiative, and defeat him individually. This is the task that faces us.

Second, let us evaluate the situation of the red areas in Sichuan and Shaanxi. Where are the difficulties in our work? Because our expansion here came a bit late and because of the lack of a foundation in our work in the local areas, we do not have a strong provincial party committee and party organizations. Neither have we aroused fully the initiative of the masses.

In E-Yu-Wan, we never dispersed our forces too widely, but always concentrated our main forces to attack on the same route because we have powerful guerrilla forces. The [masses] there enthusiastically support the Red Army, and mass activities are organized. Last year before we contracted our positions, several thousand people in Cangxi and Langnan joined the Red Army. Such revolutionary enthusiasm was rarely seen before, not in E-Yu-Wan. The masses pick up the rifles and march forward. This kind of spirit is excellent.

If our work last year had been better, then our [present] work would have been better. The Red Army's expansion has not been very great. The local party is still weak.

The situation in Sichuan is such that the masses cannot survive any longer. There are also many contradictions among the reactionary rulers. There are many more Magician Lius and Liu Xiangs. They are simply bastards and capable of doing anything. The feudal air is very heavy in this area. Most of the masses have not been mobilized. These are the results of our insufficient work.

Therefore, some masses say to us: it is not that we do not want to join the Red Army, but we will join after you cross the Jialing River. Of course, on the one hand there is the sabotage by the counterrevolutionaries who obstruct the masses from joining the Red Army; but, on the other hand, there is indeed this kind of psychology among the masses. This should be solved completely by the work of our party's political department.

The situation in Sichuan. We are in the stage of the arrival of the Fourth Front Army that will precede the extensive explosion of the mass revolution. Therefore, previous work in this locality was heavily influenced by that of the political department. From now on the political department should continue to play a major role in the work in this locality. Now we should particularly increase our Bolshevik strength, recruit most of the masses to join the party, and form a mass party to lead the fight.

Third, [we should] actively work on the soldiers in the white army.

Fourth, there is the question of work on anti-imperialism. We should develop a great anti-imperialist movement and have the majority of the masses smash the "joint extermination campaign in Sichuan-Shaanxi" together with us. This will thoroughly smash the fifth "extermination campaign." To win the victory of thoroughly smashing the fifth "extermination campaign" is to win the initial victory in the northwest!

c) Urgent tasks

Several things are needed for us to be able to annihilate the enemy. First, labor power and the masses; second, weapons: rifles, machine guns, mortars, etc.; third, to achieve all these things and defeat the enemy through offensive strategy, there must be the heroic leadership of the CP.

Is it that we do not have guns? There are many extra rifles here. The opportunists say that Liu Xiang has everything. But our antipersonnel rounds of ammunition here were brought to us by Liu Xiang in boxes. He is our transportation team bringing many weapons. Now our Thirty-first Corps wants to fight Hu Zongnan because they want his automatic rifles. To someone who says that the enemy's weapons are superior, and fears we may not be a match for the enemy, we should reply that he is an opportunist, and we must struggle against him. We will certainly capture the better weapons from any enemy who has them.

The human factor is presented to our conference. First, how can we intensify our work in the Red Army and raise the class consciousness of our troops, so that they know the war is a struggle for the liberation of the entire class? Raising the class consciousness of our troops will enable them to have resolute determination in their struggles. This work will establish the authority of the troops and enable every soldier to understand that the only way forward is to struggle under the leadership of the CP. [The only salvation lies] in establishing strict military discipline in the Red Army led by the CP to ensure the combat capability of the troops and to use these methods to strengthen our party's organization and leadership. In particular, during battles, we must use party leadership to strengthen our command. Unless we do this, when the enemy presents us with a difficult problem, we will not be able to find a solution. Close political unity is imperative. This is the first point. Second, because of historical factors, the experience of many years of struggles, and the experienced organization of the CP, the Red Army has become the principal leading force in the red areas. This is also because the CP in Sichuan-Shaanxi emerged quite late. Third, how can we use the political department to mobilize many new recruits to join the Red Army? We must work among the masses not only in the red areas, but also in the white areas. Fourth, work among the soldiers of the white army is extremely important. Fifth, there is the task of leading the anti-imperialist movement (including the question of minority nationalities). These are the basic issues for the Red Army.

d) Change future work so that our work is organized and systematic—this is the precondition for fulfilling our tasks

If we can solidify and strengthen our internal forces, we can eliminate the previous insignificant rate of desertion. Even in a newly formed unit, class consciousness and iron determination, in addition to military training, can greatly increase our strength. This can double a regiment's strength.

Mobilize large numbers of people to join the Red Army. Work among the masses is of a much greater scope. Our anti-imperialist campaign is virtually fruitless. The weakness in our previous work was the neglect of the anti-imperialist campaign. The directives of the Party Center have criticized a kind of opportunism within the red areas, meaning that the red areas are not capable of fundamentally opposing imperialism. This tendency is often very mistaken.

Our work among the soldiers of the white army has just begun, but has not been expanded greatly. Our work among our own troops is still deficient. The leadership of the political department itself is incomplete. The commissars have not yet taken up their own responsibilities. The commissars in each regiment and battalion have played very important roles in battles, but have neglected party work or have even developed the tendency to neglect party and government work.

Moreover, the political department does not have a regular plan, or regular propaganda and organizational work. The propaganda and organization departments are engaged fully in managing work in the local areas. The party committees are only capable of carrying out work among the troops. Moreover, their work in the local areas leaves a lot to be desired.

We have not implemented the plans for keeping discipline before, during, and after battles. There are many instances of personnel from headquarters and logistics, management, and medical care creating a bad political image outside. We do not have regular work among buyers, horse grooms, and logistics personnel. These instances are particularly numerous.

Did we achieve anything in the past? Yes. We have great achievements. Through the battles of the last few years, we have consolidated our army's foundation, broken away from guerrilla warfare, and become an iron Red Army. We have strengthened the leadership of the proletariat and laid the strongest foundations. These are things we can be proud of.

However, there are many shortcomings here.

We have certainly displayed a high degree of flexibility in contracting our positions. But our work is still very lacking.

In terms of the work in the local areas, it is not that our political departments and party organizations do not understand the party line. They have some basic idea about it. However, the greatest flaw is their inability to turn to the masses or mobilize the mass struggle. Thus, in practice, our work is turned into land redistribution by departmental cadres and directors. In particular, our weakness lies in our inability to organize labor unions or peasant associations, or to mobilize the mass struggle. We are not saying that our leadership should be reduced, rather that it should be strengthened a hundredfold. Several tendencies are to be opposed in our party and government work: (i) Liquidationist views: believing that it is enough to do military work only and failing to understand the enormous force of political work. (ii) Ordinary political personnel regard political work only as something to be done in local areas, and abandon or neglect the work among our troops, failing to understand the scope for political work or to relate military work to political work. They act as if they were learning to aim and shoot. They use the party's energies to promote, to an unusual extent, the military training of our troops. This tendency does not understand how to relate the military to the political. It simply believes that good ideologies and understanding are enough to defeat the enemy. We must understand that we can defeat the enemy only by combining Marxism-Leninism with modern military knowledge. This lack of understanding about relating military to political work is a tendency that is most likely to develop among the political personnel. Although the party branches have been extremely active during the battles, this is far from enough. Their work must be intensified. We must not neglect the integration of military and political work. This requires that party leadership should be the model for the masses both in political and military aspects. (iii) Oppose closed-doorism in our organizational work. Many companies do not know how to recruit the bravest and most active soldiers in battle into the party. There is no vigorous leadership. We only know how to read a document to the soldiers, but not how to arouse the initiative of the soldiers. The reverse of this problem is an emphasis on only practical work at the expense of study.

While contracting our positions, two tendencies have arisen: (i) The view that we cannot strengthen our positions during contraction. This causes right opportunism to emerge in our political work. (ii) There is another view that believes the enemy will be defeated as a matter of course. This ignores the major additional efforts that have to be made during this period. Most political work has failed to play the intended role.

There is also the problem of discipline in the Red Army. Either we relax discipline or mechanically enforce it. The relationship between discipline and education has not been clarified in the enforcing, screening, and purging of counterrevolutionaries. This problem too must be solved at this conference. For our conference to fulfill these tasks, we should first of all understand our own line clearly.

Our basic task is to strengthen further our own troops and mobilize more people to join this war. We should concentrate our forces to strike at the enemy on one front and then break up the other fronts. We should mobilize everyone and rely on firm leadership to defeat the current enemy. This is our basic line. This is also the Party Center's line of countering the fifth "extermination campaign."

When we implement this line, we should hit hard at all the right opportunists and all those elements who refuse to follow the offensive line. To safeguard the implementation of this line, we must oppose the loss of self-confidence while struggling against the enemy. This takes the form of exaggerating the enemy's strength, fearing class struggle, fearing intense hostility to the rich peasants, and fearing to purge the landlord spies from our ranks. Moreover, such loss of self-confidence also lies in exaggerating the difficulties for us at the moment, complaining about the difficulties everywhere, and lacking the spirit of overcoming difficulties with determination. Of course, neglecting party and government work will produce the same results.

On the other hand, we should also oppose a different kind of fatalism, which believes that since the enemy has been defeated, victory is naturally ours. This means that we can take a break until our leadership gives us the order to fight again. This amounts to abandonment of the current difficult preparations. This is "leftist" empty talk.

In destroying the enemy and implementing the basic line, we must oppose all forms of right opportunism, empty talk, and self-satisfying "left" opportunism. We must prepare to increase our strength, have better political preparations, replenish our personnel, and never hesitate to implement the offensive principle.

We are sure to defeat the enemy and completely rout him. Thus we can speed up our victory. Wars are extremely capricious. Military principles tell us that up until the last second, one cannot guarantee that there will be no drastic changes.

Therefore, we should strengthen the conditions to safeguard our defeat of the enemy. This is the only route to our complete Bolshevization.

This conference has solved all the problems. It has clarified the international and Chinese revolutionary tasks and pointed out that our central task is to smash thoroughly the fifth "extermination campaign." This task will promote the world revolution and particularly the revolution in the colonial countries in the East. Smashing the GMD's fifth "extermination campaign" will have a decisive impact on our efforts to make China a communist country. We have defeated the enemy in the red areas in Sichuan and Shaanxi and we have the task to smash thoroughly the fifth "extermination campaign" throughout the entire country. Ours is not only a supporting position, but also provides the base from which to launch the revolution throughout the entire northwest.

When our work is done well, we will create better conditions for the revolution. Now we have Comrade Xiao Ke joining forces with Comrade He Long to attack Liu Xiang from both sides. This is an unprecedented favorable situation. Therefore, the particular task of the Fourth Front Army, among those of the Red Army of workers and peasants throughout the country, is to adopt an offensive line to attack the enemy. This conference is to solve the following issues:

- i) work within the Red Army;
- ii) work in local areas;
- iii) work among soldiers of the white army;
- iv) work in the anti-imperialist movement.

The [resolutions] of this conference are to be implemented fully at the company level. This conference is especially important, and this conference can explain these tasks. There must be constant leadership between battles, expansion of party organizations, development of class consciousness, and strengthening of military discipline.

The implementation of these tasks will safeguard our victory. Correct party leadership combines Marxism-Leninism with modern and new military knowledge. With dauntless determination, and with the determination to overcome all difficulties, we can quickly break the “joint extermination campaign in Sichuan-Shaanxi.” We cannot only capture automatic rifles from running dogs like Hu Zongnan, but also must thoroughly smash the fifth “extermination campaign.” We shall fight to the last drop of our blood in order to drive all the imperialists out of China!

(Thunderous applause, everybody rises and sings the “Internationale.”)

D.11 Public Letter from the Revolutionary Military Affairs Committee of the Hunan-Hubei-Sichuan-Guizhou Border Area of the Chinese Soviet Republic to Our Comrades in the Celestial Temples of Yingjiang, Dejiang, Wuchuan, and Yanhe Counties in Guizhou Province (16 June 1934)⁵⁵

Dear Comrades Among the Celestial Soldiers:

You have had enough of the exploitation caused by harsh levies and multiple taxes and have risen up to resist the evil warlords, the township bosses, and the evil gentry. We wholeheartedly salute your courage and determination in this struggle!

We, the temporary central government of the Chinese soviet, have over one million Red Army troops fighting in the interests of the workers and peasants. The Third Army of the Workers and Peasants' Red Army is now waging guerrilla warfare in the scores of counties on the borders of Guizhou, Sichuan, Hunan, and Hubei, in the hope of mobilizing tens of millions of workers and peasants to overthrow the rule of the warlords, local despots, and the gentry, and to fight for the interests and rights of the workers and peasants. Therefore, we and you are fighting on the same side. We are more than willing to establish revolutionary cooperation with you.

We have heard of the many heroic struggles by the Celestial Soldiers and have been saddened by the defeats you have suffered. Why have the Celestial Soldiers never achieved a victory in their history? Because:

First, the objective of the Celestial Soldiers is to resist the imposition of levies. They do not have a plan to overthrow the reactionary GMD. However, if the reactionary government is not overthrown, harsh levies and numerous taxes cannot be abolished. Since the Celestial Soldiers have no plan to overthrow the government of warlords and the GMD, they often suffer severe repression by the troops of the GMD and the warlords. Second, the Celestial Soldiers have organized only the Celestial Temple, without a government of their own making. Since there is no army trained in the use of modern weapons, how can they fight the armies of the reactionary government? Third, the Celestial Soldiers have not structured a political program, which jointly represents the workers, peasants, and the poor people. This program could also cement their unity. Very often, the Celestial Soldiers make a compromise with the local despots, the gentry, and the reactionary government, all of whom have ulterior motives. Switching to the government side, they can be pacified, so that the cause of the Celestial Soldiers is often abandoned in mid-course and defeated. Fourth, the Celestial Soldiers have failed to create a national united organization such as the Chinese soviet. Celestial Soldiers in different areas have no ties with each other.

Owing to these weaknesses and flaws, the Celestial Soldiers have failed to reach their goals despite making enormous sacrifices.

At present the Chinese workers, peasants, and poor masses under the CCP's leadership have adopted a new method of struggle—the soviet revolution.
